Though the Declaration lately presented to us at Newmarket from both our Houses of Parliament, be of so strange a nature, in respect of what we expected, (after so many Acts of grace and favour to our people) and some expressions in it so different from the usual language to Princes, that we might well take a very long time to consider it: Yet the clearness and uprightness of our conscience to God, and love to our Subjects, hath supplied us with a speedy answer, and our unalterable affection to our people prevailed with us to suppress that passion, which might well enough become us upon such an invitation.

We have reconsidered our answer of the first of this month at Theobalds, which is urged to have given just cause of sorrow to our Subjects. Whosoever looks over that message, (which was in effect to tell us, that if we would not join with them in an Act we conceived prejudicial and dangerous to us and the whole Kingdom, they would make a law without us, and impose it upon our People) will not think that sudden answer can be excepted to.

We have little encouragement to replies of this nature, when we are told, of how little value our words are like to be with you; though they come accompanied with all the actions of love and justice, (where there is room for actions to accompany them) yet we cannot but disavow the having any such evil Council and Counsellors to our knowledge, as are mentioned; and if any such be discovered, we will leave them to the censure and judgment of our Parliament: In the mean time we could wish, that our own immediate actions which we avow, and our honour might not be so roughly censured and wounded, under that common title of evil Counsellors.

For our faithful and zealous affection for the true Protestant profession, and our resolution to concur with our Parliament in any possible course for the propagation of it, and the suppression of Popery, we can say no more than we have already expressed in our Declaration to all our loving Subjects, published in Ireland by the advice of our Privy-Council, in which we endeavoured to make as lively a confession of our self in this point, as we were able, being most assured, that the constant practice of our life hath been answerable thereunto; and therefore we did rather expect a testimony and acknowledgment of such our zeal and piety, than those expressions we met with in this Declaration of any design of altering Religion in this Kingdom; and we do (out of the innocence of our Soul) wish, that the judgments of Heaven may be manifested upon those who have, or had any such design. (1.)

REMARK (1.) This Article of the King's answer seems very weak. For the Parliament having set forth, in their Declaration, the reasons why they believed there was a settled design to alter Religion in England, and that the King encouraged the authors, his Majesty only answers in generals.

As for the Scotch troubles, we had well thought, that those unhappy differences had been wrapt up in perpetual silence, by the Act of oblivion, which being solemn-

1641-2. "ly passed in the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, stops our mouth from any other reply, than to shew our great dislike for reviving the memory thereof. (2.)

R. E. M. (2.) It is very visible, the King avoids entering into particulars upon this head, though being attacked by the Parliament, he might have vindicated himself, without infringing the peace between the two Kingdoms, or the Act of oblivion.

"If the Rebellion in Ireland, (so odious to all Christians) seems to have been framed and maintained in England, or to have any countenance from hence, we conjure both our Houses of Parliament, and all our loving Subjects whatsoever, to use all possible means to discover and find such out, that we may join in the most exemplary vengeance upon them that can be imagined; but we must think our selves highly and causelessly injured in our reputation, if any Declaration, action or expression of the Irish Rebels, any letters from Count Ross to the Papists for fasting and praying, or from Tristram Whitcombe, of strange Speeches uttered in Ireland, shall beget any jealousy or misapprehension in our Subjects, of our justice, piety and affection, it being evident to all understandings, that those mischievous and wicked Rebels are not so capable of great advantage, as by having their false discourses so far believed, as to raise fears and jealousies to the distraction of this Kingdom, the only way to their security: And we cannot express a deeper sense of the suffering of our poor Protestant Subjects in that Kingdom, than we have done in our often messages to both Houses, by which we have offered, and are still ready to venture our royal person for their redemption; well knowing, that as we are (in our own interest) more concerned in them, so we are to make a strict account to Almighty God, for any neglect of our duty, or their preservation. (3.)

R. E. M. (3.) The King continues here to clear himself from the suspicions conceived of him with regard to Ireland, by generals and his own testimony. But these proofs taken from his word, and his other outward demonstrations, were not sufficient to satisfy every one. The Parliament did not accuse him of being wanting in expressions of zeal for the reducing of Ireland, but of really neglecting it.

"For the manifold attempts to provoke our late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise the faction in the City of London, and other parts of the Kingdom; if it be said, as relating to us, we cannot without great indignation suffer our selves to be reproached, to have intended the least force or threatening to our Parliament, as the being privy to the bringing up of the army would imply; whereas we call God to witness, we never had any such thought, or knew of any such resolution concerning our late army. (4.)

R. E. M. (4.) We have seen in the account of that conspiracy, what were the several projects of the conspirators, and that indeed they came to no resolution, particularly as to the bringing up the army to London. The King certainly knew all the circumstances of the plot, but as there was nothing resolved, he artfully confines himself here to the denying that he was privy to any resolution, which is very true, for there was no resolution taken. But however, he knew of the design in general to gain the army, of which he says not a word.

"For the petition shewed to us by Captain Legg, we well remember the same, and the occasion of that conference: Captain Legg being lately come out of the North, and repairing to us at Whitehall; we asked him of the state of our army, and (after some relation made of it) he told us, that the commanders and officers of the army had a mind to petition the Parliament, as others of our people had done, and shewed us the copy of a petition, which we read, and finding it to be very humble, desiring the Parliament might receive no interruption in the reformation of the Church and State, to the model of Queen Elizabeth's days; we told him, we saw no harm in it; whereupon he replied, that he believed all the officers in the army would like it, only he thought Sir Jacob Ashby would be unwilling to sign it, out of fear that it might displease us. We then read the petition over again, and then observing, that neither in matter or form, we conceived it could possibly give just cause of offence, we delivered it to him again, bidding him give it to Sir Jacob Ashby, for whose satisfaction we had written C. R. upon it, to testify our approbation: And we wish that the petition might be seen and published, and then we believe it will appear no dangerous one, nor a just ground for the least jealousies or misapprehension. (5.)

R. E. M. (5.) If we compare what the King says here of the contents of this Petition, with that inserted by the Lord Clarendon in his History, we shall find the Lord Clarendon's Petition cannot be the same as that signed by the King with C. R. The King's word must be taken, to believe that this Petition had nothing in it prejudicial to the Parliament. For hitherto it has never appeared.

"For Mr. Jones, it is well known that he was gone from Whitehall, before we received the desires of both Houses for the restraint of our Servants, neither returned he thither, or passed over by any warrant granted by us after that time. (6.)

R. E. M. (6.) It is certain, Termin went beyond sea by the King's warrant. It may be, the King had granted the warrant before he received the Parliament's petition: but the Parliament pretended the warrant was antedated.

"For the breach of Privilege in the accusation of the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the House of Commons, we thought we had given so ample satisfaction in our several messages to that purpose, that it should be no more pressed against us; being confident, if the breach of Privilege had been greater than ever before offered, our acknowledgment and retraction hath been greater than ever King hath given; besides the not examining how many of our privileges have been invaded in defence and vindication of the other; and therefore we hoped our true and earnest protestation in our answer to your order concerning the Militia, would so far have satisfied you of our intentions then, that you would no more have entertained any imagination of any other design than we there expressed. (7.)

R. E. M. (7.) The King was much mistaken in imagining that bare protestations were capable of satisfying the Parliament of the sincerity of his intentions. Nay, the very Declaration he was answering, might have convinced him of the contrary, since it was there said in plain terms, his word was not to be relied upon.

"But why the lifting of so many officers, and entertaining them at Whitehall, should be misconstrued, we much marvel, when it is notoriously known, the tumults at Westminster were so great, and their demeanors so scandalous and seditious, that we had good cause to suppose our own person, and those of our wife and children to be in apparent danger, and therefore we had great reason to appoint a guard about us, and to accept the dutiful tender of the services of any of our loving Subjects, which was all we did to the Gentlemen of the Inns of Court.

"For the Lord Digby, we assure you in the word of a King, that he had not our warrant to pass the seas, and had left our Court before we ever heard of the vote of the House of Commons, or had any cause to imagine, that his absence would have been excepted against.

"What your advertisements are from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, or what the Pope's Nuncio solicits the Kings of France or Spain to do, or from what persons such informations come to you, or how the credit and reputation of such persons have been sifted and examined, we know not; but are confident, no sober honest man in our Kingdoms can believe, that we are so desperate, or so senseless to entertain such designs, as would not only bury this our Kingdom in sudden distraction and ruin, but our own name and posterity in perpetual scorn and infamy; and therefore we could have wished, that in matters of so high and tender a nature (wherewith the minds of our good Subjects must needs be startled) all the expressions were so plain and easy, that nothing might stick with them with reflection upon us, since you thought fit to publish it all.

"And having now dealt thus plainly and freely with you, by way of answer to the particular grounds of your fears; we hope (upon a due consideration, and weighing both together) you will find not the grounds to be of that moment to beget, or longer to continue a misunderstanding betwixt us, or force you to apply your selves to the use of any other power than what the Law hath given you, the which we always intend shall be the measure of our own power, and expect it shall be the rule of our Subjects obedience.

"Concerning our fears and jealousies; as we had no intention of accusing you, so are we sure no words spoken by us (on the sudden) at Thesbalds, will bear that interpretation. We said, for our residence near you, we wish it might be so safe and honourable, that we had no cause to absent our self from Whitehall; and how this can be a breach of Privilege of Parliament we cannot understand. We explained our meaning in our answer at Newmarket, at the presentation of this Declaration, concerning the printed seditious pamphlets and sermons, and the great tumults at Westminster; and we must appeal to you and all the world, whether we might not justly suppose our self in danger of either: And if we were now at Whitehall, what security have we that the like shall not be again, especially if any Delinquents of that nature have been apprehended by the ministers of justice, and been rescued by the People, and so as yet escape unpunished? If you have not been informed of the 1641-2. "the seditious words used in, and the circumstances of those tumults, and will appoint some way for the examination of them, we will require some of our learned Council to attend with such evidence as may satisfy you, and till that be done, or some other course be taken for our security, you cannot (with reason) wonder that we intend not to be, where we most desire to be

"And can there yet want evidence of our hearty and importunate desire to join with our Parliament and all our faithful Subjects, in defence of the religion and public good of the Kingdom? Have we given you no other earnest but words, to secure you of these desires? "The very Remonstrance of the House of Commons (published in November last) of the State of the Kingdom, allows us a more real testimony of our good affections, than words: That Remonstrance valued our acts of grace and justice (8) at so high a rate, that it declared the Kingdom to be then a gainer, though it charged it self by Bills of Subsidies, and Poll-money, with the levy of six hundred thousand pounds, besides the contracting of a debt to our Scotch Subjects of two hundred and twenty thousand pounds. (9.)

REM. (8.) Hitherto the King had spoken of his assent to the acts of this Parliament, but as acts of Grace. He began in this Paper to add, of Justice.

REM. (9.) It is true the nation had been great gainers by these acts of grace and justice. But the King could not represent as a convincing proof of his love for his People, his consent that the illegal taxes of his own imposition should be abolished, and the monopolies authorized by himself, suppressed. Especially as it was not entirely in his power to refuse his assent.

"Are the Bills for the Triennial Parliament, relinquishing our title of imposing upon Merchandize, and power of pressing soldiers, for the taking away the Star-Chamber, and High-Commission-Courts, for the regulating of the Council-table, but words? Are the Bills for the Forests, the Stannery-Courts, the Clerk of the Market, and the taking away the votes of the Bishops out of the Lords House, but words? Lastly, what greater earnest of our trust and reliance on our Parliament, could or can we give, than the passing of a Bill for the continuance of this present Parliament? The length of which we hope will never alter the nature of Parliaments, and the constitution of this Kingdom, or invite our Subjects so much to abuse our confidence, as to esteem any thing fit for this Parliament to do, which were not, if it were in our power to dissolve it to morrow. And after all these, and many other acts of grace on our part (that we might be sure of a perfect reconciliation betwixt us and all our Subjects) we have offered, and are still ready to grant, a free and general pardon, as ample as your selves shall think fit. Now if these be not real expressions of the affection of our soul, for the public good of our Kingdom; we must confess, that we want skill to manifest them (10.)

REM. (10.) A sort of sophistry runs quite through this article, consisting in the supposition that the King had consented to all these acts, out of love and affection for his People, which few persons believed. Besides, all these acts having been made only to suppress the abuses introduced by the King himself, there was no occasion, it seems, to talk so much of them.

"To conclude, (although we think our answer already full to that point) concerning our return to London; we are willing to declare, that we look upon it as a matter of so great weight, as with reference to the affairs of this Kingdom, and our own inclinations and desires, that if all we can say or do, can raise a mutual confidence (the only way with God's blessing to make us all happy) and by your encouragement the laws of the Land, and the government of the City of London, may recover some life for our security, we will overtake your desires, and be as soon with you as you can wish; and in the mean time we will be sure that neither the business of Ireland, or any other advantage for this Kingdom shall suffer through our default, or by our absence; we being so far from repenting the acts of our justice and grace, which we have already performed to our people, that we shall with the same alacrity be still ready to add such new ones, as may best advance the peace, honour, and prosperity of this Nation."

Before the Parliament received this answer, they sent another Petition to the King, in reply to his sudden answer to the Declaration delivered at New-Market. Those answers and replies be long and full of repetitions, yet I think it necessary to insert them at large, that the Reader may be able to pass an impartial judgment upon this quarrel. For in affairs of this nature, and especially in this which has given birth to two parties still subsisting in England, there is great danger of being misled, if the honesty and prejudices of the Historians, who are all of one or other party, be relied on. It will be better therefore to leave the Reader at liberty to judge upon the parties own Papers. Here follows the Parliament's Petition.

May it please your Majesty,

YOUR Majesty's loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons in Parliament, cannot conceive, that the Declaration, which your Majesty received from us at the New-market, was such as did deserve that censure, which your Majesty made to our Committees there, and sent in writing to both Houses; our address therein being accompanied with plainness, humility, and faithfulness, we thought more proper for the removing the distraction of the Kingdom; than if we had then proceeded according to your Majesty's message of the 20th of January, by which your Majesty was pleased to declare, that we would declare, what we intended to do for your Majesty, and what we expected to be done for our selves; in both which we have been very much hindered by your Majesty's denial to secure us, and the whole Kingdom, by disposing the Militia, as we had divers times most humbly petitioned; and yet we have not been altogether negligent of either, having lately made good proceedings, in preparing a book of rates, to be passed in a bill of Tunnage and Poundage; and likewise the most material heads of those humble desires, which we intended to make to your Majesty, for the good and contentment of your Majesty, and your people; but none of these could be perfected before the Kingdom be put into safety, by settling the Militia: And until your Majesty shall be pleased to concur with your Parliament in these necessary things, we hold it impossible for you to give the world, or your people, such satisfaction concerning the fears and jealousies which we have expressed, as we hope your Majesty hath already received, touching that exception, which you were pleased to make to Mr. Pym's speech.

As for your Majesty's fears and doubts, the ground

whereof is from seditious pamphlets and sermons, we shall be as careful to endeavour the removal, as soon as we shall understand what pamphlets and sermons are by your Majesty intended, as we have been to prevent all dangerous tumults. And if any extraordinary concourse of people out of the City of Westminster, had the face and shew of tumult and danger, in your Majesty's apprehension, it will appear to be caused by your Majesty's denial of such a guard to your Parliament, as they might have cause to confide in; and by taking into Whitehall, such a guard for your self, as gave just cause of jealousy to the Parliament, and of terror and offence to your people; we seek nothing but your Majesty's honour, and the peace and prosperity of your Kingdoms; and we are heartily sorry we have such plentiful matter of an answer to that question, Whether you had violated our Laws?

We beseech your Majesty to remember, that the government of this Kingdom, as it was in a great part managed by your Ministers, before the beginning of this Parliament, consisted of many continued and multiplied acts of violation of the Laws; the wounds whereof were scarcely healed, when the extremity of all those violations was far exceeded, by the late strange and unheard-of breach of our Laws, in the accusation of the Lord Kimbilton, and five Members of the Commons House, and in the proceedings thereupon, for which we have received no full satisfaction,

To your Majesty's next question, Whether you had denied any bill, for the ease and security of your Subjects? We wish we could stop in the midst of our answers, that with much thankfulness we acknowledge, that your Majesty hath passed many good Bills, full of contentment and advantage to your People; but truth and necessity inforce us to add this, That even in or about the time of passing those Bills, some design or other hath been on foot; which if it had taken effect, would not only have deprived us of the fruit of those Bills, but have reduced us to a worse condition of confusion, than that wherein the Parliament found us.

And if your Majesty had asked us the third question, intimating in that Speech, What we had done for your self? Our answer would have been much more easy, That we had paid two armies, wherewith the Kingdom was burthened last year; and have undergone the charge of the war in Ireland, at this time, when through many other excessive charges and pressures, your Subjects have been exhausted, and the stock of the Kingdom very much diminished; which great mischiefs, and the charges thereupon ensuing, have been occasioned by the evil counsels so powerfully with your Majesty, which have, and will, cost this Kingdom more than two millions, all 1642 "all which, in justice, ought to have been borne by your Majesty.

"As for that free and general pardon your Majesty has been pleased to offer, it can be no security to our fears and jealousies, for which your Majesty seems to propound it, because they arise not from any guilt of our own actions, but from the evil designs and attempts of others.

"To this our humble answer to that Speech, we desire to add an information, which we lately received from the Deputy-Governor of the Merchant-Adventurers at Rotterdam in Holland, that an unknown person, appertaining to the Lord Digby, did lately sollicite one James Henely, a mariner, to go to Elfsnore, and to take charge of a ship in the fleet of the King of Denmark, there prepared, which he should conduct to Hull, in which fleet likewise, he said, a great army was to be transported: And although we are not apt to give credit to informations of this nature; yet we cannot altogether think it fit to be neglected, but that it may justly add somewhat to the weight of our fears and jealousies, considering with what circumstances it is accompanied, with the Lord Digby's preceding expressions in his letter to her Majesty and Sir Lewis Drives, and your Majesty's succeeding course of withdrawing your self northwards from your Parliament, in a manner very suitable and correspondent to that evil council, which we doubt will make much deeper impression in the generality of your People; and therefore, we most humbly advise and beseech your Majesty, for the procuring and settling the confidence of your Parliament, and all your Subjects, and for the other important reasons concerning the recovery of Ireland, and securing this Kingdom, which have been formerly presented to your Majesty; you will be graciously pleased (with all convenient speed) to return to these parts, and to clothe with the counsel and desire of your Parliament, where you shall find their dutiful affections and endeavours ready to attend your Majesty with such entertainment, as shall not only give your Majesty just cause of security in their faithfulness, but other manifold evidences of their earnest intentions and endeavours to advance your Majesty's service, honour, and contentment, and to establish it upon the sure foundation of the peace and prosperity of all your Kingdoms."

This Petition was presented to the King at York, the 26th of March. He had now sent his answer to the Declaration of both Houses, and therefore mentions it in his answer to this Petition.

The King's Answer (a).

1642 IV. p. 339. "If you would have had the patience to have expected our answer to your last Declaration, (which considering the nature of it, hath not been long in coming) we believe you would have saved your selves the labour of saying much of this message; and we could wish, that our privileges in all parts were so stated, that this way of correspondence might be preserved with that freedom which hath been used of old; for we must tell you, that if you may ask any thing of us by message or petition, and in what language (how unusual soever) you think fit, and we must neither deny the thing you ask, nor give a reason why we cannot grant it, without being taxed with breaking your privileges, or being counselled by those who are enemies of the peace of the Kingdom, and favourers of the Irish rebellion (for we have seen your printed votes, upon our message from Huntington) you will reduce all our answers hereafter into a very little room: In plain English, it is to take away the freedom of our vote, which were we but a Subject were high injustice; but being your Kings, we leave all the world to judge what it is. (1.)

REMARK (1.) The Parliament supposed an imminent danger, which obliged them to act in an unusual manner, and the King supposed the Government to be in its usual and natural state. This mis-understanding continually returns in the Papers of both sides.

"Is this the way to compose all mis-understandings? We thought we shewed you one by your message of the 20th of January; if you have a better, or a readier, we shall willingly hearken to it, for hitherto you have shewed us none: But why the refusal to consent to your order, (which you call a denial of the Militia) should be any interruption to it, we cannot understand; for the Militia, (which we always thought necessary to be settled) we never denied the thing, (as we told you in our answer of the 28th of January, to the petition of the House of Commons) for we accepted the persons, (except for Corporations) we only denied the way: You ask it by way of ordinance, and with such a 1642 "preface, as we can neither with justice to our honour or innocence consent to: You exclude us from any power in the disposition, or execution of it, together with you, and for a time utterly unlimited. We tell you, we would have the thing done; allow the persons (with that exception) desire a Bill, (the only good old way of imposing on our subjects) we are extremely unsatisfied what an ordinance is; but well satisfied, that without our consent it is nothing, not binding; and it is evident, by the long time spent in this argument, the necessity and danger was not so imminent, but a Bill might have well been prepared; which, if it shall yet be done with that due regard to us, and care of our people, in the limitation of the power, and other circumstances, we shall recede from nothing we formerly expressed in that answer to your order; otherwise, we must declare to all the world, that we are not satisfied with, or shall ever allow our subjects, to be bound by your printed votes of the fifteenth or sixteenth of this month, or that under pretence of declaring what the law of the land is, you shall without us make a new law, which is plainly the case of the Militia; and what is this, but to introduce an arbitrary way of Government? (2.)

REMARK (2.) It is no wonder the King and the Parliament could not agree upon any one thing, since they reasoned upon different principles. The King supposed, that the ordering of the Militia, desired by both Houses, ought to be done after the usual manner; whereas the Parliament pretended, that the danger the Kingdom was in, and of which the King was the cause, gave them a right to demand an extraordinary regulation, wherein the King should not be concerned. On the other hand, it is manifest, the restrictions proposed by the King in this article, left him at liberty to dispute eternally, and to refuse the Bill which should be presented to him, unless it was wholly ineffectual for the designs of the Parliament.

Concerning Pym's Speech, you will have found, by what the Lord Compton, and Mr. Bainton brought from us, in answer to that message they brought to us, that as yet we rest nothing satisfied in that particular.

"As for the seditious pamphlets and sermons, we are both sorry and ashamed in so great variety, and in which our rights, honour, and authority, are so violently slighted and vilified, and in which the dignity and freedom of Parliament is so much invaded and violated, it should be asked of us to name any, the mentioning of the Protestation protested, the Apprentices Protestation, To your Tent, O Israel! or any others, would be too great an excuse for the rest: If you think them not worth your inquiry, we have done: But we think it most strange to be told, that our denial of a guard, (which we yet never denied, but granted in another manner, and under a command at that time most accustomed in the Kingdom) or the denial of any thing else, (which is in our power legally to deny) which in our understanding (of which God hath surely given us some use) is not fit to be granted, should be any excuse for so dangerous a concurrence of people; which, not only in our apprehension, but (we believe) in the interpretation of the Law itself, hath been always held most tumultuous and seditious. And we most wonder what, and from whence come the instructions and informations that those people have, who can so easily think themselves obliged by the Protestation, to assemble in such a manner, for the defence of Privileges, which cannot be so clearly known to any of them, and so negligently pass over the consideration, and defence of our Rights, so beneficial and necessary for themselves, and scarce unknown to any of them, which by their oaths of allegiance and supremacy, (and even by the same Protestation) they are at least equally obliged to defend. And what interruptions such kind of assemblies may be to the freedom of future Parliaments, (if not seasonably discontinued and suppressed) we must advise you to consider, as likewise whether both our powers may not by such means be usurped, by hands not trusted by the constitution of this Kingdom. For our guard, we refer you to our answer to that Declaration.

"By that question of violating your Laws; by which we endeavoured to express our care and resolution to observe them; we did not expect you would have been invited to have looked back to many years, for which you have had so ample reparation: Neither looked we to be reproached with the actions of our Ministers (then against the Laws) whilst we express so great a zeal for the present defence of them, it being our resolution, upon observation of the mischief which then grew by arbitrary power, (though made plausible to us by the suggestions of necessity and imminent danger; and take

(a) Without date. It was sent back by the same hands that brought the Petition. Clarendon, Tom. 1. p. 362. No. 65. Vol. II.

"you bred you fall not into the same error upon the same suggestions) hereafter to keep the rule our self, and to our power require the same from all others (3.): But above all, we must be most fenible of what you cast upon us, for requital of those good Bills you cannot deny. We have denied any such design, and as God Almighty must judge in that point between us, who knows our upright intentions at the passing those Laws: So, in the mean time, we defy the devil to prove, that there was any design (with our knowledge or privy) in or about the time of passing those Bills, that had it taken effect, could have deprived our subjects of the fruit of them: And therefore we demand full reparation in this point, that we may be cleared in the sight of all the world, and chiefly in the eyes of our loving subjects, from so notorious and false an imputation as this is.

REM. (3.) Those that undertake to vindicate King Charles's Government, during the first fifteen years of his reign, do more than ever he pretended to do himself, as appears by this clause of his answer.

"We are far from denying what you have done; for we acknowledge the charge our People have sustained in keeping the two armies, and in relieving Ireland, of which we are so fenible, that in regard of those great burthens our People have undergone, we have, and do patiently suffer those extreme personal wants, as our predecessors have been seldom put to, rather than will be pless upon them; which we hope (in time) we will be considered on your parts. (4.)

REM. (4.) The King gloried in having suffered patiently, since this Parliament, personal wants, which it had not been in his power to help.

"In our offer of a general pardon, our intent was to compose and secure the general condition of our subjects, conceiving, that in these times of great distractions, the good Laws of the Land have not been enough observed: But it is a strange world, when Princes proffered favours are accounted reproaches: Yet if you like not this our offer, we have done.

"Concerning any discourses of foreign forces, though we have given you a full answer in ours to your last Declaration, yet we must tell you, we have neither so ill an opinion of our own merit, or the affections of our good subjects, as to think our self in need of any foreign force to preserve us from oppression, (and we shall not need for any other purpose) but are confident (through God's Providence) not to want the good wishes and assistance of the whole Kingdom, being resolved to build upon that sure foundation, the law of the land. We take it very ill, that any general discourses between an unknown person and a mariner, or inferences upon letters, should be able to prevail in matters so improbable in themselves, and scandalous to us; for which we cannot but likewise ask reparation, not only for the vindicating of our own honour, but also thereby to settle the minds of our subjects, whose fears and jealousies would soon vanish, were they not fed and maintained by such false and malicious rumours as these.

"For our return to our Parliament, we have given you a full answer in ours to your Declaration, and you ought to look on us as not gone, but driven (we say not by you, yet) from you. And if it be not so easy for you to make our residence in London so safe as we could desire, we are, and will be contented, that our Parliament be adjourned to such a place, where we may be fitly and safely with you. For although we are not pleased to be at this distance, yet ye are not to expect our presence, until ye shall both secure us, concerning our just apprehensions of tumultuary insolencies; and likewise give us satisfaction for those insupportable and insolent scandals that are raised upon us. (5.)

REM. (5.) The King took care not to return to London, at a time when he was going to try to secure Hull. The terms he required for his return were so undeterminate, that they would have afforded room for a long dispute.

"To conclude, as we have, or shall not refuse any way agreeable to justice or honour, which shall be offered to us for the begetting a right understanding between us; so we are resolved, that no straits or necessities (to which we may be driven) shall ever compel us to do that, which the reason and understanding that God hath given us, and our honour and interest, with which God hath trusted us for the good of our posterity and Kingdom, shall render unpleasant and grievous unto us.

"And we assure you that (how meanly soever you are pleased to value the discharge of our publick duty) we are so conscious to our self of having done our part since this Parliament, that in whatsoever condition we now stand, we are confident of the continued protection of Almighty God, and the constant gratitude, obedience and affection of our people, and we shall trust God with us."

All these Papers were not capable of obliging the King or the Parliament to alter their measures. The Parliament was resolved to divest the King of the command of the Militia, and the King was as fully determined not to give up that point.

After this answer, both Houses sent a message to the King, directing the Lord-Keeper to inclose it in a letter to the Secretary attending his Majesty at York, to inform him that the Lord Admiral's indisposition disabling him for commanding the fleet in his own person, they had recommended to his Lordship the Earl of Warwick to supply his place. But understanding since that his Majesty had appointed for that employment Sir John Pennington, they besought him not to prefer this last to the Earl of Warwick.

The King was very angry at this message, which was not by way of petition or declaration, and sent the Lord-Keeper word, that his resolution was not to alter the person whom he had appointed. But he was not matter: for, by the connivance of [Algernon Percy] Earl of Northumberland, who was Lord-Admiral, [Robert Rich] Earl of Warwick was acknowledged commander of the fleet, against the King's will.

About the same time a Paper was dispersed, wherein the Author examined, "How Laws are to be understood, and obedience yielded? A question necessary for the present state of things touching the Militia. His Majesty (says he) is intrusted by Law with the Militia; but it is for the good and preservation of the people, and not against them. So that when there is a well-grounded suspicion that the King intends to employ the Militia against the people, he is not to be obeyed, for it is not likely that the intent of the Law is to invest the King with a power to be used against his Subjects." This is the sum of the Author's reasoning, which was properly that of both Houses. The King having perused this paper, sent a message to the Lords to require them to find out the Author of so pernicious a doctrine, and punish him according to his deserts. But he objected nothing in particular against the Author's principles and arguments.

Whilst the affair of the Militia was in agitation, the King came to the gates of Hull with some troops: but Sir John Hobham denied him admittance, as will be seen presently. It is easy to judge, this proceeding of the King served not to remove the Parliament's fears and suspicions, and the rather as having passed a Bill for settling the Militia, as the King desired, this Bill had been rejected. The affair of Hull happening shortly after, the Parliament thought there was no more ceremony to be used, imagining the King sought only to amuse them, and make them lose time. Mean while the King five or six days after his disappointment at Hull, sent a message to the Parliament, dated April the 28th, containing his reasons for not consenting to the Militia-Bill, which had been presented to him. The message was expressed in the following manner:

"WE have with great deliberation and patience weighed and considered (it concerning us much to weigh the consequences of every Law before we pass it) your Bill lately sent to us, for the settling of the Militia; and though it hath not been usual to give any reasons for our refusal to pass any Bill (it being absolutely in our power to pass or not pass, any Act sent unto us by you, if we conceive it prejudicial to our self, or inconvenient for our Subjects, for whom we are trusted, and must one day give an account;) yet in this business of the Militia, which being misunderstood amongst our good Subjects, hath been used as an argument, as if we were not vigilant enough for the publick safety: And least we should be thought less constant in our resolutions, and this Bill to be the same we sent unto you; we have thought fit to give you and all the world particular satisfaction, why we must not, ought not, cannot pass this Bill, being the first publick Bill, to our remembrance, we have refused this Parliament; and therefore we must complain, that having expressed our self so clearly and particularly to you in this point, you should press any thing upon us, which you could not but foresee that we must refuse, except we departed from those resolutions, grounded upon so much reason, which we had so earnestly before acquainted you with, and against which you have not given one argument to satisfy our judgment.

"We are pleased that you have declined the unwarrantable course of your ordinance, (to the which we are confident our good Subjects would never have yielded consent) and chosen this only right way of imposing on our people, which we would have allowed, but for the reasons hereafter mentioned.

"We refused to consent to your ordinance, as for other things, so, for that the power was put into the persons nominated therein by direction of both Houses of Parliament, excluding us from any power in the disposition 1642. "or execution of it together with you. We then advised

"you for many reasons, that a Bill should be prepared,
"and after, in our answer of the 26th of March last to
"the petition of both Houses, we told you, if such a Bill "should be prepared with that due regard to us, and care "of our people in the limitation of the power, and other "circumstances, we should recede from nothing we formerly expressed. (1.)

REMARK (1.) Whether the King was in the right or in the wrong concerning the affair of the Militia, it is certain his design at first was only to amuse the Parliament, and this is what he strives to conceal in this Article.

"What passed (enough to have discouraged us from being farther sollicitous in that argument) after our full and gracious answers, we are content to forget. When we relolved of our journey into Ireland, (so that by reason of our absence there might be no want of settling that power) besides complying with your fears, we sent, together with a message of that our purpose, a Bill for the settling that power for a year, hoping in that time to return to you; and being sure that in much less time you might do the business for which you seemed at first to desire this, which was, that you might securely consider our message of the 20th of January last. By that Bill we consented to those names which were proposed in your ordinance, and in the limitation of the power, provided that our self should not be able to execute any thing but by your advice; and when we should be out of the Kingdom, the sole execution to be in you; with many other things of so arbitrary and uncircumscribed a power, that we should not have consented to, but with reference to the absence of our own person out of the Kingdom, and thought it the more miserable, in respect the time was but for a year. Whether this be the Bill you have now sent to us to pass, let all the world judge. (2.)

REMARK (2.) The Lord Clarendon freely owns, that the King's offer to go into Ireland was all a stratagem. Since therefore the King had no design to go thither, it follows, that the Bill he had sent to both Houses, and which he pretended he should not have consented to, but with reference to his absence, was no more than an amusement. We see here, that the general limitations he had annexed to his first engagement, were not without design. He knew how to particularize them in the Bill, he sent to the Parliament, and was very sensible it would not be received with all these restrictions. Thus his aim in this clause was only to colour the pretence he had used in his first promise concerning the Militia.

"You have by this bill now tendered to us, (without taking notice of us) put the power of the whole Kingdom, the life and liberties of the Subjects of all degrees and qualities, into the hands of particular men for two years. Can you imagine we will trust such an absolute power in the hands of particular persons, which we refused to commit to both Houses of Parliament? Nay, is not the power itself too absolute, too unlimited to be committed to any private hands? Hath not Sir John Hatham's high insolence shewed us, what we may expect from an exorbitant legal power, when he by a power not warranted by law, dares venture upon a treasonable disobedience (3)? But we would willingly know, (and indeed such an account in ordinary civility we might have expected) why we are by this act absolutely excluded from any power or authority in the execution of this Militia. Sure your fears and jealousies are not of such a nature, as are capable of no other remedy, than by leaving us no power in a point of the greatest importance, in which God and the Law hath trusted us solely, and which we are contented to share with you by our bill, by putting it, and a greater, into the hands of particular Subjects? What would all Christian Princes think of us, after we had passed such a bill? How would they value our Sovereignty? And yet sure our reputation with foreign Princes, is some ground of your security: nay, we are confident, by that time you have thoroughly considered the possible consequence of the bill upon your selves, and the rest of our good Subjects, you and they will give us thanks for not consenting to it, finding their condition (had it passed) not to have been so pleasing unto them. We hope this animadversion will be no breach of your privileges in this throng of business, and distemper of affections; it is possible that second thoughts may present something to your consideration, which escaped you before.

REMARK (3.) It was but five or six days since Sir John Hatham denied him entrance into Hull (4).

"We passed this Parliament, at your entreaty, a bill concerning the Captives of Algier, and waved many objections of our own to the contrary, upon information,

"that the business had been many months considered by you. Whether it prove suitable to your intentions, or whether you have not by some private order suspended that act of Parliament, upon view of the mistakings, you best know; as likewise, what other great alterations you have made in other Bills passed this session. We cannot pass over the putting their names out of this Bill, whom before you recommended to us in your ordinance, it seems, not thinking fit to trust those who would obey no guide but the Law of the Land, (we imagine you would not with we should in our estimation of others follow that your rule;) and the leaving out by special provision the present Lord-Mayor of London, as a person in your disfavour; whereas we must tell you, his demeanour hath been such, that the city and the whole Kingdom is beholding to him for his example. (4.)

REMARK (4.) It was Sir Richard Gurney that was then Lord-Mayor of London, and entirely devoted to the King.

"To conclude, we do not find our self possessed with such an excess of power, that it is fit to transfer, or consent it should be in other persons, (as is directed by the bill;) and therefore we shall rely upon that Royal right and jurisdiction which God and the Law hath given us, for the suppressing of rebellion, and resisting foreign invasion, which hath preserved this Kingdom in the time of all our ancestors, and which, we doubt not, but we shall be able to execute; and, not more for our own honour and right, than for the liberty and safety of our People, we cannot consent to pass this bill.

The Declaration of the Lords and Commons concerning his Majesty's last message about the Militia.

THE Lords and Commons holding it necessary for the peace and safety of this Kingdom, to settle the Militia thereof, did, for that purpose, prepare an ordinance of Parliament, and with all humility did present the same to his Majesty for his Royal assent; who, notwithstanding the faithful advice of his Parliament, and the several reasons offered by them of the necessity thereof, for the securing of his Majesty's person, and the peace and safety of his People, did refuse to give his consent; and thereupon they were necessitated, in discharge of the trust reposed in them, as the representative body of the Kingdom, to make an ordinance by authority of both Houses, to settle the Militia warranted thereunto by the fundamental Laws of the Land: (1.)

REMARK (1.) This fundamental Law was no other than the Law of Nature, which allows every man to provide for his own defence when he sees himself exposed to danger, and such was the case the Parliament supposed themselves in. For otherwise there was no positive Law which gave this power to the two Houses of Parliament. His Majesty taking notice thereof, did by several messages invite them to settle the same by Act of Parliament; affirming, in his Majesty's message sent in answer to the petition of both Houses presented to his Majesty at York, March 26, that he always thought it necessary the same should be settled, and that he never denied the thing, only denied the way; and for the matter of it, took exceptions only to the preface, as a thing not standing with his honour to consent to, and that himself was excluded in the execution, and for a time unlimited: Whereupon the Lords and Commons, being desirous to give his Majesty all satisfaction that might be, even to the least title of form and circumstance; and when his Majesty was pleased to offer them a Bill ready drawn, did, for no other cause, than to manifest their hearty affection to comply with his Majesty's desires, and obtain his consent, entertain the same; in the mean time no way declining their ordinance, and to express their earnest zeal to correspond with his Majesty's desire, (in all things that might consist with the peace and safety of the Kingdom, and the trust reposed in them) did pass that Bill, and therein omitted the preamble inserted before the ordinance, limited the time to less than two years, and confined the authority of the Lieutenants to these three particulars, namely, Rebellion, Insurrection and foreign Invasion, and returned the same to his Majesty for his royal assent: But all these expressions of affection and loyalty, all those desires and earnest endeavours to comply with his Majesty, hath (to their great grief and sorrow) produced no better effect than an absolute denial, even of that which his Majesty by his former messages, as we conceive, had promised; the advice of evil and wicked councils receiving still more credit with him than that of his great Council of Parliament, in a matter of so high importance, that the safety of his Kingdom, and the peace of his People depends upon it. (2.)

REMARK (2.) If the King on his part supposed the

(1) The Lord Clarendon places this Message before the Kings going to Hull. See Tom. 1. p. 396.

1642. Government to be in its natural state, and that consequently he ought to enjoy all his Prerogatives, the Parliament made here a supposition which was not liable to fewer objections. That is, in the present juncture, the King ought to consider them as his great Council, and be guided by their directions.

"But now what must be the exceptions to this Bill? Not any, sure, that were to the ordinance; for a care was taken to give satisfaction in all these particulars. Then the exception was, because that the disposing and execution thereof was referred to both Houses of Parliament, and his Majesty excluded; and now that by the Bill the power and execution is ascertained, and reduced to particulars, and the Law of the realm made the rule thereof, his Majesty will not trust the Persons. The power is too great, too unlimited to trust them with. (3.)

R. E. M. (3.) The Parliament pretends to show here that they had regarded the King's complaints, and yet the King had refused to pass the Bill. They own that one of his Majesty's complaints against the ordinance was his being wholly excluded from having any thing to do in settling the Militia. To show therefore that the King had reason to be satisfied with the Bill, it should have been said, And now that by the Bill he is joined in the execution with the two Houses. But instead of this, they say, And now that the execution is ascertained, and the Law of the Realm made the rule. It is easy to see that this is not the direct contrary to the King's complaint.

"But what is that power? Is it any other, but in express terms to suppress rebellion, insurrection, and foreign invasion? And who are those persons? Are they not such as were nominated by the great Council of the Kingdom, and assented to by his Majesty? And is it too great a power to trust those persons with the suppression of rebellion, insurrection, and foreign invasion? Surely the most wicked of them that advised his Majesty to this answer, cannot suggest, but that it is necessary for the safety of his Majesty's Royal person, and the peace of the Kingdom, such a power should be put in some hands, and there is no pretence of exception to the persons: His Majesty, for the space of above fifteen years together, thought not a power far exceeding this to be too great to intrust particular persons with, to whose will the lives and liberties of his People by martial Laws were made subject; for such was the Power given to Lord-Lieutenants and Deputy-Lieutenants in every county of this Kingdom, and that without the consent of his People, or authority of Law: but now in case of extreme necessity, upon advice of both Houses of Parliament, for no longer space than two years, a lesser power, and that for the safety of the King and People, is thought too great to trust particular persons with, though named by both Houses of Parliament, and approved of by his Majesty himself. And surely, if there be a necessity to settle the Militia (which his Majesty was pleased to consent) the persons cannot be trusted with less power than this, to have it at all effectual: And the precedents of former ages, when there happened a necessity to raise such a power, never strained that power to a narrow compass; witness the Commissions of Array in several Kings reigns, and often issued out by the consent and authority of Parliament. The Lords and Commons therefore, intrusted with the safety of the Kingdom, and peace of the People (which they call God to witness is their only aim) finding themselves denied these their so necessary and just demands, and that they can never be discharged before God and man, if they should suffer the safety of the Kingdom, and peace of the People, to be exposed to the malice of the malignant party at home, or the fury of enemies from abroad; and knowing no other way to encounter the imminent and approaching danger, but by putting the people into a fit posture of defence, do resolve to put their said ordinance in present execution, and do require all persons in authority, by virtue of the said ordinance, forthwith to put the same in execution, and all others to obey it, according to the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom in such cases, as they tender the upholding of the true Protestant Religion, the safety of his Majesty's person, and his royal posterity, the peace of the Kingdom, and the being of this Common-wealth.

His Majesty's Answer to the Parliament's Declaration (a).

Rushworth. IV. p. 547. c. placed us) to take notice, much more to trouble our self with answering those many scandalous, seditious, pamphlets, and printed papers, which are scattered with 1642. "such great licence throughout the Kingdom, (notwithstanding our earnest desire, to often in vain pressed for a reformation) though we find it evident, that the minds of many of our weak Subjects have been, and still are, poisoned by those means, and that so general a terror hath possessed the minds and hearts of all men, that while the Presses swarm, (and every day produceth new Tracts against the established Government of the Church and State) most men want the courage, or the conscience, to write, or the opportunity and encouragement to publish, such composed, sober animadversions, as might either preserve the minds of our good Subjects from such infection, or restore and recover them when they are so infected; but we are contented to let our self fall to any office, that may undeceive our people, and to take more pains this way by our own pen, than ever King hath done, when we find any thing that seems to carry the authority or reputation of either, or both Houses of Parliament, and will not have the same refused, or disputed, by common and vulgar pens, till we are thoroughly informed, whether those acts have in truth, that countenance and warrant they pretend; which regard of ours, we doubt not but in time, will recover that due reverence, (the absence whereof we have too much reason to complain of) to our person, and our messages, which in all ages hath been paid, (and no doubt is due) to the Crown of England.

"We have therefore taken notice of a printed paper, intitled, A Declaration of both Houses of Parliament, in answer to our last message concerning the Militia, published by command; the which we are unwilling to believe, (both for the matter of it, the expressions in it, and the manner of publishing it) can result from the consent of both Houses; neither do we know, by what lawful command such uncomely, irreverent mention of us, can be published to the world. And though Declarations of this kind have of late, (with too much boldness) broken in upon us, and the whole Kingdom, when one, or both Houses, have thought fit to communicate their counsels and resolutions to the people; yet we are unwilling to believe, that such a Declaration as this, should be published in answer to our message, without vouchsafing at least to send it to us as their answer. Their business, for which they are met by our writ and authority, being to counsel us, for the good of our people, not to write against us to our people, and no consent of ours for their long continuing together, enabling them to do any thing, but what they were first summoned by our writ to do: At least we will believe, though mis-understanding and jealousy, (the justice of God will overtake the lamenters of that jealousy, and the promoters and contrivers of that mis-understanding) might produce, (to say no worse) those very untoward expressions, that if those Houses had contrived that Declaration, as an answer to our message, they would have vouchsafed some answer to the question proposed in ours; which we professed did, and must evidently, prevail over our understanding; and in their wisdom and gravity, they would have been free to have stated the matters of fact, as (at least to ordinary understandings) might be unquestionable; neither of which is done by that Declaration.

"We desire to know, why we were by that act absolutely excluded from any power or authority in the execution of the Militia; and we must appeal to all the world, whether such an attempt be not a greater and juster ground for fear and jealousy in us, than any one that is avowed for those destructive fears and jealousies, which are so publicly owned, almost to the ruin of the Kingdom. But we have been told, That we must not be jealous of our great Council of both Houses of Parliament; we are not, no more than they are of us, their King; and as hitherto they have not avowed any jealousy of, or disaffection to, our person; imputed all to our evil Counsellors, to a malignant party, that are not of their minds; so we do (and we do it from our soul) profess no jealousy of our Parliament, but some turbulent, seditious, and ambitious natures, which (being not so clearly discerned) may have an influence, even upon the actions of both Houses. And if this Declaration hath passed by such consent (which we are not willing to believe) it is not impossible, but that the apprehension of such tumults, which have driven us from the City of London, for the safety of our person, may make such an impression in other men, (not able to remove from the danger) to make their consent, or not to own a dissent in matters not agreeable to their conscience or understanding.

"We mentioned, in that our answer, our dislike of

“ the putting their names out of the bill, whom before
 “ they recommended to us, in their pretended Ordinance;
 “ and the leaving out, by special provision, the present
 “ Lord-Mayor of London; to all which, the Declaration “ affords no answer to that our message, and therefore we “ cannot suppose it was intended for an answer to that “ our message; which, whosoever looks upon, will find
 “ to be in no degree answered by that Declaration.

“ But it informs all our Subjects, after the mention with “ what humility the Ordinance was prepared, and pre“ sented to us, (a matter very evident in the petitions and “ messages concerning it) and our refusal to give our con“ sent, notwithstanding the several reasons offered of the “ necessity thereof, for the securing of our person, and the “ peace and safety of our people, (whether any such rea“ sons were given, the weight of them, and whether they “ were not clearly and candidly answered by us, the “ world will easily judge) and that they were at last ne“ cessitated to make an Ordinance by authority of both “ Houses to settle the Militia, warranted thereunto by the “ fundamental Laws of the Land: But if that Declara“ tion had indeed intended to have answered us, it would “ have told our good Subjects what those fundamental “ Laws of the Land are, and where to be found; and “ would at least have mentioned one ordinance, from the “ first beginning of Parliaments to this present Parliament, “ which endeavoured to impose any thing upon the Subjects “ without the King's consent; for of such, all the inquiry
 “ we can make could never produce us one instance (1):

REMARK (1.) The King and the Parliament equally abused the Term, fundamental Law. The Parliament gave the name of fundamental Law to the trust placed in them by the People, which obliged the two Houses to take care of the publick safety, when the Kingdom was in danger, which was not properly a Law. The King, on his side, would own none for fundamental, but positive, express, and particular Laws upon the case in question, and required such to be produced. It is easy for unbiassed persons to solve this difficulty. If it is supposed with the Parliament, that the King intended to establish an arbitrary Government, it is certain the Parliament had a right to oppose it, by virtue of the trust put in them by the People, and as the representative body of the Nation; and in such case it might be said, they were supported by a fundamental Law, or something equivalent. But if it is supposed with the King, that the Government was in its ordinary and natural state, and there was no reason to suspect him, it is certain, the Parliament had no right to meddle with the Militia, without the King's consent. The whole consists therefore in the truth or falsehood of these two suppositions.

“ And if there be such a secret of the Law, which “ hath lain hid from the beginning of the world to this “ time, and now is discovered, to take away the just, legal “ power of the King, we with there be not some other “ secret (to be discovered when they please) for the ruin
 “ and destruction of the liberty of the Subject: For, no “ doubt, if the votes of both Houses have any such author“ ity to make a new Law, it hath the same authority
 “ to repeal the old, and then what will become of the long “ established rights and liberties of the King and Subject,
 “ and particularly of Magna Charta, will be easily dis“ cerned by the most ordinary understanding. (2.)

REMARK (2.) Never were the Liberties of the People in more danger of being destroyed than in the reign of Charles I., notwithstanding Magna Charta, and the Laws of the Land. So, whatever the King said against the Parliament, was no less strong against himself. Besides, his reasoning could suffice but in virtue of the supposition mentioned in the foregoing article, which was very far from being proved.

“ It is true, we did (out of the tenderneſs of the Con“ stitution of the Kingdom, and care of the Law which “ we are bound to defend, and being most assured of the “ unjustifiableness of the pretended ordinance) invite and “ desire both our Houses of Parliament, to settle whatso“ ever should be fit of that nature by Act of Parliament;
 “ but were we therefore obliged to pass whatsoever should “ be brought to us of that kind? We did say, in our an“ ſwer to the Petition of both Houses, presented to us at “ York the 26th of March last, (and we have said the same
 “ in other messages before) that we always thought it neces-“ ſary, the business of the Militia should be settled, and “ that we never denied the thing, only denied the way;
 “ and we say the same still, since the many disputes and “ votes upon Lord-Lieutenants and their commissions “ (which were begun by us or our Father) had so dis-“ countenanced that authority; which for many years to“ gether was happily looked upon with reverence and obe“ dience for the People. We did, and do think it very “ necessary, that some wholesome Law be provided for that “ business; but we declared, in our answer to the pre-
 “ No. 65. VOL. II.

“ tended ordinance, we expected that that necessary power “ should be first invested in us, before we contented to “ transfer it to other men (3): Neither could it ever be “ imagined, that we could consent, that a greater power “ should be in the hands of a Subject, than we were “ thought worthy to be trusted with our self. And if it “ shall not be thought fit to make a new act or declaration
 “ in this point, we doubt not but we shall be able to grant “ such commissions, which shall very legally enable those “ we trust, to do all offices for the peace and quiet of the “ Kingdom, if any disturbance shall happen.

REMARK (3.) There was no occasion to invest the King with power to suppress rebellions and insurrections, and repel invasions, in order to his transferring that power to others, since he was of course invested with it. But the King endeavours to colour his denial by representing that power as exorbitant.

“ But that Declaration saith, we were pleased to offer “ them a Bill ready drawn; and that they, (to express “ their earnest zeal to correspond with our desire) did pass
 “ that Bill; yet all that expression of affection and Loyalty, “ all that earnest desire of theirs to comply with us, pro“ duced no better effect than an absolute denial, even of what
 “ by our former messages (as that Declaration conceives) we “ had promised; and so proceeds (under the pretence of “ mentioning evil and wicked councils) to censure and re“ proach us, in a dialect, that we are confident our good “ subjects will read with much indignation on our behalf.
 “ But sure, if that Declaration had passed the examina“ tion of both Houses of Parliament, they would never “ have affirmed, that the Bill we refused to pass was the “ same we sent to them, or have thought that our mes“ sage, wherein the difference and contrariety between the “ two Bills is so particularly set down, would be answered “ with the bare averring them to be one and the same “ Bill; no more would they have declared (when our “ exceptions to the ordinance and the Bill are notoriously “ known to all our people) that care being taken to give “ satisfaction in all the particulars we had excepted against “ in the ordinance, we had found new Exceptions to the “ Bill: And yet this very Declaration confesses, that our “ exception to the ordinance was, that in the disposing “ and execution thereof, we were excluded; and was not “ this an express reason in our answer for refusal of the “ Bill, which this Declaration will needs confute? But the “ power was no other than to suppress rebellion, insur“ rection, and foreign invasion; and the persons trusted no
 “ other than such as were nominated by the great Coun“ cil of the Kingdom, and assented to by us; and that “ Declaration asks, if that be too great a power to trust “ these persons with? Indeed, while so great liberty is “ used in voting and declaring men to be enemies to the “ Commonwealth, (an English phrase we scarcely under“ stand) and in censuring men for their service and at“ tendance upon our person, and in our lawful commands, “ great heed must be taken into what hands we commit “ such a power to suppress insurrection and rebellion; and “ if insurrection and rebellion have found other definitions, “ than what the Law hath given them, we must be sure “ that no lawful power shall justify those definitions; and if “ there be learning found out to make Sir John Holt and “ taking arms against us, and keeping our town and fort
 “ from us, no Treason and Rebellion, we know not whe“ ther a new discovery may not find it rebellion in us to “ defend ourselves from such arms, and so endeavour to “ recover what is so taken from us (4); and therefore it “ concerns us, (till the known Law of the Land be al“ lowed to be judge between us) to take heed into what “ hands we commit such power.

REMARK (4.) The King always reasoned upon the supposition that the Government was in its natural state, and that there was no cause to suspect him, a supposition which was not granted.

“ Besides, can it be thought, that because we are wil“ ling to trust certain persons, that we are obliged to trust “ them in whatsoever they are willing to be trusted?
 “ We say, no private hands are fit for such a trust; nei“ ther have we departed from any thing (in the least de“ gree) we offered, or promised before; though we might “ with as much reason have withdrawn our trust from some “ persons we before had excepted, as they did from others “ whom they recommended. For the power which we “ are charged to have committed to particular persons, for “ the space of fifteen years by our commissions of Lieu-“ tenancy, it is notoriously known, that it was not a “ power created by us, but continued very many years,
 “ and in the most happy times this Kingdom hath en“ joyed; even those of our renowned predecessors Queen “ Elizabeth, and our Father of happy memory (5); and “ whatever authority was granted by those Commissions, “ which were kept in the old forms, the same was de“ termined at our pleasure, and we know not, that they

R. & M. (5). The example of King James I. is no good evidence. I very much question that in times of Peace, Queen Elizabeth ever made her Subjects liable to be tried by martial Law.

"For the precedents of former ages in the commissions of Array, we doubt not, but when any such are issued out, that the King's consent was always obtained, and the commissions determinable at his pleasure, and then what the extent of power was, will be nothing applicable to this case of the ordinance.

"But whether that Declaration hath refused our reasons for out refusal to pass the Bill, or no, it hath resolved and required all persons in authority, thereby to put the Ordinance in present execution, and all others to obey it according to the fundamental Laws of the Land. But we, whom God hath trusted to maintain and defend those fundamental Laws (which we hope, he will bless to secure us,) do declare, that there is no legal Power in either, or both Houses, upon any pretence whatsoever, without our consent, to command any part of the Militia of this Kingdom; nor hath the like ever been commanded by either or both Houses, since the first foundation of the Laws of the Land; and that the execution of, or the obedience to, that pretended ordinance, is against the fundamental Laws of the Land, against the liberty of the Subject, and the right of Parliaments, and a high crime in any that shall henceforth execute the same. And we do therefore charge and command all our loving Subjects, of what degree or quality soever, upon their allegiance, and as they tender the peace of this Kingdom, from henceforth, not to muster, levy, array, summon, or warn any of our train'd-bands to rise, muster, or march, by virtue, or under colour of that pretended Ordinance. And to this Declaration and Command of ours, we expect and require full submission and obedience from all our loving Subjects, upon their allegiance, as they will answer the contrary at their perils; and as they tender the upholding of the true Protestant Religion, the safety of our Person, and our Royal Posterity, the peace and being of this Kingdom."

Having given most of the Papers, published on both sides, concerning the Militia, I shall endeavour, for the Reader's better information, to illustrate a little more fully, the ground of the quarrel between the King and the Parliament, which could be done but very briefly, in my short remarks on several passages of these Papers.

The State of the Question between the King and the Parliament.

The Parliament did not deny, that in the ordinary course of the Government, the right of settling the Militia, and appointing those who were to command it under him, was solely in the King (1). But they affirmed, that in the present extraordinary case, it was incumbent on them to take care the Kingdom perished not by the King's fault. The case they supposed was this, the King, for the space of fifteen years, had endeavoured to establish an absolute Government, and had actually established it on divers occasions: He had pretended, that he might govern without Parliaments, and accordingly, had called none for twelve years together; during which interval, he had violated sundry Laws, and ruled after an arbitrary manner. Being forced by the necessity of his affairs to call this present Parliament, he had seemed to acknowledge the injustice of his former conduct, by giving his consent to the good Acts made for the redress of past, and the prevention of future, grievances. But at the very time that he expressed so great condescension for his Subjects, and an outward repentance for his faults, he ceased not to devise means to become absolute as before. The Parliament inferred from this his conduct, that the King's condescension was only apparent; that at the first opportunity, he would revoke the Acts he had consented to, and which he affected to term always, Acts of grace, though they were really Acts of justice. Consequently, it was necessary to put it out of his power to recede from what he had done, if he should desire it. The only way to hinder such a design, was to put the Militia of the Kingdom into safe hands, who should not depend upon the King, and prevent him from having any power over the Militia, for fear this power, either in him alone, or jointly with the two Houses, might enable him to break all the measures which should be taken, to hinder the execution of his designs.

It is manifest, the Parliament was in the right or the wrong, according as their supposition was true or false. Let it be granted for a moment, that their supposition was well-grounded, and that the King had really a design to render himself absolute; ought the Parliament, out of pure respect to the ancient Laws, leave the King a power which enabled him to alter the constitution of the Government, and subvert once more these very Laws, wherein the safety of the People entirely consisted? Is it not evident, that in such a case, it was necessary to violate these Laws, in order to establish them more firmly? When therefore the King objected to the Parliament, the Laws which gave the Kings of England certain Prerogatives, he manifestly supposed the Government to be in its natural state; but the Parliament supposed the contrary. Consequently, the King's arguments could not make any impression, because they were not applicable to the case supposed by the Parliament. Unfortunately, the King was forced to use against the Parliament, the very reasons alleged formerly by the Parliament and People against him, when he usurped an absolute power. He complained, that the Parliament founded their right upon a pretended necessity which was never proved, and himself had formerly made use of a necessity still more imaginary, to impose arbitrary taxes without the consent of Parliament, contrary to the laws of the land.

But if, on the other hand, we suppose the Parliament's suspicions to be chimerical, and that the King never gave any room for them, at least, since the beginning of this Parliament, and that his intention to govern according to law, was sincere, it is certain, his arguments from the laws, customs, royal prerogatives, were invincible, because in that case, there would not have been any the least just pretence to divest him of his rights. The whole question therefore was reduced to this single point, Whether the King was sincere, and his word to be relied on? But unhappily for him, a fifteen years experience had convinced most of his subjects, that he would have established an arbitrary Government; the motives of his condescension in the Acts passed this Parliament, were dubious, and his protestations with regard to the future, uncertain. Thus the Parliament had a great advantage over him, because they had for warrant of their suspicions, the past, which was but too certain, whereas the King could only offer the future, which had not the same certainty.

It was time for the declarations, answers, and replies concerning the Militia, to end, since there was nothing new to be said on that subject. Besides, the Parliament's ordinance was now executing in all places, where the People were willing to obey it. At last, May the 27th, the King published a Proclamation, forbidding to execute the ordinance of the Parliament, on pain to offenders, of being declared disturbers of the public peace (2). The Parliament on their part, published a declaration, forbidding all persons to obey the King's proclamation, as being contrary to the laws. As this might appear very strange, both Houses grounded their prohibition upon reasons, of which I shall only relate the substance, because, flowing from the principles above-mentioned, it is easy to conceive them. They said therefore:

"That the question is not, whether it belong to the King or no, to refrain the levying of the Militia; but if the King shall refuse to discharge that duty and trust, whether there be not a power in the two Houses to provide for the safety of the Parliament, and peace of the Kingdom? That though the law affirms that power to be in the King, it does not exclude those in whom the law hath placed a power for that purpose, as in the Courts of Justice; yet can it not be restrained by his Majesty's command, by his Great Seal, or otherwise; much less can the power of Parliament be concluded by his Majesty's command.

"That though the King is the fountain of justice and protection, yet the acts of justice and protection are not exercised in his own person, but by his courts and his ministers; who must do their duty therein, though the King, in his own person, should forbid them; and therefore, if judgments should be given by them against the King's will, and personal command, yet are they the King's judgments. Thus also, the High-Court of Parliament declares the King's pleasure in those things that are requisite thereunto, and what they do herein hath the stamp of royal authority, although his Majesty do in his own person oppose or interrupt the same: For the King's supreme and royal pleasure, is exercised and declared in this High-Court of Law and Council, after a

(1) The Commons were divided in their Opinions about this point: Some affirming, "That the power of the Militia was solely in the King, and ought to be left to him, and that the Parliament never did, nor ought, to meddle with the same." And others, "That the King had not this power in him, but that it was solely in the Parliament, and that if the King refused to order the same according to the advice of the Parliament, that then they by the Law might do it without him." See Relick, p. 55.

(2) The King grounded this Proclamation on a Statute, made in the 7th of Edward I. whereby it was enacted, "That to the King it belongeth, by his Royal signifying, straightly to defend wearing of Armour, and all other force, against the Peace, at all times, when it shall please him, and to punish them which shall do contrary." See Relick, Tom. 4. p. 550.

"That by the constitution and policy of this Kingdom, the King by his proclamation cannot declare the Law, contrary to the judgment and resolution of any of the inferior Courts of Justice, much less against the High-Court of Parliament; for if it were admitted, that the King by his proclamation may declare a law, thereby his Proclamations will in effect become Laws, which would turn to the subverting of the law of the land, and the rights and liberties of the Subjects."

These are the principal arguments alleged by the Parliament, to show, that the King's proclamation was contrary to the laws. But there was a very manifest defect in this reasoning. They represented the two Houses as alone composing the Parliament, whereas it is certain, the Parliament is composed of the King and both Houses, joined together and making but one body. What the Parliament said is therefore strictly true, if the word Parliament be understood in the sense I have mentioned, as a body consisting of the King and the two Houses. For, the King cannot, by his sole will, subvert what has been ordained by the Parliament, because himself making a part, and the noblest part of the Parliament, he would contradict himself, in forbidding a thing he had already ordained. But if by the Parliament be meant the two Houses alone, without the King, it cannot be said that their declarations are the King's, or that they are more solemn and obligatory than the King's private will. For if they were, the constitution of the Government would be entirely overthrown. This is so true, that by retorting the argument alleged by both Houses against the King, it might be demonstrated by the same reason, that they have power to make laws without the concurrence of the King, which would be full as true, as their saying, that the King's proclamations would be so many laws. It is therefore certain, that by the arguments, they alleged against the King's proclamation, they furnished invincible reasons against their own ordinance. Nevertheless, upon this sophistry it was that they grounded all the authority they assumed to themselves afterwards. They did themselves therefore great injury, by relying on such weak arguments. Their right solely consisted in the supposition, that the King would have altered the constitution of the Government, which they had a lawful power to oppose by extraordinary methods, since the laws of the land, instead of affording them effectual remedies, countenanced rather the King's designs. The King, on his part, founded his right upon the contrary supposition, namely, that there was no danger from him; but that the Parliament had undertaken to subvert the constitution of Church and State. Such was then the melancholy situation of England.

I have related without interruption the affair of the Militia, which lasted however several months, that I might not be obliged to break the thread of the narration; this affair being of the utmost importance, since it was the most immediate cause of the civil wars which quickly ensued: but it was not the only affair during that time. Wherefore, it will be necessary to go back to the time when I began to speak of the Militia, to see other affairs, no less material, and whereof some contributed no less to the rupture.

The King having passed in February the two Acts, so earnestly desired by the Commons, namely, for the exclusion of the Bishops (1), and for pressing of Soldiers, sent the following message to both Houses:

"That his having passed these two Bills, being of so great importance, and so earnestly desired by both Houses, will serve to assure his Parliament, that he desires nothing more than the satisfaction of his Kingdom; yet, that he may further manifest to both Houses how impatient he is, till he find out a full remedy to compose the present differences, he is pleased to signify:

"That he will by Proclamation require, that all statutes made concerning Recusants, be with all care, diligence, and severity, put in execution.

"That his Majesty is resolved, that the seven condemned Priests shall be immediately banished, if his Parliament shall consent therunto: And he will give present order, that a Proclamation issue to require all Romish Priests

"within twenty days to depart the Kingdom; and if any shall be apprehended after that time, his Majesty affures both Houses, on the word of a King, that he will grant no pardon to any such, without content of his Parliament."

"And because great and different troubles are observed to arise, concerning the Government and Liturgy of the Church, his Majesty declares, That he will refer that whole consideration to his Parliament: But desires not to be pressed to any single Act on his part, till the whole be so digested and settled by both Houses, that his Majesty may clearly see what is fit to be left, as well as what is fit to be taken away."

"For Ireland, he will not refuse to venture his own person in that war, if his Parliament shall think it convenient, for the reduction of that Kingdom."

"That he will most readily concur in any resolution their wisdoms shall find out, which may conduce to promote the trade of the Kingdom."

The two Houses contented themselves with thanking his Majesty for passing the two Bills, without returning any answer upon the other points.

The Queen being misinformed that there was a design to accuse her of High-Treason, the Parliament had notice of it, and sent [the Earl of Newport and the Lord Seymour] to vindicate themselves from this aspersion. The Queen answered, it was true, there was such a report, but that she gave little credit to it.

Some letters of the Lord Digby, directed to the Queen, to Sir Lewis Dives his Brother-in-law, and to Secretary Nicholas (2) being intercepted, the Parliament caused them to be opened. It was found, that the Lord Digby, who was then at Middleburgh in Zealand, advised the King to betake himself to a safe place, and desired the Queen to send him a cypher, that he might hold a correspondence with her. There were also in the letters some sharp expressions against the Parliament. The two Houses sent copies of these letters to their Majesties, assuring them, that they were far from reflecting any thing upon the Queen, only they besought her not to correspond with the Lord Digby. Some days after, it was resolved by the Commons, that the Lord Digby should be accused of high-treason.

February the 24th, a message was sent from both Houses to his Majesty, to acquaint him with the reason why they desired, that the Prince of Wales should reside at Hampton-Court. The chief was, that the Prince's removal might be a cause to promote jealousies and fears in the minds of his Subjects. For the Parliament lost no opportunity to let the people see, there was occasion to be alarmed. The King intimated to them by his answer, that he did not think himself accountable for his conduct with regard to the Prince his Son; and concluded with saying, "He could not imagine from what grounds these fears and jealousies proceeded; but if any information had been given to that purpose, he desired the same might be examined to the bottom; and then hoped their fears would be hereafter continued only with reference to his rights and honour."

About the same time, proposals were made to the Parliament, for the speedy raising of money for the reduction of Ireland. These proposals were, that to such persons as should be willing to advance money for that service, should be allotted, according to a certain proportion, the Rebels lands that should be confiscated, which was approved of by both Houses, and an Act passed accordingly, to which the King gave the royal assent (3).

The Queen departed for Holland about the end of February.

March the 16th, the King being at Stanford in his way to York, issued a Proclamation, for strictly executing the Laws against Papists. This Proclamation was very needful, and served only to show, that hitherto these Laws had been ill executed. But the King had a mind thereby to repel the imputation of his protecting and countenancing the Catholics, so much insisted upon by his enemies among the people, as if this protection was a proof of his design to introduce Popery (4).

The King, as I said, intended to secure Hull, with the Magazine there; but his intention was yet a secret, and to buy arms and ammunition, to retire to York himself, and to try to secure Hull, though he coloured his designs with other pretences. He saw that the Parliament reckoned among the pretended malignants, not only such as openly appeared for the King, but also those who were for preserving any moderation, and that many suffered themselves to be drawn into the same Plot, out of fear, and because they could not be secure of protection, in case they declared against the two Houses. He thought therefore, he should chiefly endeavour to render himself able to protect those who dared to espouse his cause openly. But moreover, as the Parliament never ceased to infuse suspicions into the People, it was absolutely necessary for the King to try to efface these impressions, so prejudicial to him. Hence flowed, in all the Papers published by him concerning the Militia, those frequent expressions of his affection for his people, and his attachment to the Laws. His aim was to show the Nation, that the Parliament acted directly contrary to law, in usurping an authority which belonged not to them. As it was by the very same thing that the King had given occasion to the People to be prejudiced against him, he hoped, the usurpations of the Parliament would produce the same effect. But herein he was much mistaken. The People were perverted, that the King, without any provocation, had invaded the privileges of the Subject, during the first fifteen years of his Reign, whereas if the Parliament had in any thing incoerced upon the rights of the King, it was in maintenance of the Nation's liberties, and for the revival of the laws.

Though it was hard to prove by unquestionable evidence, that the King had formed the project of seizing, at once, the Tower of London, Portsmouth, and Hull, there were however too great signs of it, that it would have been very imprudent in the Parliament, not to think of securing those places in the present situation of affairs. Sir John Byron Lieutenant of the Tower, was a man devoted to the King. The Earl of Newcastle had been sent to Hull, under a borrowed name, and information was given, that he would have perverted the Mayor, to deliver that place to him. As for Portsmouth, the journey the Queen was to take thither on some pretence, and the meeting of the officers at Kingston, were more than sufficient to breed strong suspicions on that account. In short, the Lord Clarendon freely owns the King's designs upon Portsmouth and Hull, though he mentions not the Tower. Had these designs succeeded, the King would have been master of the three principal forts of the Kingdom, with the magazines of the Tower and Hull, and thereby enabled to subdue the Parliament. These projects failing, as I have said, the King endeavoured, as well as he could, to flatter them, and make them pass for imaginary. But the two Houses judged otherwise of them. Accordingly, the Commons never rested till the Lieutenantcy of the Tower was given to one they could confide in, and Hotham sent to Hull. As for Portsmouth, the Parliament not mistrusting Goring the Governor, because he was the person that discovered the Plot to seduce the army, were contented with sending him sufficient orders, as they thought, for the preservation of the place. From that time, there was no more mention of Portsmouth, for the King found means to gain Colonel Goring, who promised to declare for him at a proper time, as he did accordingly.

Notwithstanding the King's ill success in his secret undertaking, he persisted in his design to free himself, by force, from the slavery to which it was intended to reduce him, perceiving, it would be impossible for him to succeed any other way. To this end, doubtless, he sent the Queen to Holland, and having but little money to give her, put into her hands the Crown-Jewels, which were used in buying arms and ammunition. If the Queen's voyage had been only to conduct the Princess Mary to the Prince her spouse, and to drink the waters of the Spa, there would have been no occasion to give her wherewithal to buy arms and ammunition. Very probably, therefore, the King from this time thought of war, whether it were offensive or defensive only. But his attempt upon Hull, where was a magazine of arms for sixteen thousand men, is a still clearer evidence. The King himself had caused these arms to be brought to Hull, when he had resolved to make war upon Scotland.

When the Parliament sent Sir John Hotham down to Hull, the King complained not of it, whether he was apprehensive of being reproached with attempting to secure that place, or to amuse the Parliament, and hinder them from taking greater precautions. Mean while, both Houses finding the King at a distance from London, and fearing for Hull, on account of the magazine there, petitioned him, to order the magazine to be removed to the Tower of London. The King answered, "He rather expected, that both Houses would have given him an account, why a governor and garrison had been placed in Hull, without his knowledge, than to be moved to consent for the removal to the Tower of a magazine (which were his own proper goods) upon such general reasons, as gave no satisfaction to his judgment: That in short, he would not agree to the removal of these arms, till he knew for what service they were intended: And if any attempt should be made in this matter without his approbation, he should esteem it as the greatest violation of his Right." A little after, some Gentlemen of the County of York petitioned the King, that the magazine might not be removed, by reason they conceived the Kingdom, and particularly the North, to be in danger. This petition was probably begged, since affairs were not yet in such a situation, that private persons should dare to present an address to the King, directly contrary to that of the Parliament, had they not been encouraged thereto. It is certain, the King intended to seize Hull, with the magazine. He was desirous to have a place, which would enable him to protect his adherents, and depended upon this magazine, to arm them in due time. This was the cause of his refusing to remove the arms to the Tower, though he alledged other reasons. The Parliament also, on their part, urged for the removal, reasons that were not the true ones. At last, finding the King would not consent to it, they ordered most of the magazine to be brought to the Tower without asking his approbation any more.

The King and the Parliament used all possible endeavours to make the people believe, that in all their proceedings, they had no other motive than their good, and the Kingdom's advantage. From these protestations it is, that the Historians take their strongest arguments to demonstrate the innocence and sincerity of the party, whose cause they undertake to support. But the impartial Reader must peruse the Manifestoes, and all the Papers of that kind, with great caution, for fear of being drawn into error. It is certain, the King intended to become master of Hull, that he might not be at the Parliament's mercy. But it is not so certain, that herein his view was only to maintain the constitution of the Government, that the laws might be punctually executed. On the other hand, the Parliament had sent Hotham to Hull, to hinder the King from seizing the town. But who can affirm, that their real aim was to prevent the malignant party from making use of it, to establish an arbitrary power, and inflame the Kingdom?

The King's design broke out the 23d of April, when the affair of the Militia was agitated with great heat on both sides. The day before, he had sent to Hull the Duke of York his second Son, with the young Elector Palatine his Nephew, under colour of seeing the place, and very likely these two Princes had a pretty numerous retinue. Hotham and the Mayor received them with all the respect due to their rank. The Princes were entertained the first day by the Mayor, and invited to dine with the Governor on the morrow, being St. George's-day. But the entertainment was disturbed by an officer [Sir Lewis Dives] who came a little before dinner, and told the Governor, that his Majesty intended to dine with him, being then within four miles of the town, with a train of above three hundred Horse (1). Hotham, surprized at this message, consulted with some of his friends (2), and it was resolved among them, that a messenger should be dispatched to the King, humbly to beseech him to forbear to come, so far as he could not, without betraying the trust committed to him, set open the gates to so great a guard as he came attended withal. The messenger returning with a doubtful answer, and certifying of the King's advance to the town, Hotham drew up the bridge, shut the gates, and commanded the soldiers to stand to their arms round the walls. The King being come to Beverly-gate, called for the Governor, who appearing on the walls, he commanded him to open the gate. The Governor answered, "He was intrusted by the Parliament for the curing of the town, for his Majesty's honour, and the Kingdom's use, which he intended by God's help to do; proffering, however, that if his Majesty would be pleased to come in with twelve more, he should be welcome, otherwise he could not, without betraying his trust to the State, admit entrance to so great a guard (3). But the King refusing to enter on these terms, repeated several times his command to open the gate, and still received the same answer. Presently after, the Duke of York, and the Prince Elector went out of the town (4), and came to the King, who was pleased to give the Governor one hour more to consider what he did. But Hotham persisting in his resolution, the King offered at last to enter with thirty horse only (1), which was refused. In short, about five in the evening, the King returning to the gate, commanded Hotham once more to open it, and upon his refusal, caused him to be proclaimed traitor by two Heralds he had brought with him. This done, he retired to Bewerly, where he passed the night. The next morning, he sent a Herald to Hotham, to summon him once more to open the gates of Hull, with promise of pardon for what was past but could not prevail; so that he was forced to return to York.

When it is considered, the King had formed a design to secure Hull, from the time he resolved to retire to York, as the Lord Clarendon expressly owns, one would imagine, that at least he had contrived proper means to accomplish this undertaking, the success whereof was so very important. But one knows not what to think, when this attempt is seen to be so ill managed, that it was neither plausible nor likely. The King was not ignorant, that Hotham was member of the House of Commons, that this House had chosen him for the Government of Hull, as a man they could confide in: that Hotham knew, he was to keep the place against the King, however his commission might be worded. And yet, he imagines, that this man will be awed by his presence alone, and not dare to deny him entrance with three hundred Horse, besides the train of the two Princes already admitted. That he will suffer himself to be deprived of his Government, upon the bare scruple of disobeying his King, he who probably was chosen by the Commons as one of the least scrupulous. I own, I cannot conceive how the King could be advised to declare himself so openly, in attempting to seize Hull, and indeed, from this time, all confidence entirely vanished. It signified nothing to colour this proceeding, and to say, he had no other design than to visit the place, and examine the magazine, to know what might be taken for the service of Ireland, and for arming the Scots, who were to serve in that country. This was not capable of deceiving the Parliament, who saw but too plainly what was the King's design, and of what consequence the execution would have been. There were no fewer papers, messages, answers, replies, about this affair, than about the Militia.

The King was extremely troubled at this disappointment, and seeing no other way to palliate his proceedings, he resolved expressly to deny, he had ever intended to become master of Hull. By this supposition, he meant to represent Sir John Hotham's action as a manifest treason, and accordingly demanded an authentick reparation of the Parliament. He cited the laws and statutes which placed in the King the care of defending the realm, and the command of the forts and magazines. But he constantly supposed the Kingdom to be in a state of tranquillity, as it was when these Laws were made, which was by no means the present case. He pretended, the forts and magazines were his own proper goods; and particularly, that of Hull, being purchased with his own money, could not be withheld from him, without rendering his condition worse than that of his meanest Subject.

But the Parliament did not grant these suppositions. They pretended, that the forts and magazines were committed to the King, as a trust to be employed for the preservation, and not for the destruction, of the People, and that the King's claim to the property of the forts and magazines were groundless. It is no wonder, that upon such different principles, the Papers should abound on both sides, without producing any great effects. The King however had this advantage, that the Parliament could not evidently prove their assertions against him, and that the authority assumed by both Houses was founded only on bare suppositions of the King's ill designs, which would have rendered it plausible, had they been averred. But they did not think proper to wait for demonstrations, to be assured of the King's secret intentions. It was enough to have reasons to suspect him, which to them appeared sufficiently strong, to oblige them to take precautions, which might come too late, in case more convincing proofs were expected.

This is the substance of all the Papers published on both sides, concerning Hull. As I have already inserted a great many about the Militia, I think it convenient to save the Reader the pains of perusing those which were published on the present affair, and which run upon the same principles and suppositions so often mentioned.

The Parliament openly supported Sir John Hotham; so that after many messages, declarations, answers, and replies, the King had no way left to become master of Hull, but by surprize or force. The last of these ways was not very practicable, because he could depend but on a very small number of troops, and had no artillery, arms or ammunition. It is true, he expected some from Holland, but the time was very uncertain. And therefore he attempted to take Hull by correspondence. In the execution of this design, he made use of Mr. Beckwith a Gentleman of Beverly, who had a Son-in-law, officer in Hull. But this officer discovered the plot to the Governor, who was so civil as to send the King word, he might save himself the trouble of carrying on the contrivance, and at the same time sent an express to the Parliament. Beckwith retiring to the King at York, the Parliament dispatched a messenger to seize and bring him to London: But the messenger was not permitted to execute his orders.

From that time, the King and the Parliament prepared for war, it being very easy to foresee, they should at last be forced to it. But as each stood in need of the People to bear the expence, so each used all possible endeavours to gain them, by demonstrating the injustice of the contrary party, and by striving to convince them, that their good was only intended. The Parliament pretended, that the malignants, by whom the King suffered himself to be guided, had formed a design to inflame the nation, where-in they could not succeed, but by inflaming the misunderstanding between the King and the Parliament, in order to engage them in a Civil War, which they hoped would prove successful to the King. This was the Parliament's supposition, from whence they inferred, that therefore it was necessary to prevent by good measures the execution of this design, and to put themselves in a posture of defence, in case the King continued to be directed by these malignants.

The King, on his side, pretended, that the Parliament, in feigning to have only in view the good of the Kingdom, really meant to alter the constitution of Church and State: That they designed to abolish the Regal Power, or render the King but a shadow, whilst both Houses should be possessed of the Government. He inferred from this supposition, that he ought to expose himself to the greatest hazards, rather than receive Law from his Subjects; his confidence and the care of the realm, which God had intrusted him with, not permitting him to suffer the alterations designed to be made in Church and State. Whatever secret motives both might have, the reasons they alleged were very plausible, and those who fought only justice, were not a little embarrassed which side to espouse. But the Parliament seemed to have a great advantage upon the King, in that their party was much more numerous, and the forts and Militia in their possession, with plenty of arms and ammunition, whilst the King was wholly unprovided. Nevertheless, the King was not without hopes. He had, as I have said, privately gained Colonel Goring Governor of Portsmouth. The Queen was now busy in Holland in procuring artillery, arms, ammunition, and several officers of the English troops in the Dutch service. Most of the Yorkshire Gentlemen, the largest County in England, were for him, and he did not question, but by their means he should engage the whole County to declare in his favour. With this assistance, he hoped to prevent the Parliament, and raise a sufficient number of Forces to take Hull, before the Parliament should be able to oppose it. He expected also, that when he was master of Hull and Portsmouth, and had received arms from Holland, many, who were still restrained by the fear of wanting protection, would openly take his part. Moreover, he gave private notice to all his friends, that it was time to repair to York, and ordered letters to be sent in his name to such Members as adhered to him, to absent themselves from the Parliament, and retire to York, or to other places where they could be serviceable to him.

All these measures could not be taken so privately but the Parliament had some information, and therefore the King endeavoured to give them some colour, to hinder his designs from being discovered. After his disappointment at Hull, he summoned all the Yorkshire Tenants in Chief, to appear at York the 12th of May.

Shortly after, both Houses sent a Committee to York (2), a Committee under pretence of bringing the King a message about Hull is sent to York, who and the Militia, but, in reality, to be spies upon his actions. This message was the more disagreeable to him, as in spite of after having returned an answer, and dismissed the Committee, they told him they had orders to stay at York. Though it was easy for him to see with what view the Parliament had sent this Committee, he thought not proper to use any violence to drive them from the City.

The 12th of May, the Gentry of the county being come to Yorkshire, his Majesty made a speech to them, where-in he protested, "That the enjoying of quiet was the

 "not to make that part of the Kingdom a seat of war, as "malice would make them believe." He added, "that "both Houses of Parliament did, by their messengers, "brave him even in York; and that, as his magazine of "Hull was going, directly against his will, to be taken "from him, and the Militia to be put in execution
 "against law and his consent; and lastly, as Sir John
 "Hotham's treason was countenanced, none could blame
 "him for apprehending danger. Therefore he was re"solved to have a guard, in which he desired their con"currence and assistance."

The Yorkshire Gentry being variously disposed, it was not possible for the hearers of the King's Speech, to agree in the same answer. Nay, it is said, some violence was used by the Court, to exclude from the debate such as were known to be opposite to the King, and that these were forced to assemble elsewhere. For this reason the King received four different answers to his proposition, two whereof were favorable, and the other two befought him to hearken to the advice of his Parliament. The guard however was raised, and the command thereof given to the Prince of Wales (1).

The King would have also removed the Courts of Justice from Westminster to York, and even sent a proclamation to the Lord-Keeper Littleton for that purpose, with orders to publish it. But the Parliament having notice of it, forbid him to execute the orders.

Serjeant Major-General Skippon being an excellent officer, and the King knowing the Parliament designed to employ him, sent for him to attend him at York. But the Parliament gave him orders to the contrary, which Skippon obeyed. This doubtless was foreseen by the King, but he was very glad to show that the Parliament desired a war, since they so haughtily contradicted his orders.

As matters stood between the King and the Parliament, a war seemed unavoidable, and probably it was determined on both sides. The sole concern was to amuse the Publick with good or bad reasons, and to try to cast the blame on the opposite party. Mean while the King's two answers of March the 9th, and the 20th, not being replied to, the Parliament was apprehensive, their silence would produce an ill effect in the minds of the People. Wherefore they took occasion, in answering these two messages, to publish a Manifesto, under the name of Remonstrance or Declaration, the 19th of May. As this Manifesto, and the King's answer, are very proper to inform the Reader of the reasons of both parties, or at least of those they alleged to support their cause, and vindicate their conduct, I think it necessary to insert these two Papers, for fear the abridging them may be an injury to either.

The Declaration or Remonstrance of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, May 19th, 1642.

THE infinite mercy and providence of the Almighty God hath been abundantly manifested since the beginning of this Parliament, in great variety of protections and blessings, whereby he hath not only delivered us from many wicked plots and designs, which, if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and destruction upon this Kingdom; but out of those attempts hath produced divers evident and remarkable advantages to the furtherance of those services, which we have been desirous to perform to our sovereign Lord the King, and to this Church and State, in providing for the publick peace and prosperity of his Majesty, and all his Realms, which in the presence of the same all-seeing Deity, we profess to have been, and still to be, the only end of all our counsels and endeavours, wherein we have resolved to continue freed and enlarged from all private aims, personal respects or passions whatsoever (1).

REMARK (1). It may be presumed, there were in both Houses, many Members who acted with sincerity, and believed, they really served the Publick in whatever they did against the King. But it is hard to conceive, how both Houses, consisting of so many Members who were ignorant of one another's inward sentiments, could call God to witness, that they acted only by just motives, free from passion and private views.

In which resolution we are nothing discouraged, although the Heads of the malignant party, disappointed of that prey, the Religion and Liberty of this Kingdom, which they were ready to seize upon and devour before the beginning of this Parliament, have still persisted, by new practices, both of force and subtilty, to recover the same again; for which purpose they have made several attempts for the bringing up of the army; they afterwards projected the false accusation of the Lord Kimbolton and the five Members of the House of Commons, which being in itself of an odious nature, they yet so far prevailed with his Majesty, as to procure him to take it upon himself; but when the unchangeable duty and faithfulness of the Parliament could not be wrought upon by such a fact as that, to withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from his Majesty, they have with much art and industry, advised his Majesty to suffer divers unjust scandals and imputations upon the Parliament, to be published in his name, whereby they might make it odious to the People, and by their help to destroy that which hitherto hath been the only means of their own preservation.

For this purpose, they have drawn his Majesty into the northern parts, far from the Parliament, that so false rumours might have time to get credit, and the just defences of the Parliament find a more tedious, difficult, and disadvantageous access, after those false imputations and scandals had been first rooted in the apprehension of his Majesty, and his Subjects; which the more speedily to effect, they have caused a Prefs to be transported to York, from whence several papers and writings of that kind are conveyed to all parts of the Kingdom, without the authority of the Great-Seal, in an unusual and illegal manner, and without the advice of his Majesty's Privy-Council; from the greater and better part whereof having withdrawn himself, as well as from his great Council of Parliament, he is thereby exposed to the wicked and unfaithful counsels of such as have made the wisdom and justice of the Parliament dangerous to themselves; and this danger they labour to prevent by hiding their own guilt under the name and shadow of the King, insinuating into him their own fears, and as much as in them lies, aspersing his Royal Person and honour with their own infamy, from both which it hath always been as much the care, as it is the duty of the Parliament, to preserve his Majesty, and fix the guilt of all evil actions and counsels, upon those who have been the authors of them.

Amongst divers writings of this kind, we the Lords and Commons in Parliament, have taken into our consideration two printed papers; the first containing a declaration, which they received from his Majesty, in answer of that which was presented to his Majesty from both Houses of Parliament at Newmarket, the 9th of March 1641. The other, his Majesty's answer to the petition of both Houses, presented to his Majesty at York, the 26th of March 1642, both which are filled with harsh censures, and causeless charges upon the Parliament; concerning which, we hold it necessary to give satisfaction to the Kingdom, seeing we find it very difficult to satisfy his Majesty, whom, to our great grief, we have found to be so engaged to, and possessed by those misapprehensions, which evil counsellors have wrought in him, that our most humble and faithful Remonstrances have rather irritated and embittered, than any thing allayed or mitigated the sharp expressions, which his Majesty hath been pleased to make in answer to them; for the manifestation whereof, and of our own innocence, we desire that all his Majesty's loving Subjects may take notice of these particulars.

We know no occasion given by us, which might move his Majesty to tell us, That in our declaration presented at Newmarket, there were some expressions different from the usual language to Princes.
 Neither did we tell his Majesty, either in words or in effect, That if he did not join with us in an Act, which his Majesty conceived might prove prejudicial and dangerous to himself and the whole Kingdom, we would make a law without him, and impose it upon the people. That which we desired was, That in regard of the imminent danger of the Kingdom, the Militia, for the security of his Majesty and his people, might be put under the command of such noble and faithful persons, as they had all cause to confide in: And such was the necessity of this preservation, that we declare, That if his Majesty should refuse to join with us therein, the two Houses of Parliament, being the supreme Court, and highest Council of the Kingdom, were enabled, by their own authority, to provide for the repelling of such imminent and evident dangers, not by any new law of their own making, as hath been untruely suggested to his Majesty, but by the most ancient law of this Kingdom, even that which is fundamental and essential to the constitution and subsistence of it.

Although we never desired to encourage his Majesty to such replies, as might produce any contestation betwixt him and his Parliament, of which we never found better effect than loss of time, and hindrance of the publick affairs; yet we have been far from telling him, of how little value his words would be with us, much less when they are accompanied with actions of love and 3 "justice.

1642, "justice. His Majesty hath more reason to find fault with those wicked counsellors, who have so often bereaved him of the honour, and his people of the fruit, of many gracious Speeches which he made to them, such as those in the end of the last Parliament; That in the word of a King, and as he was a Gentleman, he would redress the grievances of his People, as well out of Parliament as in it. Were the searching the studies and chambers, yea, the pockets of some, both of the Nobility and Commons, the very next day; the commitment of Mr. Belkiss, Sir John Hotham, and Mr. Crew; the continued oppressions by Ship-money, Coat and Conduct-money; with the manifold imprisonments, and other vexations thereupon, and other ensuing violations of the laws and liberties of the Kingdom, (all which were the effects of evil counsel, and other ensuing violations of the laws and liberties of the Kingdom) actions of Remonstrance of the state of the Kingdom) actions of love and justice, suitable to such words as those?

"As gracious was his Majesty's Speech in the beginning of this Parliament; That he was resolved to put himself freely and clearly upon the love and affection of his English Subjects. Whether his causeless complaints and jealousy, the unjust imputations so often cast upon his Parliament, his denial of their necessary defence by the ordinance of the Militia, his dangerous absenting himself from his great Council, like to produce such a mischievous division in the Kingdom, have not been more suitable to other mens evil counsels, than to his own words, will easily appear to any indifferent judgment.

"Neither have his latter Speeches been better used and preferred by these evil and wicked counsellors. Could any words be fuller of love and justice, than those in his answer to the message sent the House of Commons, the 31st of December 1641: We do engage unto you solemnly, on the word of a King, that the security of all, and every one of you from violence, is, and ever shall be as much our care, as the preservation of us and our children. And could any actions be fuller of injustice and violence than that of the Attorney-General, in falsely accusing the six Members of Parliament, and the other proceedings thereupon, within three or four days after that message? For the full view whereof let the declaration made of those proceedings be perused; and by those instances (we could add many more) let all the world judge, who deserves to be taxed with disvaluing his Majesty's words, they, who have as much as in them lies stained and sullied them with such foul counsels; or the Parliament, who have ever manifested, with joy and delight, their humble thankfulness for those gracious words and actions of love and justice which have been conformable thereunto.

"The King is pleased to disavow the having any such evil council or counsellors, as are mentioned in our declaration, to his knowledge; and we hold it our duty, humbly to avow there are such, or else we must say, that all the ill things done of late in his Majesty's name, have been done by himself, wherein we should neither follow the direction of the law, nor the affection of our own hearts, which is, as much as may be, to clear his Majesty from all imputation of misgovernment, and to lay the fault upon his Ministers; the false accusing of six Members of Parliament; the justifying of master Attorney in that false accusation; the violent coming to the House of Commons; the denial of the Militia; the sharp messages to both Houses, contrary to the customs of former Kings; the long and remote absence of his Majesty from Parliament; the heavy and wrongful taxes upon both Houses; the cherishing and countenancing a discontented party in the Kingdom against them: These certainly are the fruits of very ill counsel, apt to put the Kingdom into a combustion, to hinder the supplies of Ireland, and to countenance the proceedings and pretensions of the Rebels there; and the authors of those evil counsels, we conceive, must needs be known to his Majesty. And we hope our labouring with his Majesty to have these discovered and brought to a just censure, will not so much wound his honour in the opinion of his good subjects, as his labouring to preserve and conceal them.

"And whereas his Majesty saith, He could wish that his own immediate actions, which he avows on his own honour, might not be so roughly censured under that common stile of evil counsellors: We could also heartily wish, That we had not cause to make that stile so common: But how often and undutiful soever these wicked counsellors fix their dishonour upon the King, by making his Majesty the author of those evil actions, which are the effects of their own evil counsels, we his Majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects can use no other stile, according to that maxim in the law, The King can do no wrong; but if any ill be committed in matter of

"State, the Council; if in matter of Justice, the Judges must answer for it.

"We lay no charge upon his Majesty, which should put him upon that apology, concerning his faithful and zealous affection of the Protestant profession: Neither doth his Majesty endeavour to clear those in greatest authority about him, by whom (we say) that design hath been potently carried on for divers years; and we rather wish, that the mercies of heaven, than the judgments, may be manifested upon them; but that there hath been such, there are so plentiful and frequent evidences, that we believe there is none, either Protestant or Papist, who hath had any reasonable view of the passages of latter times, but either in fear or hope, did expect a sudden issue of this design.

"We have no way transgressed against the Act of oblivion, by remembering the intended war against Scotland, as a branch of that design to alter Religion, by those wicked counsels, from which God did then deliver us, which we ought never to forget.

"That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and cherished by the popish and malignant party in England, is not only affirmed by the rebels, but may be cleared by many other proofs: The same rebellious principles of pretended Religion, the same political ends, are apparent in both, and their malicious designs and practices are masked and disguised with the same false colour, of their earnest zeal to vindicate his Majesty's prerogative from the supposed oppression of the Parliament. How much these treacherous pretences have been countenanced by some evil counsel about his Majesty, may appear in this, That the Proclamation whereby they were declared traitors, was so long withheld as to the 2d of January, though the rebellion broke forth in October before, and then no more but forty copies appointed to be printed, with a special command from his Majesty not to exceed that number; and that none of them should be published, till his Majesty's pleasure were further signified, as by the warrant appears, a true copy whereof is hereunto added, so that a few only could take notice of it; which was made more observable, by the late contrary proceedings against the Scots, who were in a very quick and sharp manner proclaimed; and those Proclamations forthwith dispensed, with as much diligence as might be, through all the Kingdom, and ordered to be read in all Churches, accompanied with publick prayers and exhortations.

"Another evidence of favour and countenance to the rebels, in some of power about his Majesty, is this, That they have put forth in his name a causeless complaint against the Parliament, which speaketh the same language of the Parliament which the rebels do, whereby to raise a belief in men's minds, that his Majesty's affections are alienated, as well as his person is removed from that great Council; all which doth exceedingly retard the supplies of Ireland, and more advance the proceedings of the rebels, than any jealousy or misapprehension, begotten in his subjects, by the declaration of the rebels injunctions of Registis, or information of Tristram Whitcomb; so that, considering the present state and temper of both Kingdoms, his royal presence is far more necessary here than it can be in Ireland, for redemption or protection of his subjects there.

"And whether there be any cause of his Majesty's great indignation, for being reproached to have intended force or threatening to the Parliament, we desire them to consider, who shall read our declaration, in which there is no word tending to any such reproach; and certainly we have been more tender of his Majesty's honour in this point, than he, whosoever he was, that did write this declaration, where, in his Majesty's name, he doth call God to witness, he never had any such thoughts, or knew of any such resolution of bringing up the army; which truly will seem strange to those, who shall read the deposition of Mr. Goring, the information of Mr. Percy, and divers other examinations of Mr. Wilmet, Mr. Pullards, and others; the other examinations of Captain Legg, Sir Jacob Ashley, Sir John Coniers; and consider the condition and nature of the Petition which was sent unto Sir Jacob Ashley, under the approbation of C. R. which his Majesty doth now acknowledge to be his own hand; and being full of scandal to the Parliament, might have proved dangerous to the whole Kingdom, if the army should have interposed betwixt the King and them, as was desired.

"We do not affirm, that his Majesty's warrant was granted for the passage of Mr. Jarvis, after the desire of both Houses for restraint of his servants, but only that he did pass over, after that restraint, by virtue of such a warrant. We know the warrant bears date the day before our desire; yet it seems strange to those who 1642. " know how great respect and power Mr. Jermin had in Court, that he should begin his journey in such haste, and in apparel so unfit for travel, as a black fatten suit, and white boots, if his going away were designed the day before.

" The accusation of the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the House of Commons, is called a breach of Privilege; and truly so it was, and a very high one, far above any satisfaction that hath been yet given: How can it be said to be largely satisfied, so long as his Majesty laboured to preserve master Attorney from punishment, who was the visible actor in it; so long as his Majesty hath not only justified him, but by his letters declared, that it was his duty to accuse them, and that he would have punished him, if he had not done it; so long as those members have not the means of clearing their innocence, and the authors of that malicious charge undiscovered, though both Houses of Parliament have several times petitioned his Majesty to discover them, and that not only upon grounds of common justice, but by Act of Parliament, his Majesty is bound to do it; so long as the King refuses to pass a Bill for their discharge, alleging, That the narrative in that Bill is against his honour, whereby he seems still to avow the matter of that false and scandalous accusation, though he defers the prosecution, offering to pass a Bill for their acquittal; yet with intimation, that they must defer the avowing their own innocence, which would more wound them in honour, than secure them in law.

" And in vindication of this great privilege of Parliament, we do not know that we have invaded any privilege belonging to his Majesty, as is alledged in this Declaration.

" But we look not upon this only in the notion of a breach of privilege, which might be, though the accusation were true or false, but under the notion of a heinous crime in the Attorney, and all other Subjects who had a hand in it, a crime against the law of nature, against the rules of justice, that innocent men should be charged with so great an offence as treason, in the face of the highest judicatory of the Kingdom, whereby their lives and estates, their blood and honour, are endangered, without witness, without evidence, without all possibility of reparation in a legal course, yet a crime of such a nature, that his Majesty's command can no more warrant, than it can any other acts of injustice. It is true, that those things which are evil in their own nature, such as false testimony, or false accusation, cannot be the subject of any command, or induce any obligation of obedience upon any man, by any authority whatsoever; therefore the Attorney in this case was bound to refuse to execute such a command, unless he had some such evidence or testimony, as might have warranted him against the parties, and be liable to make satisfaction if it should prove false; and it is sufficiently known to every man, and adjudged in Parliament, That the King can be neither the relator, informer, or witness. If it rest as it is, without further satisfaction, no future Parliament can be safe, but that the Members may be taken and destroyed at pleasure; yea the very principles of government and justice will be in danger to be dissolved.

" We do not conceive, that numbers do make an Assembly unlawful, but when either the end or manner of their carriage shall be unlawful. Divers just occasions might draw the Citizens to Westminster, where many publick and private petitions, and other causes, were depending in Parliament; and why that should be found more faulty in the Citizens, than the resort of great numbers every day in the Term to the ordinary Courts of Justice, we know not. That those Citizens were notoriously provoked and assaulted at Westminster, by Colonel Lunsford, Captain Hide, with divers others, and by some of the servants of the Archbishop of York, is sufficiently proved; and that afterward they were more violently wounded, and most barbarously mangled with swords, by the officers and soldiers near Whitehall, many of them being without weapons, and giving no cause of distaste, as is likewise proved by several testimonies; but of any scandalous or seditious misdemeanours of theirs, that might give his Majesty good cause to suppose his own person, or those of his Royal Consort, or Children, to be in apparent danger, we have had no proof ever offered to either House; and if there had been any complaint of that kind, it is no doubt the Houses would have been as forward to join in an order for the suppressing such tumults, as they were not long before upon another occasion, when they made an order to that purpose. Whereas those officers and soldiers, which committed that violence upon so many of the Citizens at Whitehall, were cherished and fostered in his Majesty's house: And when, not long after, the Common-Council of London presented a petition to his Majesty, for reparation of those injuries; his Majesty's answer was, (without hearing the proof of the complainants) that if any Citizen were wounded or ill-treated, his Majesty was confidently assured, that it happened by their own evil and corrupt demeanours.

" We hope it cannot be thought contrary to the duty and wisdom of a Parliament, if many concurring, and frequently reiterated and renewed advertisements from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts; if the solicitations of the Pope's Nuncio, and our own discontented fugitives, do make us jealous and watchful for the safety of the State. And we have been very careful to make our expressions thereof so easy and so plain to the capacity and understanding of the people, that nothing might justly stick with them, with reflection upon the person of his Majesty. Wherein we appeal to the judgment of any indifferent person, who shall read and peruse our own words. We must maintain the ground of our fears to be of that moment, that we cannot discharge the trust and duty which lies upon us, unless we do apply our selves to the use of those means which the law hath enabled us in cases of this nature, for the necessary defence of the Kingdom; and as his Majesty doth graciously declare, the law shall be the measure of his power; so do we most heartily profess, that we shall always make it the rule of our obedience.

Prudent Omissions in the King's Answer.

" The next point of our Declaration was with much caution artificially passed over by him who drew his Majesty's answer, it being indeed the foundation of all our misery, and his Majesty's trouble, that he is pleased to hear general taxes upon his Parliament, without any particular charge to which they may give satisfaction, and that he hath often conceived displeasure against particular persons upon misinformation; and although those informations have been clearly proved to be false, yet he would never bring the accusers to question, which layeth an impossibility upon honest men of clearing themselves, and gives encouragement unto false and unworthy persons to trouble with untrue and groundless informations; three particulars, we mentioned in our Declaration, which the penner of that answer had good cause to omit; the words supposed to be spoken at Kensington; the pretended articles against the Queen; and the groundless accusation of the six Members of Parliament, there being nothing to be said in defence or denial of any of them.

" Concerning his Majesty's desire to join with his Parliament, and with his faithful Subjects, in defence of Religion, and publick Good of the Kingdom; we doubt not but he will do it fully, when evil counsellors shall be removed from about him; and until that be, as we have shewed before of words, so must we also say of laws, that they cannot secure us; witness the Petition of Right, which was followed with such an inundation of illegal taxes, that we had just cause to think, that the Payment of eight hundred and twenty thousand pounds was an easy burthen to the Commonwealth, in exchange of them; and we cannot but justly think, that if there be a continuance of such ill counsellors, and favour to them, they will by some wicked device or other, make the Bill for the Triennial Parliament, and those other excellent laws mentioned in his Majesty's Declaration, of less value than words.

" That excellent Bill for the continuance of this Parliament was so necessary, that without it, we could not have raised so great sums of money for the service of his Majesty and the Commonwealth as we have done, and without which the ruin and destruction of the Kingdom must needs have followed. And we are relieved, the gracious favour of his Majesty expressed in that Bill, and the advantage and security which thereby we have from being dissolved, shall not encourage us to do any thing, which otherwise had not been fit to have been done. And we are ready to make it good before all the world, that although his Majesty hath passed many bills very advantageous for the Subject, yet in none of them have we bereaved his Majesty of any just, necessary, or profitable prerogative of the Crown. We so earnestly desire his Majesty's return to London, for that upon it, we conceive, depends the very safety and being of both his Kingdoms: and therefore we must protest, that as for the time past, neither the government of London, nor any Laws of the Land, have lost their life and force for his security; so for the future, we shall be ready to do or say, any thing that may stand with the duty or honour of a Parliament, which may raise a mutual confidence betwixt his Majesty and us, as we do wish, and as the affairs of the Kingdom do require.

"Thus far the answer to that which is called His Majesty's Declaration, hath led us. Now we come to that which is intitled, His Majesty's Answer to the Petition of both Houses, presented to him at York the 26th of March 1642. In the beginning whereof his Majesty willeth, that our Privileges on all parts were so stated, that this way of correspondency might be preferred, with that freedom which hath been used of old. We know nothing introduced by us that gives any impediment hereunto; neither have we affirmed our Privileges to be broken, when his Majesty denies us any thing, or gives us a reason why he cannot grant it, or that those who advised such denial, were enemies to the peace of the Kingdom, and favourers of the Irish rebellion, in which asperision, that is turned into a general ascription, which in our votes is applied to a particular case; wherefore we must maintain our votes. That those who advised his Majesty to contradict that which both Houses, in the question concerning the Militia, had declared to be law and command, it should not be obeyed, is a high breach of Privilege; and that those who advised his Majesty to absent himself from his Parliament, are enemies to the peace of the Kingdom, and justly to be suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland. The reasons of both are evident, because in the first there is as great a derogation from the trust and authority of Parliament; and in the second, as much advantage to the proceedings and hopes of the rebels as may be: And we hold it a very causeless imputation upon the Parliament, that we have herein any way impeached, much less taken away, the freedom of his Majesty's vote, which doth not import a liberty for his Majesty to deny any thing, how necessary soever, for the preservation of the Kingdom, much less a licence to evil counsellors, to advise any thing, though never so destructive to his Majesty and his People. (2.)

REM. (2.) I do not think, it was ever decided to what Acts the King may, or may not, deny his assent. So there arises an inexhaustible fountain of disputes, when the King and Parliament do not agree.

"By the message of the 20th of January, his Majesty did propound to both Houses of Parliament, that they would with all speed fall into a serious consideration of all those particulars, which they thought necessary, as well for the upholding and maintaining his Majesty's just and regal authority, and for the settling his revenue, as for the present and future establishing our Privileges, the free and quiet enjoying our estates, the liberties of our persons, the security of the true Religion professed in the Church of England, and the settling of ceremonies in such a manner as may take away all just offence, and digest it into one entire body.

"To that point of upholding and maintaining his Royal Authority, we say, nothing hath been done to the prejudice of it, that should require any new provision: To the other of settling the revenue, the Parliament hath no way abridged or disordered his just revenue; but it is true that much waste and confusion of his Majesty's estate hath been made by those evil and unfaithful Ministers, whom he hath employed in the managing of it, whereby his own ordinary expences would have been disappointed, and the safety of the Kingdom more endangered, if the Parliament had not in some measure provided for his household, and for some of the forts, more than they were bound to do; and they are still willing to settle such a revenue upon his Majesty, as may make him live royally, plentifully, and safely; but they cannot in wisdom and fidelity to the Common-wealth do this, till he shall chuse such counsellors and officers as may order and dispose it to the publick good, and not apply it to the ruin and destruction of his People, as heretofore it hath been. But this and the other matters concerning our selves, being works of great importance, and full of intricacy, will require so long a time of deliberation, that the Kingdom might be ruined before we should effect them. Wherefore we thought it necessary, first to be suitors to his Majesty, so to order the Militia, that the Kingdom being secured, we might with more ease and safety apply our selves to debate of that message wherein we have been interrupted by his Majesty's denial of the ordinance concerning the same, because it would have been in vain for us to labour in other things, and in the mean time to leave our selves naked to the malice of so many enemies both at home and abroad; yet we have not been altogether negligent of those things which his Majesty is pleased to propound in that message: We have agreed upon a book of Rates in a larger proportion than hath been granted to any of his Majesty's Predecessors, which is a considerable support of his Majesty's publick charge; and have likewise prepared divers propositions

"and Bills for preservation of our Religion and Liberties, which we intend shortly to present to his Majesty, and to do whatsoever is fit for us to make up this unpleasant breach betwixt his Majesty and his Parliament.

"Whereas divers exceptions are here taken concerning the Militia; first, that his Majesty never denied the things, but accepted the persons (except for corporations) only that he denied the way. To which we answer, that that exception takes off London, and all other great towns and cities, which makes a great part of the Kingdom; and for the way of ordinance it is ancient, more speedy, more easily alterable, and, in all these and other respects, more proper and more applicable to the present occasion, than a Bill which his Majesty calls the only good old way of imposing upon the Subjects. It should seem that neither his Majesty's Royal Predecessors, nor our ancestors have heretofore been of that opinion; 37 Ed. 3. we find this record, The Chancellor made declaration of the challenge of the Parliament; the King desires to know the griefs of his Subjects, and to redress enormities. The last day of the Parliament, the King demanded of the whole Estates, Whether they would have such things as they agreed on, by way of Ordinance, or Statute? Who answered, by way of Ordinance; for that they might amend the same at their pleasure, and so it was.

"But his Majesty objects further, that there is something in the Preface, to which he could not consent with justice to his honour and innocence, and that thereby he is excluded from any power in the disposing of it. These objections may seem somewhat, but indeed will appear nothing, when it shall be considered, that nothing in the preamble lays any charge upon his Majesty, or in the body of the ordinance, that excludes his royal authority in the disposing or execution of it: But only it is provided, That it should be signified by both Houses of Parliament, as that channel through which it will be best derived, and most certainly to those ends for which it is intended, and let all the World judge, whether we have not reason to insist upon it, that the strength of the Kingdom should rather be ordered according to the direction or advice of the great Council of the Land, equally intrusted by the King, and by the Kingdom, than that the safety of the King, Parliament, and Kingdom, should be left at the devotion of a few unknown Counsellors, many of them not intrusted at all by the King in any publick way, not at all confided in by the Kingdom.

"We wish the danger were not imminent, or not still continuing, but cannot conceive, that the long time spent in this debate is evidence sufficient that there was no such necessity or danger, but a Bill might easily have been prepared; for when many causes do concur to the danger of a State, the interruption of any one may hinder the execution of the rest, and yet the design be still kept on foot for better opportunities. Who knows whether the ill success of the Rebels in Ireland had not hindered the insurrection of the Papists here? Whether the preservation of the six Members of the Parliament falsely accused, hath not prevented that Plot of the breaking the neck of the Parliament, of which we were informed from France, not long before they were accused? Yet since his Majesty hath been pleased to express his pleasure rather for a Bill than an Ordinance, and that he sent in one for that purpose, we readily entertained it, and with some small and necessary alterations, speedily passed the same: But, contrary to the custom of Parliament, and our expectations grounded upon his Majesty's own invitation of us to that way, and the other reasons manifested in our Declaration concerning the Militia of the 5th of May, instead of his royal assent, we met with an absolute refusal.

"If the matter of these our Votes of the 15th and 16th of March, be according to law, we hope his Majesty will allow the Subjects to be bound by them, because he hath said, he will make the Law the rule of his power; and if the question be, Whether that be Law which the Lords and Commons have once declared to us so, who shall be the judge? Not his Majesty; for the King judgeth not of matters of Law, but by his Courts; and his Courts, though sitting by his authority, expect not his assent in matters of Law: Nor any other Courts, for they cannot judge in that case, because they are inferior; no appeal lying to them from Parliament, the judgment whereof is, in the eye of the Law, the King's judgment in his highest Court; though the King in his person be neither present nor assenting thereunto. (3.)

REM. (3.) I observed elsewhere, the defect of this reasoning, which is a mere fallacy, grounded upon the equivocal word Parliament. For under colour, that in a certain sense, the two Houses alone are called the Parliament, they they assume here to themselves the rights belonging solely to the Parliament composed of King, Lords, and Commons.

"The Votes at which his Majesty takes exceptions, are these:

"That the King's absence so far remote from the Parliament, is not only an obstruction, but may be a destruction to the affairs of Ireland.

"That when the Lords and Commons shall declare what the Law of the Land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of Parliament.

"That those persons that advised his Majesty to absent himself from the Parliament, are enemies to the peace of the Kingdom, and justly may be suspected to be favourers of the Rebellion in Ireland.

"That the Kingdom hath been of late, and still is in so imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a Popish and discontented Party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his Majesty's Subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of his Majesty and his people.

"That the Lords and Commons fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their own duty, to provide a suitable prevention, have in several Petitions addressed themselves to his Majesty, for the ordering and disposing of the Militia of the Kingdom, in such a way as was agreed upon by the wisdom of both Houses, to be most effectual and proper for the present exigents of the Kingdom, yet could not obtain it; but his Majesty did several times refuse to give his royal assent thereunto.

"That in this case of extreme danger, and his Majesty's refusal, the ordinance of Parliament agreed upon by both Houses for the Militia, doth oblige the People, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom.

"By all which it doth appear, that there is no colour that by this tax we go about to introduce a new Law, much less to exercise an arbitrary power, but indeed to prevent it; for this Law is as old as the Kingdom, that the Kingdom must not be without a means to preserve itself; which that it may be done without confusion, this Nation hath intrusted certain hands with a power to provide, in an orderly and regular way, for the good and safety of the whole; which power, by the constitution of this Kingdom, is in his Majesty and in his Parliament together: Yet since the Prince, being but one person, is more subject to accidents of nature and chance, whereby the Commonwealth may be deprived of the fruit of that trust which was in part reposed in him; in cases of such necessity, that the Kingdom may not be informed presently to return to its first principles, and every man left to do what is right in his own eyes, without either guide or rule, The wisdom of this State hath intrusted the Houses of Parliament with a power to supply what shall be wanting on the part of the Prince; as is evident by the constant custom and practice thereof in cases of nonage, natural disability, and captivity; and the like reason doth and must hold for the exercise of the same power in such cases, where the royal trust cannot be, or is not discharged, and that the Kingdom runs an evident and imminent danger thereby; which danger having been declared by the Lords and Commons in Parliament, there needs not the authority of any person or Court to affirm; nor is it in the power of any person or Court to revoke that judgment. (4.)

REM. (4.) All these reasonings of both Houses are founded upon the supposition of an imminent danger. When they come to give proofs of the reality of this danger, they alledge only suspicions, whereof they explain the causes. After which, they affirm the danger to be real, because they have declared it so, and because there is no superior authority to contradict their judgment. But this Declaration does not make the danger real, if it be not so indeed. It is easy therefore to perceive, by their way of proceeding, that they are embarrassed by this article.

"We know the King hath ways enough in his ordinary Courts of Justice to punish such seditious Pamphlets and Sermons, as are any way prejudicial to his rights, honour, and authority; and if any of them have been so insolently violated and vilified, his Majesty's own Council and Officers have been to blame, and not the Parliament. We never did restrain any proceedings of this kind in other Courts, nor refuse any fit complaint to us. The Præstition Petition was referred by the Commons House to a Committee, and the author being not produced, the Printer was committed to prison, and the Book voted by that Committee to be burnt; but Sir Edward Dering, who was to make that report of the Votes of that Committee, neglected to make it. The Apprentices Petition was never complained of; but the other seditious Pamphlet (To your Tent, O If- rael) was once questioned, and the full prosecution of it was not interrupted by any fault of either House, whose forwardness to do his Majesty all right therein, may plainly appear, in that a Committee of Lords and Commons were purposely appointed to take such information as the King's Council should present, concerning seditious words, practices, or tumults, Pamphlets or Sermons, tending to the derogation of his Majesty's rights or prerogative; and his Council were enjoined by that Committee to enquire and present them; who several times met thereupon, and received this answer and Declaration from the King's Council, that they knew of no such thing as yet.

"If his Majesty had used the service of such a one in penning this answer, who understood the laws and government of this Kingdom, he would not have thought it legally in his power to deny his Parliament a guard, when they stood in need of it, since every ordinary Court hath it; neither would his Majesty, if he had been well-informed of the Laws, have refused such a guard as they desired, it being in the power of inferior Courts to command their own guard; neither would he have imposed upon them such a guard, under a command which they could not confide in; which is clearly against the privileges of Parliament, and of which they found very dangerous effects, and therefore desired to have it discharged. But such a guard, and so commanded, as the Houses of Parliament desired, they could never obtain of his Majesty; and the placing of a guard about them, contrary to their desire, was not to grant a guard to them, but in effect, to fet one upon them. All which considered; we believe, in the judgments of any indifferent persons, it will not be thought strange, if there were a more than ordinary resort of people at Westminster, of such as came willingly of their own accord to be witnesses and helpers of the safety of them, whom all his Majesty's good subjects are bound to defend from violence and danger; or that such a concurrence as this, they carrying themselves quietly and peaceably (as they did) ought, in his Majesty's apprehension, or can, in the interpretation of the Law, be held tumultuary and seditious.

"When his Majesty, in that question of violation of the Laws, had expressed the observation of them indefinitely, without any limitation of time, although we never said or thought any thing that might look like a reproach to his Majesty, yet we had reason to remember that it had been otherwise, lest we should seem to desert our former complaints and proceedings thereupon, as his Majesty doth seem but little to like or approve of them; for although he doth acknowledge here, that great mischief that grew by that arbitrary power then complained of, yet such are continually preferred and countenanced as were friends or favourers, or related unto the chief authors and actors of that arbitrary power, and of those false colours, suggestions of imminent danger and necessity, whereby they did make it plausible unto his Majesty. And on the other side, such as did appear against them, are daily discountenanced and disgraced; which, whilst it shall be so, we have no reason to judge the disease to be yet killed and dead at root, and therefore no reason to bury it in oblivion. And whilst we behold the spawns of those mischievous principles cherished and fostered in that new generation of counsellors, friends and abettors of the former, or at least, concurring with them in their malignancy against the proceedings of this Parliament, we cannot think our selves secure from the like or a worse danger.

"And here the penner of this answer bestows an admonition upon the Parliament, bidding us take heed we fall not upon the same error, upon the same suggestions. But he might have well spared this, till he could have shewed wherein we had exercised any power, otherwise than by the rule of the Law, or could have found a more authentick or higher judge in matters of Law, than the High Court of Parliament.

"It is declared in his Majesty's name, That he is resolved to keep the rule himself, and to his power to require the same of all others. We must needs acknowledge, that such a resolution is like to bring much happiness and blessing to his Majesty, and all his Kingdom; yet with humility we must confess, we have not the fruit of it, in that case of my Lord Kimbelton, and the other five Members, accused contrary to Law, both Common Law and the Statute Laws, and yet remain unfatisfied; which case was remembered in our declaration, as a strange and unheard of violation of our Laws. But the penner of this answer thought fit to pass it over, hoping that many would read his Majesty's answer, (which hath been so carefully dispersed) which would not read our declaration.

"Whereas, after our ample thanks and acknowledgements

1642. "ment of his Majesty's favour in passing many good Bills, "we said, That truth and necessity forced us to add this, "that in or about the time of passing those Bills, some design or other hath been on foot, which, if it had taken effect, would not only have deprived us of the fruit of those Bills, but would have reduced us to a worse condition of confusion, than that wherein the Parliament found us. It is now told us, That the King must be most sensible of what we cast upon him, for requital of those good Bills; whereas, out of our usual tenderness of his Majesty's honour, we did not mention him at all: But so injurious are those wicked counsellors to the name and honour of their Master and Sovereign, that, as much as they can, they lay their own infamy and guilt upon his shoulders.

"Here God also is called to witness his Majesty's upright intentions at the passing of those Laws; this we will not question, neither did we give any occasion for such a solemn asseveration as this is. The devil is likewise defied to prove, there was any design with his Majesty's knowledge or privacy. This might well have been spared, for we spoke nothing of his Majesty: But since we are so far taxed, as to have it affirmed, that we laid a notorious and false imputation upon his Majesty, we have thought it necessary, for the just defence of our own innocency, to cause the oaths and examinations which had been taken concerning the design, to be published in a full narration, for satisfaction of all his Majesty's subjects; out of which we shall now offer some few particulars, whereby the world may judge, whether we could have proceeded with more tenderness towards his Majesty than we have done. Mr. Goring confesseth, that the King first asked him, whether he was engaged in any cabal concerning the army? And commanded him to join with Mr. Percy and Mr. Jermin, and some others, whom they should find within at Mr. Percy's chamber; where they took the oath of secrecy, and then debated of a design propounded by Mr. Jermin, to secure the Tower, and to confider of bringing up the army to London, and Captain Legg confessed, he had received the draught of a Petition in the King's presence; and his Majesty acknowledged it was from his own hand: And whosoever reads the sum of that Petition, as it was proved by the testimony of Sir Jacob Asby, Sir John Coniers, and Captain Legg, will easily perceive some points in it, apt to beget in them some discontent against the Parliament. And can any man believe, there was no design in the accusation of the Lord Kimbolton, and the rest, in which his Majesty doth avow himself to be both a commander and an actor? These things being so, it will easily appear to be as much against the rule of prudence, that the penner of this answer should entangle his Majesty in this unnecessary apology; as it is against the rules of justice, that any reparation from us should be either yielded or demanded.

"It is professed in his Majesty's name, That he is truly sensible of the burdens of his People, which makes us hope, that he will take that course which will be most effectual to ease them of these burdens; that is, to join with his Parliament in preserving the peace of the Kingdom; which by his absence from them hath been much endangered, and which, by hindering the voluntary adventures for the recovery of Ireland, and disabling the subjects to discharge the great tax laid upon them, is like to make the war much more heavy to the Kingdom. And for his Majesty's wants, the Parliament hath been no cause of them; we have not diminished his just revenue, but have much eased his publick charge, and somewhat his private. And we shall be ready, in a parliamentary way, to settle his revenue, in such an honourable proportion, as may be answerable to both, when he shall put himself into such a posture of Government, that his Subjects may be secure to enjoy his just protection for their Religion, Laws, and Liberties.

"We never refused his Majesty's gracious offer of a free and general pardon, only we said it could be no security to our present fears and jealousies: And we gave a reason for it, that those fears did not arise out of any guilt of our own actions, but out of the evil designs and attempts of others; and we leave it to the world to judge, whether we herein have deserved so heavy a tax and exclamation, (That it was a strange world, when Princes professed favours are counted reproaches; such are the words of his Majesty's answer) who do esteem that offer as an act of princely grace and bounty, which, since this Parliament began, we have humbly desired we might obtain, and do still hold it necessary and advantageous for the generality of the Subjects, upon whom these taxes and subsidies lie heaviest; but we see, upon every occasion, how unhappy we are in his Majesty's misapprehensions of our words and actions.

"We are fully of the King's mind, as it is here declared, That he may rest so secure of the affections of his Subjects, that he should not stand in need of foreign force to preserve him from oppression, and are confident, that he shall never want an abundant evidence of the good wishes and assistance of his whole Kingdom, especially if he shall be pleased to hold to that gracious resolution, of building upon that sure foundation, the Law of the Land: But why his Majesty should take it ill, that we having received information so deeply concerning the safety of the Kingdom, should think them fit to be confided of, we cannot conceive; for although the name of the person was unknown, yet that which was more substantial to the probability of the report was known (that is) that he was servant to the Lord Digby, who in his presumptuous letter to the Queen's Majesty, and other letters to Sir Lewis Dives, had intimated some wicked propositions, suitable to that information; but that this should require reparation, we hold it as far from justice as it is from truth, that we have mixed any malice with these rumours, thereby to feed the fears and jealousies of the People.

"It is affirmed, his Majesty is driven (but not by us yet) from us; perchance hereafter, if there be opportunity of gaining more credit, there will not be wanting who will suggest unto his Majesty, that it is done by us. And if his Majesty were driven from us, we hope it was not by his own fears, but by the fears of the Lord Digby, and his retinue of Cavaliers; and that no fears of any tumultuary violence but of their just punishment for their manifold insolence, and intended violence against the Parliament.

RE M. (5). By the Lord Digby's Cavaliers were meant the Officers and Gentlemen who assembled at Whitehall, to guard the King, in the head of whom was the Lord Digby. I do not believe, that when this Declaration was published, the term Cavaliers was commonly used to denote the Royal party. Perhaps this word, used here by the Parliament, was the occasion of calling the King's party Cavaliers, as the Parliament's Adherents were named Round-heads. These two names were afterwards changed into Tories and Whigs.

"And this is expressed by the Lord Digby himself, when he told those Cavaliers, that the principal cause of his Majesty's going out of town, was to save them from being trampled in the dirt; but of his Majesty's person there was no cause of fear in the greatest heat of his people's indignation, after the accusation, and his Majesty's violent coming to the House; there was no shew of any evil intention against his regal person, of which there can be no better evidence than this, that he came the next day without a guard into the City, where he heard nothing but prayers and petitions, no threatnings nor irreverent speeches, that might give him any just occasion of fear, that we have heard of, or that his Majesty express: For he staid near a week after at Whitehall, in a secure and peaceable condition, whereby we are induced to believe, that there is no difficulty or doubt all, but his Majesty's residence near London, may be as safe as in any part of the Kingdom. We are most assured of the faithfulness of the City and Suburbs; and for our selves, we shall quicken the vigour of the Laws, the industry of the Magistrates, the authority of the Parliament, for the suppressing of all tumultuary influences whatsoever, and for the vindicating of his honour from all insupportable and insolent scandals, if any such shall be found to be raised upon him, as are mentioned in this answer; and therefore we think it altogether unnecessary, and exceeding inconvenient, to adjourn the Parliament to any other place.

"Where the desire of a good understanding betwixt the King and the Parliament, is on both parts so earnest, as is here professed by his Majesty, to be in him, and we have sufficiently testified to be in our selves, it seems strange we should be so long adunder, it can be nothing else but evil and malicious counsel, misrepresenting our carriage to him, and indisposing his favour to us: And as it shall be far from us, to take any advantage of his Majesty's supposed fraits, as to desire, much less to compel him to that which his honour or interest may render unpleasant and grievous to him; so we hope, that his Majesty will not make his own understanding or reason the rule of his Government, but will suffer himself to be assisted with a wise and prudent council, that may deal faithfully betwixt him and his people; and that he will remember, that his resolutions do concern Kingdoms, and therefore ought not to be moulded by his own, much less by any other private person, which is not alike proportionable to so great a trust. And therefore we still desire and hope, that his Majesty will not be guided by his own understanding, or think those courses, fraits, and necessities, to which he shall be

642. "advised by the wisdom of both Houses of Parliament, which are the eyes in this politic body, whereby his Majesty is, by the constitution of this Kingdom, to discern the differences of those things which concern the publick peace and safety thereof.

"We have given his Majesty no cause to say, that we do meanly value the discharge of his publick duty. Whatsoever acts of grace or justice have been done, they proceed from his Majesty by the advice and counsel of his Parliament; yet we have, and shall always answer them with constant gratitude, obedience, and affection: And although many things have been done since this Parliament, of another nature, yet we shall not cease to desire the continued protection of Almighty God upon his Majesty; and most humbly petition him, to cast from him all those evil and contrary counsels, which have, in many particulars formerly mentioned, much detracted from the honour of his Government, the happiness of his own estate, and prosperity of his people.

"And having passed by many dangers from abroad, so many conspiracies at home, and brought on the publick work so far, through the greatest difficulties that ever stood in opposition to a Parliament, to such a degree of success, that nothing seems to be left in our way, able to hinder the full accomplishment of our desires and endeavours of the publick good; unless God in his justice do send such a grievous curse upon us, as to turn the strength of the Kingdom against itself, and to effect that by their own folly and credulity, which the power and subtilty of their and our enemies could not attain, that is, to divide the people from the Parliament, and to make them servicable to the ends and aims of those who would destroy them. Therefore we desire the Kingdom to take notice of this last and most desperate and mischievous plot of the malignant party, that is acted and prosecuted in many parts of the Kingdom, under plausible notions of stirring them up to a care of preserving the King's prerogative, maintaining the discipline of the Church, upholding and continuing the reverence and solemnity of God's service, and encouraging of learning. And upon these grounds, divers mutinous petitions have been framed in London, Kent, and other Counties, and sundry of his Majesty's Subjects have been solicited to declare themselves for the King against the Parliament: And many false and foul aspersions have been cast upon our proceedings, as if we had been not only negligent, but averse in these points: Whereas we desire nothing more, than to maintain the purity and power of Religion, and to honour the King in all his just Prerogatives; and for encouragement and advancement of piety and learning, we have very earnestly endeavoured, and still do, to the utmost of our power, that all parishes may have learned, pious, and sufficient preachers, and all such preachers competent livings. (6.)

REM. (6.) The King complained, that the Church of England was going to be destroyed to make way for Presbytery. The Parliament dares not say the contrary, for fear of discouraging the Presbyterians, nor own it, because it was not yet time to discover themselves so openly. They endeavour therefore to get off, by general terms, which signify nothing, that is, they have resolved to place in every Parish pious Ministers, and provide for their subsistence.

"Many other bills and propositions are in preparation for the King's profit and honour, the people's safety and prosperity: In the proceedings whereof we are much hindered by his Majesty's absence from the Parliament, which is altogether contrary to the use of his predecessors, and the privileges of Parliament, whereby our time is consumed by a multitude of unnecessary messages, and our innocence wounded by causeless and sharp invectives. Yet we doubt not, but we shall overcome all this at last, if the people suffer not themselves to be deluded with false and specious shewes, and so drawn to betray us to their own undoing, who have ever been willing to hazard the undoing of ourselves, that they might not be betrayed by our neglect of the trust reposed in us: But if it were possible they should prevail herein, yet we would not fail, through God's grace, still to persist in our duties, and to look beyond our own lives, estates, and advantages, as those who think nothing worth the enjoying, without the liberty, peace, and safety of the Kingdom; nor any thing too good to be hazarded in discharge of our consciences, for the obtaining of it: And shall always repose ourselves upon the protection of Almighty God, which we are confident shall never be wanting to us, (while we seek his glory,) as we have found it hitherto wonderfully going along with us in all our proceedings."

The King quickly answered this Manifesto. He had strong reasons to prevent betimes, the impressions it might make upon the minds of the people. As a war was unavoidable, the King and the Parliament were equally concerned to gain the people, and for this these Papers were intended. We have seen in the Parliament's Manifesto, the objections against the King reiterated, and we shall see in the King's, the same answers he had before given to each of the articles. These two Papers therefore may be considered as a recapitulation of whatever had been alleged pro and con, in the dispute between the King and the Parliament. Both flattered themselves, that their reasons were unanswerable, and proposed them with great confidence. Nor was this entirely without foundation, for both sides, reasoning upon different principles, might be in the right, according to their respective suppositions.

His Majesty's Answer to a Book, entitled, The Declaration or Remonstrance of the Lords and Commons of the 19th of May, 1642.

"If we could be weary of taking any pains for the satisfaction of our People, and to undeceive them of those specious mischievous insinuations which are daily instilled into them, to shake and corrupt their loyalty and affection to us and our Government, after so full and ample declaration of ourself and intentions, and so fair and satisfactory answers to all such matters as have been objected to us by a major part present of both Houses of Parliament, we might well give over this labour of our pen, and sit still till it shall please God so to enlighten the affections and understandings of our good Subjects on our behalf, (which we doubt not but that in his good time he will do) that they may see our sufferings are their sufferings. But since, instead of applying themselves to the method proposed by us, of making such solid particular propositions as might establish a good understanding between us, or of following the advice of our Council of Scotland (with whom they communicate their affairs) in forbearing all means that may make the breach wider and wound deeper; they have chosen to pursue us with new reproaches, or rather to continue and improve the old, by adding and varying little circumstances and language, in matters formerly urged by them, and fully answered by us. We prevailed with our self, upon very mature and particular consideration of it, to answer the late printed Book, entitled, A Declaration or Remonstrance of the Lords and Commons, which was ordered the 19th of May last to be printed and published, hoping then, that they would put us to no more of this trouble, but that that should have been the last of such a nature they would have communicated to our people, and that they would not, as they have done since, thought fit to assault us with a newer Declaration, indeed of a very new nature and learning, which must have another answer. (1.)

REMARK (1.) This was another Declaration of the second of June, whence it may be inferred, that this answer of the King to the first was not published till after that time.

"And we doubt not, but that our good Subjects in short time will be so well instructed in the differences and distinctions between us, that they will plainly discern, without resigning their reason and understanding to our Prerogative, or the infallibility of a now major part of both Houses of Parliament (infected by a few malignant spirits) where the fault is. (2.)

REM. (2.) The King begins in this Paper to represent the resolutions of the Parliament, not as being agreeable to the sentiments of the Nation, but as coming only from a disaffected party which prevailed in both Houses.

"Though we shall, with humility and alacrity, be always forward to acknowledge the infinite mercy and providence of Almighty God, vouchsafed so many several ways to ourself and this nation, yet since God himself doth not allow that we should lancy and create dangers to ourself, that we might manifest and publish his mercy in our deliverance, we must profess we do not know those deliverances mentioned in the beginning of that Declaration, from so many wicked plots and designs since the beginning of this Parliament, which if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and destruction upon this Kingdom. We well know, the great labour and skill hath been used to amaze and affright our good Subjects with fears and apprehensions of plots and conspiracies, the several pamphlets published, and letters scattered up and down, full of such ridiculous contemptible animadversions to that purpose, as (though they sound, for what end God knows, very unusual countenance) no sober man would be moved with them. But we must confess, we have never been able to inform ourself of any such pernicious formed design against the peace of this Kingdom, since the beginning of this Parliament, as is mentioned

" in that Declaration, or might be any warrant to those great fears, both our Houses of Parliament seem to be transported with; but we have great cause to believe, more mischief and danger hath been raised and begotten to the disturbance of this Kingdom, than cured or prevented by those fears and jealousies. And therefore, however the rumour and discourse of plots and conspiracies may have been necessary to the designs of particular men, they shall do well not to pay any false devotions to Almighty God, who discerns whether our dangers are real or pretended.

" For the bringing up of the army to London, as we have heretofore (by no other direction than the testimony of a good conscience) called God to witness, we never had, or knew any such resolution; so upon the view of the depositions now published with that Declaration, it is not evident to us, there was ever such a design, unless very loose discourse or argument be instance enough of a design. (3.)

REM. (3.) The King seems to vindicate himself very weakly upon this article. His whole answer lies in the ambiguity of the word Design, which may signify, either a bare project, or a settled and formed design. It is certain, there was a design or project to bring up the army to London, which the King knew of, and was proposed by Jermyn; but no resolution was taken thereon. The King denies, he knew of any such resolution, because indeed there was none. But he dares not deny, he was informed of the design or project to march the army to London. Wherefore, after having spoken of the design in general, he immediately changes the word into that of Resolution. Charles I., was very skilful in such sort of ambiguities.

" And it is apparent, that what was said of it, was near three months before the discovery to both Houses of Parliament: So that if there were any danger threatened that way, it vanished without any reluctance or prevention, by the wisdom, power, or authority of them. (4.)

REM. (4.) The Parliament insisted chiefly upon the King's intention, and endeavoured to prove the fact, in order to shew this intention. So it was not a proof of the King's having no ill intention, that the design of seducing the army, and bringing it up to London was not pursued.

" It seems the intention of that Declaration (whatsoever other end it hath) is to answer a Declaration they received from us, in answer to that which was presented to us at New-Market the 9th of March last; and likewise to our answer to the petition of both Houses, presented to us at York, the 20th of March last. But before that Declaration falls upon any particulars of our said Declaration or Answer, it complains, that the heads of the malignant party have, with much art and industry, advised us to suffer divers unjust scandals and imputations upon the Parliament, to be published in our name, whereby they might make it odious to the People, and by their help destroy it: But not intancing in any one scandal or imputation so published by us, we are still to seek for the heads of that malignant party. But our good Subjects will easily understand, that if we were guilty of that aspersion, we must not only be active in raising the scandal, but passive in the mischief begotten by that scandal, we being an essential part of the Parliament. (5.)

REM. (5.) This is only a subtlety grounded upon the ambiguity of the word Parliament. In the Declaration which the King is answering, by the term, Parliament, is meant both Houses, without including the King, and here the King means both Houses and the King together.

" And we hope the just defence of ourself and our authority, and the necessary vindication of our innocence and justice, from the imputation laid on us by a major part then present, by either or both Houses, shall no more be called a scandal upon the Parliament, than the opinion of such a part be reputed an Act of Parliament. And we hope our good Subjects will not be long misled by that common expression, in all the Declarations, wherein they usurp the word Parliament, and apply it to countenance any resolution or vote some few have a mind to make, by calling it, the resolution of Parliament, which can never be without our consent; neither can the vote of either, or both Houses, make a greater alteration in the Laws of this Kingdom (so solemnly made by the advice of their predecessors, with the concurrence of us and our ancestors) either by commanding or inhibiting any thing (besides the known rules of the Law) than our single direction or mandate can do, to which we do not ascribe the authority. (6.)

REM. (6.) This reason is invincible, supposing the Government in its natural state. But it could not make any impression upon those who believed the King intended to establish an arbitrary Power. 1647.

" But that Declaration informs our People, that the malignant party hath drawn us into the northern parts far from our Parliament: It might more truly and properly have said, that it hath driven, than drawn us hither. (7.)

REM. (7.) The Parliament understood by the malignant party the King's party, and here the King gives the same name to that of the Parliament.

" For we confess our journey hither (for which we have no other reason to be sorry, than with reference to the cause of it) was only forced upon us by the true malignant party, which contrived and countenanced those barbarous tumults, and other seditious circumstances, of which we have so often complained, and hereafter shall say more, and which indeed threatens so much danger to our person, and laid so much scandal upon the whole privilege and dignity of Parliament, that we wonder it can be mentioned without blushes or indignation: but of that anon. But why the malignant Party should be charged with causing a Preface to be transported to York, we cannot imagine; neither have any papers or writings issued from thence, to our knowledge, but what have been extorted from us by such provocations, as have not been before offered to a King. And no doubt it will appear a most trivial and fond exception, when all Prefaces are open to vent whatsoever they think fit to say to the People, (a thing unwarranted by former custom) that we should not make use of all lawful means to publish our just and necessary answers thereunto. As for the authority of the Great Seal, (though we do not know that it hath been necessary to things of this nature) the same shall be more frequently used hereafter, as occasion shall require (8.); to which we make no doubt the greater and better part of our Privy-Council will concur, and whose advice we are resolved to follow, as far as it shall be agreeable to the good and welfare of the Kingdom.

REM. (8.) The Parliament's Declaration was published the 19th of May, and three days after the Lord-Keeper Littleton went privately from London with the Great-Seal to the King. So the King had it in his hands when he published his answer. For this reason, he says, the same shall be more frequently used hereafter.

" Before that Declaration vouchsafes to insist on any particulars, it is pleased to censure both our Declaration and Answer, to be filled with harsh censures, and caustic charges upon the Parliament (still misapplying the word Parliament to the vote of both Houses) concerning which they resolve to give satisfaction to the Kingdom, since they find it very difficult to satisfy us. If, as in the usage of the word Parliament, they have left us out of their thoughts; so by the word Kingdom, they intend to exclude all our People, who are out of their walls, (for that's grown another phrase of the time, the vote of the major part of both Houses, and sometimes of one, is now called, The resolution of the whole Kingdom.) we believe it may not be hard to give satisfaction to themselves; otherwise we are confident (and our confidence proceeds from the uprightness of our own conscience) they will never be able so to sever the affections of us and our Kingdom, that what cannot be satisfaction to the one, shall be to the other. Neither will the stile of Humble and Faithful, and telling us, That they will make us a great and glorious King, in their Petitions and Remonstrances, to deceive our good Subjects, that they will pass over the reproaches, threats and menaces they are stuffed with, which sure could not be more gently reprehended by us, than by saying, their expressions were different from the usual language to Princes, which that Declaration tells us we had no occasion to say. But we believe, whoever looks over that Declaration presented to us at New-market, to which ours was an answer, will find the language throughout it to be so unusual, that, before this Parliament, it could never be paralleled; whilst under pretence of justifying their fears, they give so much countenance to the discourse of the Rebels of Ireland, as if they had a mind our good Subjects should give credit to it: otherwise, being warranted by the same evidence, which they have since published, they would have as well declared, That those rebels publicly threaten the routing out the name of the English, and that they will have a King of their own, and no longer be governed by us; as that they say, that they do nothing but by our authority, and that they call themselves the Queen's army. And therefore we have great reason to complain of the absence of justice and integrity in that Declaration, besides the unfitness of other expressions. Neither did we mistake the substance or logic of the message to us at

Theobalds,

1642. "Thebalds, concerning the Militia, which was no other, and is stated to be no other (even by that Declaration which reproved us) than a plain threat, That if we refused to join with them, they would make a law without us. Nor hath the practice since that time been other, which will never be justified to the most ordinary (if not partial) understandings, by the mere averring it to be according to the fundamental laws of this Kingdom, without giving any direction, that the most cunning and learned men in the laws may be able to find those foundations. (9.)

REM. (9.) There is here an ambiguity in the term Fundamental Law. The Parliament had clearly expressed what they meant by this fundamental Law, viz. if the King failed in the discharge of his duty, the Nation ought not, however, to be without defence, and in that case, it belonged to the Parliament to take care of it. Instead therefore of asking where this Law was, it seems, that the King should have shewn, either that, tho' he neglected his duty, it belonged not to the Parliament to meddle with the government of the State, or that he never had neglected, nor did still neglect it. For, according to the Parliament, though this Law was not expressed in any particular Statute, it naturally flowed from the constitution of the Government. The King seems, by requiring this Law to be produced, to insinuate, that the Parliament, in no case whatever, could intermeddle with the Government of the State, unless authorized by an express law, and yet the Parliament had alleged two cases, namely, the captivity and nonage of a King, wherein they might have the management of the Government, and they reckoned the King's negligence in the same class. To this the King should have returned an answer.

"And we must appeal to all the world, whether they might not, with as much justice, and by as much law, have seized upon the Estate of every Member of both Houses, who dissented from that pretended ordinance, (which much the major part of the House of Peers did two or three several times) as they have invaded that power of ours over the Militia, because we (upon reasons they have not so much as pretended to answer) refuse to consent to that proposition: (10.)

REM. (10.) The authority assumed by the Parliament, was not an ordinary authority, nor pretended to be so. It was extraordinary for the present supposed case, that there was great danger from the King. As therefore they had not the same suspicions of those who had at first refused their consent to the ordinance, they could not seize their estates upon the same foundation. Thus the consequence drawn by the King from the Parliament's usurpation, does not seem just.

"And if no better effects, than loss of time, and hindrance of the publick affairs, have been found by our answers and replies, let all good men judge, by whose default, and whose want of duty such effects have been: For as our end (indeed only end) in those answers and replies, hath been the settlement and composure of publick affairs, so we are assured, and most men do believe, That if that due regard and reverence had been given to our words, and that consent and obedience to our counsels, which we did expect, there had been before this time a cheerful calm upon the face of the whole Kingdom, every man enjoying his own, with all possible peace and security that can be imagined; which surely those men do not desire, who (after all those acts of justice and favour passed by us this Parliament, all those affronts and sufferings endured and undergone by us) think fit still to reproach us with Ship-money, Coat and Conduct-money, and other things so abundantly declared (as that Declaration itself confesses) in the general Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, published in November last, which we wonder to find now avowed to be the Remonstrance of both Houses, and which we are sure, was presented to us only by the House of Commons; and did never, and we are confident, in that time could never have passed the House of Peers; the concurrence and authority of which was not then thought necessary. Shall we believe those reproaches to be the voice of the Kingdom of England? That all our loving subjects, eased, refreshed, strengthened, and abundantly satisfied with our acts of grace and favour towards them, are willing to be involved in these unthankful expressions? We must appeal to the thanks and acknowledgments published in the Petitions of most of the Counties of England, to the testimony and thanks we have received from both Houses of Parliament, how seasonable, how agreeable this usage of us is to our merit, or their former expressions.

"We have not in the least swerved or departed from our resolution, or words, in the beginning of this Parliament. We said, we were resolved to put our self freely and clearly upon the love and affection of our "English subjects; and we say so still, as far as concerns England. And we call Almighty God to witness all our complaints and jealousies, which have never been causeless, not out of our Houses of Parliament, (but of some few schismatical, factious, and ambitious spirits, and upon such grounds, as short time, we fear, will justify to the world) our denial of the Militia, our absenting our self from London, have been the effects of an upright and faithful affection to our English subjects, that we may be able (through all the inconveniences we are compelled to wrestle with) at last, to preserve and restore their Religion, Laws, and Liberties unto them.

"Since the proceedings against the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members, is still looked upon, and so often pressed as so great an advantage against us, that no retraction made by us, nor no actions since that time committed against us, and the law of the Land, under the pretence of vindication of Privilege, can satisfy the contrivers of that Declaration, but that they would have our good subjects believe, the accusation of those five Members must be a plot, for the breaking the neck of the Parliament, (a strange arrogance, if any of those Members had the penning of that Declaration) and that it is so often urged against us, as if, by that single casual mistake of ours, (in form only) we had forfeited all duty, credit and allegiance from our People; we must, without endeavouring to excuse that, which in truth was an error, (our going to the House of Commons) give our People a clear and full narration of the matter of fact, assuring our self, that our good subjects will not find our carriage in that business such as hath been reported.

"When we resolved, upon such grounds, as, when they shall be published, will satisfy the world, that it was fit for our own safety and honour, and the peace of the Kingdom, to proceed against those persons (11.): tho' we well know there was no degree of privilege in that case, yet (to shew our desire of correspondency with the two Houses of Parliament) we chose, rather than to apprehend their persons by the ordinary ministers of Justice, (which, according to the opinion and practice of former times, we might have done) to command our Attorney-General to acquaint our House of Peers with our intention, and the general matter of our charge, (which was yet more particular than a mere accusation) and to proceed accordingly; and at the same time sent a sworn servant, a Sergeant at arms to our House of Commons, to acquaint them, That we did accuse, and intended to prosecute the five Members of that House for High-Treason, and did require that their persons might be secured in custody.

REM. (11.) I have already said, that the Parliament was chiefly offended; that the articles of the accusation exhibited by the Attorney-General, were levelled at the whole House of Commons, and a great number of Lords, as much as at the persons accused. Here, the King maintains the matter of the accusation, since it was for the peace of the Kingdom, and passes over in silence the reasons which he reserves for another time, and thereby his vindication cannot be full and perfect.

"This we did, not only to shew that we intended not to violate or invade their privileges, but to use more ceremony towards them, than we then conceived in justice might be required of us; and expected at least such an answer as might inform us, if we were out of the way: But we received none at all; only in the instant, without offering any thing of their privileges to our consideration, an order was made, (and the same night published in print) That if any person whatsoever should offer to arrest the person of any Member of that House, without first acquainting that House therewith, and receiving further orders from that House, that it should be lawful for such members, or any person, to assist them, and to stand upon his, or their guard of defence, and to make resistance according to the protestation taken, to defend the privileges of Parliament. And this was the first time that we heard the protestation might be wrested to such a sense; or that in any case, (though of the most undoubted and unquestionable privilege) it might be lawful for any person to resist, and use violence against a publick Minister of Justice, armed with lawful authority, though we well knew, that even such a Minister might be punished for executing such authority.

"Upon viewing this order, we must confess we were somewhat amazed, having never seen or heard of the like, though we had known Members of either House committed, without so much formality as we had used, and upon crimes of a far inferior nature to those we had suggested; and having no course propoed to us for our proceeding, we were upon the matter only told, That against those persons we were not to proceed at all:

"That they were above our reach, or the reach of the Law. It was not then easy for us to resolve what to do. (12.)

REM. (12.) This is a little disguised. The King was not told, that these Members were above the reach of the Law: but only, that the Parliament sitting, the Members could not be imprisoned without the consent of their House, and that it was expected the grounds of the accusation should be made known, in order to this consent.

"If we employed our ministers of justice in the usual way for their apprehension, (who, without doubt, would not have refused to execute our lawful commands) we saw what resistance and opposition was like to be made, which very probably might cost some blood. If we sate still, and desisted upon this terror, we should at the best have confessed our own want of power, and the weakness of the Law. In this strait we put on a sudden resolution to try, whether our own presence, and a clear discovery of our intentions (which haply might not have been so well understood) could remove those doubts, and prevent those inconveniences, which seemed to have been threatened; and thereupon we resolved to go in our own person to our House of Commons, which we discovered not till the very minute of our going; when we sent out, That our servants, and such Gentlemen as were then in our Court, should attend us to Wyminster: But giving them express command (as we have expressed in our answer to the ordinance) that no accidents of provocation should draw them to any such action as might imply a purpose of force in us: and our self (requiring those of our train not to come within the door) went into the House of Commons: The bare doing of which, we did not then conceive would have been thought more a breach of privilege, than if we had gone to the House of Peers, and sent for them to come to us, which is the usual custom. We used the best expressions we could, to assure them, how far we were from any intention of violating their Privileges; that we intended to proceed legally and speedily against the persons we had accused, and desired therefore, if they were in the House, that they might be delivered to us; or, if absent, that such course might be taken for their forth-coming, as might satisfy our just demands: and so we departed, having no other purpose of force, if they had been in the House, than we have before protested before God, in our answer to the ordinance. You have an account of our part of this story fully, let our people judge freely of it. What followed on their part, (tho' this Declaration tells you, it could not withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from us; it may be any part of theirs it did not) we shall have too much cause hereafter to inform the world.

"There will be no end of the discourse, and upbraiding us with evil counsellors, if, upon our constant denial of knowing any, they will not vouchsafe to inform us of them; and after eight months amusing the Kingdom with the expectation of a discovery of a malignant party, and of evil counsellors, they will not at last name any, nor describe them. Let the actions and lives of men be examined, who have contrived, counselled, actually consented to grieve and burden our people: And if such be about us, or any against whom any notorious malicious crime can be proved; if we shelter and protect any such, let our injustice be published to the world: But till that be done, particularly and manifestly, (for we shall never conclude any man, upon a bare general vote of the major part of either, or both Houses, till it be evident, that major part be without passion or affection) we must look upon the charge this Declaration puts on us, of cherishing and countenancing a discontented party of the Kingdom against them, as a base and malicious accusation, upon which we shall not, than any we have, or can lay upon the framers of that Declaration.

REM. (13.) With such restrictions one may eternally dispute: For who should be judge, whether the major part of the House were without passion or prejudice?

"And now to countenance those unhandsome expressions, whereby usually they have implied our connivance at, or want of zeal against the rebellion of Ireland, (so odious to all good men) they have found a new way of exprobration; That the Proclamation against those bloody Traitors came not out till the beginning of January, tho' that Rebellion broke out in October; and then by special command from us, but forty copies were appointed to be printed. It is well known where we were at that time, when that Rebellion brake forth, in Scotland; that we immediately from thence recommended the care of that business to both Houses of Parliament here, after we had provided for all fitting supplies from our Kingdom of Scotland: That after our return hither, we observed all those forms for that service, which we were advised to by our Council of Ireland, or both Houses of Parliament here; and if no Proclamations issued out sooner, (of which for the present we are not certain, but think that others before that time were issued by our direction) it was, because the Lords Justices of the Kingdom desired them no sooner, and when they did, the number they desired was but twenty, which they advised might be signed by us; which we for expedition of the service, commanded to be printed, (a circumstance not required by them) thereupon we signed more than our Justices desired. All which was very well known to some Members, of one or both Houses of Parliament, who have the more to answer, if they forbore to express it in the passing of this Declaration: And if they did express it, we have the greater reason to complain, that so envious an asperser should be cast on us to our people, when they know well how to answer their own objections. (14.)

REM. (14.) This answer appears something weak; for supposing forty copies would have been sufficient for Ireland, why was not the Proclamation published in England? The King returns no answer to what the Parliament said of the Proclamation against the Scots.

"What that complaint is against the Parliament, put forth in our name, which is such an evidence and countenance to the Rebels, and speaks the same language of the Parliament which the Rebels do, we cannot understand. All our answers and declarations have been, and are owned by us, and have been attested under our own hand; if any other had been published in our name, and without our authority, it would be easy for both Houses of Parliament to discover and apprehend the authors. And we wish, that whosoever was trusted with the drawing and penning of that Declaration, had no more authority or cunning to impose upon, or deceive the major part of those votes by which it passed, than any man hath to prevail with us to publish in our own name any thing, but the sense and resolution of our own heart: Or, that the contriver of that Declaration could, with as good a conscience, call God to witness, that all his counsels and endeavours have been free from all private aims, personal respects or passions whatsoever, as we have done and do, that we never had or knew of such resolutions of bringing up the army to London. And since this new device is found out, instead of answering our reasons, or satisfying our just demands, to blast our Declarations and Answers, as if they were not our own (a bold senseless imputation) we are sure, that every answer and declaration published by us, is much more our own, than any one of those bold, threatening, and reproachful Petitions and Remonstrances are the acts of either, or both Houses. And if the penner of that Declaration had been careful of the trust reposed in him, he would never have denied, (and thereupon found fault with our just indignation) in the text or margin, that we had never been charged with the intention of any force; and that in their whole Declaration, there is no word tending to such a reproach; the terms charged in that Declaration, that we sent our gracious messengers, when, with our privacy, bringing up the army to London. And since the Declaration they seek to make our people believe, some such thing to be proved in the world, is published, wherein, we do not deny, that we have done as they do in their censure of that Petition shewed formerly to us by Captain Legg, and subscribed by us with C. R. which, notwithstanding our full and particular narration of the substance of that Petition, the circumstances of our seeing and approving it, this Declaration is pleased to say, was full of scandal to the Parliament, and might have proved dangerous to the whole Kingdom. If they have this dangerous Petition in their hands, we have no reason to believe any tenderness to us-ward hath kept them from communicating it: If they have it not, we ought to have been believed. But that all good people may compute their other pretended dangers by their clear understanding of this, the noise whereof hath not been inferior to any of the rest, we have recovered a true copy of the very Petition we signed with C. R. which shall in fit time be published; and which we hope will open the eyes of our good people. (15.) Concerning our warrant for Mr. Jermyn's passage, our answer was true and full: But for his black satin suit, and white boots, we can give no account.

REM. (15.) This whole article of the answer seems very weak, since the King's defence consists only of his own testimony. There could not be a more proper occasion to publish this Petition, of which he said he had a true copy. But in deferring the publication to a more convenient time, he gave room to suspect, there were some things in the Petition which were not favourable to him.

"We complained in our Declaration, and as often as we have occasion to mention our return and residence near London, we shall complain, of the barbarous and seditious tumults at Westminster and Whitehall, which indeed were so full of scandal to our Government, and danger to our person, that we shall never think of our return thither, till we have justice for what is past, and security for the time to come. And if there were so great a necessity, or desire of our return as is pretended, in all this time, upon so often pressing our desires, and upon causes so notorious, we should at least have procured some order for the future. But that declaration tells us, we are upon the matter mistaken; The report of the Citizens to Westminster was as lawful as the report of great numbers every day in the term to the ordinary Courts of Justice. They knew no tumults. Strange! Was the disorderly appearance of so many thousand people with staves and swords, crying through the Streets, Westminster-Hall, the passage between both Houses, (inasmuch as the Members could hardly pass to and fro) No Bishops, down with the Bishops, no tumults? What Member is there of either House that saw not those numbers, and heard not those cries? And yet lawful Assemblies! Were not several Members of either House assaulted, threatened and ill treated? and yet no tumults! Why made the House of Peers a Declaration, and sent it down to the House of Commons, for the suppressing of tumults, if there were no tumults? And if there were any, why was not such a Declaration consented to and published? When the attempts were so visible, and the threats so loud to pull down the Abbey at Westminster, had we not cause to apprehend that such people would continue their work to Whitehall? Yet no tumults! What a strange time are we in! That a few impudent, malicious (to give them no worse term) men, should cast such a strange mist of error before the eyes of both Houses of Parliament, as that they either cannot, or will not see, how manifestly they injure themselves by maintaining these visible untruths? We say no more. By the help of God, and the Law, we will have justice for those tumults. (16.)

REM. (16.) The Parliament's Declaration contained two things upon this Article; First, That the concourse of people at Westminster was no tumult. Secondly, That the King's person was in no danger, since on the morrow he went through the City without a guard, and moreover staid several days at Whitehall in safety. The King answers here to the first of these things, and leaves the other without reply. Only he draws a consequence, that Whitehall was in danger, because the people threatened to pull down Westminster-Abbey, a circumstance which no where appears in the accounts of these tumults.

"From excepting (how weightily let every man judge) to what we have said, that Declaration proceeds to censure us for what we have not said, for the prudent omissions in our answer: We forbore to say any thing of the words spoken at Kensington, or the articles against our dearest comfort, and of the accusation of the six Members: Of the last we had spoken often, and we thought enough of the other two; having never accused any (though God knows what truth there might be in either) we had no reason to give any particular answer.

"We do not reckon our self bereaved of any part of our prerogative, which we are pleased freely for a time to part with by Bill; yet we must say, we expressed a great trust in our two Houses of Parliament, when we divested our self of the power of dissolving this Parliament, which was a just, necessary, and proper prerogative: But we are glad to hear their resolution, that it shall not encourage them to do any thing, which otherwise had not been fit to have been done; if it do, it will be such a breach of trust, God will require an account for at their hands.

"For the Militia, we have said so much in it heretofore, and the point is so well understood by all men, that we will waste time no more in that dispute. We never said there was no such thing as an ordinance, (though we know that they have been long disused) but that there was never any ordinance, or can be, without the King's consent; and that is true, and the unnecessary precedent cited in that Declaration doth not offer to prove the contrary. But enough of that, God and the Law must determine that business.

"Neither hath this Declaration given us any satisfaction concerning the Votes of the 15th and 16th of March last, which we must declare, and appeal to all the World in the point, to be the greatest violation of our privilege, the Law of the Land, the liberty of the Subject, and the right of Parliament, that can be imagined. One "of these Votes is, (and there needs no other to destroy the King and People) That when the Lords and Commons (it is well the Commons are admitted to their part in judicature) shall declare what the Law of the Land is, the same must be assented to, and obeyed; that is the sense in few words. Where is every man's property; every man's liberty? If a major part of both Houses declare that the Law is, that the younger brother shall inherit, what is become of all the families and estates in the Kingdom? If they declare, that by the fundamental Law of the Land, such a rash action, such an unadvised word ought to be punished by perpetual imprisonment, is not the liberty of the Subject, disrante bene placito, remediless? That Declaration confesseth, They pretend not to a power of making new Laws; that without us they cannot do that. They need no such power, if their Declaration can suspend this Statute from being obeyed or executed, and make this order, which is no Statute, to be obeyed and executed. If they have power to declare the Lord Digby, waiting on us to Hampton-Court, and thence visiting some officers at Kingston, with a coach and six horses, to be levying of war and high-Treason; and Sir John Holham's defying us to our face, keeping our town, fort, and goods against us by force of arms, to be an act of affection and loyalty, what needs a power of making new Laws? Or is there such a thing as Law left? We desire our good Subjects to mark the reason and consequence of these votes, the progress they have already made, and how infinite that progress may be. First, they vote the Kingdom is in imminent danger, (it is above three months since they discerned it) from enemies abroad, and a popish and discontented party at home: This is matter of fact, the Law follows. This vote hath given them authority by Law (the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom) to order and dispose of the Militia of the Kingdom, and with this power, and to prevent that danger, to enter into our towns, seize upon our magazine, and by force keep both from us. Is not this our case? First, They vote we have an intention to levy war against our Parliament (2), that is matter of fact: Then they declare, such as shall assist us, to be guilty of High-Treason; that is the Law, and proved by two Statutes, themselves know to be repealed: No matter for that, they declare it. Upon this ground they exercise the Militia, and so actually do that upon us, which they have voted we intend to do upon them. Who doth not see the confusion that must follow upon such a power of declaring? If they should now vote, that we did not write this Declaration, but that such an one did it, which is still matter of fact; and then declare, that for so doing he is an enemy to the Commonwealth; what is become of the Law that man was born to? And if all their zeal for the defence of the Law, be but to defend that which they declare to be Law, their own votes, it will not be in their power to satisfy any man of their good intentions to the public peace, but such who are willing to relinquish their titles to Magna Charta, and hold their lives and fortunes by a vote of a major part of both Houses. In a word, we deny not, but that they may have power to declare, in a particular doubtful case, regularly brought before them, what Law is; but to make a general declaration, whereby the known rule of the Law may be crossed or altered, they have no power, nor can exercise any, without bringing the life and liberty of the Subject, to a lawless and arbitrary subjection. (17.)

REM. (17.) It must have been a great mortification to the King, to be forced to show by such good arguments, the mischiefs that flow from arbitrary power. The same reasons used by the King, to demonstrate that arbitrary power was a natural consequence of the Parliament's maxims, served to prove, that it was equally hazardous to leave, not every King of England, but Charles I. in particular, invested with the authority allowed him by the Laws, considering the use he had already made of that power.

"We complained, (and let the world judge of the justice and necessity of that complaint) of the multitude of seditious pamphlets and sermons. And that Declaration tells us, they know we have ways enough in our ordinary Courts of Justice to punish those; so we have to punish tumults and riots, and yet they will not serve our turn to keep our towns, our forests, and parks from violence (3). And it may be, though those Courts have still the power to punish, they may have lost the skill to define what riots and tumults are; otherwise a Jury in Southwark, legally impanelled, to examine a riot there, would not have been superfluous,

(1) These Votes passed in the interval between the publication of the Parliament's Declaration, and that of the King's Answer. Rapin.

(2) This alludes to a disturbance which happened in the Park and Forest of Windsor. Ibid.

1642. "and the Sheriff enjoyed not to proceed, by virtue of "an order of the House of Commons, which it seems at "that time had the sole power of declaring. But it is "no wonder, that they who could not see the tumults, do "not consider the pamphlets and sermons, though the "Author of the Protestation protested, be well known to be "Burton (that infamous disturber of the peace of this "Church and State) and that he preached it at Westminster,
"in the hearing of divers Members of the House of "Commons: But of such pamphlets, and seditious "preachers (divers whereof have been recommended, if "not imposed upon several parishes, by some Members of "both Houses, by what authority we know not) we shall "hereafter take a further account. (18.)

R.E.M. (18.) These Sermons contained, for the most part, the maxims which the Parliament would have established, or pretended to be agreeable to the Laws; but which the King looked upon as seditious, and for that reason affirmed the Parliament ought to punish the authors.
This Burton was the same whose ears were cut off by the Star Chamber, and who was banished to Guernsey, for publishing a Treatise against the Church of England. It seems here, that the King was not pleased with the Parliament's reverting his sentence.

"We confess we have little skill in the Laws, and those "that have had most, we now find are much to seek.
"Yet we cannot understand or believe, that every ordi"nary Court, or any Court, hath power to raise what "guard they please; and under what command they
"please; neither can we imagine what dangerous effects
"they found by the guard we appointed them, or (in"deed) any the least occasion why they needed a guard
"at all.

"But of all the imputations so causelessly and unjustly
"laid upon us by that Declaration, we most wonder at "that charge to apparently and evidently untrue, That "such are continually preferred and countenanced by us, "who are friends or favourers or related unto the chief
"authors and actors of that arbitrary Power, heretofore "practised or complained of: And on the other side, that "such as did appear against it, are daily discountenanced
"and disgraced. We would know one person that con"tributed to the ills of those times, or had dependence "upon those that did, whom we do, or lately have coun"tenanced or preferred. Nay, we are confident (and we "look for no other at their hands) as they have been al"ways most eminent assertors of the publick Liberties;
"so, if they found us inclined to any thing not agreeable
"to honour and justice, they would leave us to-morrow:
"Whether different persons have not and do not receive "countenance elsewhere, and upon what grounds, let all "men judge; and whether we have not been forward
"enough to honour and prefer those of the most contrary "opinion, how little comfort soever we have had of those "preferences; in bestowing of which hereafter we shall "be more guided by men's actions than opinions. And "therefore we had good cause to bestow that admonition
"(for we assure you it was an admonition of our own)
"upon both our Houses of Parliament, to take heed of "inclining, under the specious shews of necessity and "danger, to the exercise of such an arbitrary power they
"before complained of: The advice will do no harm; and "we shall be glad to see it followed.

"And are all the specious promises, and loud professions
"of making us a great and glorious King, of settling a "greater revenue upon us than any of our ancestors have "enjoyed; of making us to be honoured at home, and "feared abroad; resolved into this, that they will be "ready to settle our revenue in an honourable proportion,
"when we shall put our self in such a posture of govern"ment, that our Subjects may be secure to enjoy our just "protection for their Religion, Laws, and Liberties?
"What posture of government they intend we know not,
"nor can we imagine what security our good Subjects
"can desire for their Religion, Laws, and Liberties,
"which we have not offered, or fully given. (19.)

R.E.M. (19.) Unhappily, since the violation of the Petition of Right, neither the King's word nor promises, nor even Acts of Parliament, had been deemed a sufficient security. At least, plausible reasons were alleged not to confide in them. Nothing but the Militia could satisfy the Parliament, and that was what the King would not willingly grant.

"And is it suitable to the duty and dignity of both "Houses of Parliament, to answer our particular weighty expressions of the causes of our remove from London (1642.

(so generally known to the Kingdom) with a scoff,
"That they hope we were driven from thence, not by "our own fears, but by the fears of the Lord Digby, and "his retinue of Cavaliers? Sure the penner of that Decla"ration inferred that ungrave and insolent expression, (as he "hath done divers others) without the consent or exanu-"nation of both Houses, who would not so lightly have "departed from their former professions of duty to us.

"Whether the way to a good understanding between "us and our people, hath been as zealously pressed by "them, as it hath been professed and desired by us, will "be easily discerned by those who observe, that we have "left no publick act undone on our part, which in the "least degree might be necessary to the peace, plenty,
"and security of our Subjects, and that they have not dis"patched one act, which hath given the least evidence of "their particular affection and kindness to us; but on the "contrary, have discountenanced and hindered the testi"mony other men would give to us of their affections;
"witness, the stopping and keeping back the bill of Sub"sidies granted by the Clergy almost a year since; which,
"though our perill wants are so notoriously known,
"they will not to this time pass: So not only forbearing
"to supply us ourselves, but keeping the love and bounty
"of other men from us, and afford no other answers to "all our desires, all our reasons, (indeed not to be an"swered) than, That we must not make our understand"ing or reason, the rule of our Government, but suffer
"our self to be assisted (which we never denied) by our "great Council. We require no other liberty to our will,
"than the meanest of them do, (we wish they would "always use that liberty) not to consent to any thing
"evidently contrary to our conscience and understanding;
"and we have and shall always give as much estimation
"and regard to the advice and counsel of both our Houses
"of Parliament, as ever Prince hath done; but we shall "never (and we hope our people will never) account
"the contrivance of a few (seditious, seditious persons,
"a malignant party, who would sacrifice the Common"wealth to their own fury and ambition) the wisdom of "Parliament: And that the justifying and defending such "persons, (of whom, and of their particular sinister ways
"to compass their own bad ends, we shall shortly inform "the world) is not the way to preserve Parliaments, but
"is the opposing and preferring the consideration of a few
"unworthy persons, before their duty to their King, or "their care of the Kingdom. They would have us re"member, that our resolutions do concern Kingdoms, and "therefore are not to be moulded by our own under"standing. We well remember it, but we would have "them remember, That when their consultations endea"vour to lessen the office and dignity of a King, they "meddle with that which is not within their determina"tion, and of which we must give an account to God
"and our other Kingdoms, and must maintain with the "sacrifice of our life.

"Lastly, That Declaration tells you, of a present def-
"perate and malicious plot, the malignant party is now
"acting, under the plausible notions of stirring men up "to a care of preserving the King's Prerogative, main"taining the discipline of the Church, upholding and con"tinuing the reverence and solemnity of God's service,
"and encouraging Learning, (indeed plausible and ho"nourable notions to act any thing upon) and that upon
"these grounds divers mutinous petitions have been framed "in London, Kent, and other places. Upon what grounds "would these men have petitions framed? Have so many "petitions (even against the form and constitution of the "Kingdom, and the Laws established) been joyfully re"ceived and accepted? And shall petitions framed upon "these grounds be called mutinous? Hath a multitude of "mean, unknown, inconsiderable, contemptible persons,
"about the City and Suburbs of London, had liberty to "petition against the government of the Church, against "the Book of Common-Prayer, against the freedom and "privilege of Parliament, and been thanked for it? And "shall it be called mutiny in the gravest and best Citizens "of London, in the gentry and commonalty of Kent, to "frame petitions upon these grounds (1), and to desire to "be governed by the known Laws of the Land, not by "orders or votes of either, or both Houses? Can this be "thought the wisdom and justice of both Houses of Par"liament? Is it not evidently the work of a faction writ-
"in or without both Houses, who deceive the trust repa-

(1) The Petitions here mentioned, from London and Kent, were about the Militia. For the London Petition, George Burdett, a rich Citizen, was compelled to prison: Where, after he had lain some time, the Lords bailed him; but the Commons committed him again the next day. — Whence the Petition was brought, which was by some Gentlemen of that County, with a great number of the substantial inhabitants, the City of London, who put strong guards placed at London bridge, where the Petitioners were disarmed, and only some few suffered to pass with the Petition to House of Commons. Upon the very thereof to the House of Commons, the bringers of the Petition were sharply reprehended; two or three of them committed to prison. The principal Gentlemen of the County, who had subscribed and desired it, sent for as Deputies; charged the House, and presented the Petition.

 "To stir up men to a care of preserving our Prerogative,
 "maintaining the discipline of the Church, upholding
 "and continuing the reverence and solemnity of God's "service, encouraging of Learning, is mutiny. Let heav"ven and earth, God and Man, judge between us and "these men. And however such petitions are there called "mutinous, and the petitioners threatened, discounten-
 "anced, censured, and imprisoned ; if they bring such law"ful petitions to us, we will graciously receive them, and "defend them and their rights against what power soever,
 "with the uttermost hazard of our being.

"We have been the longer (to our very great pain)
 "in this answer, that we might give the world satisfaction, "even in the most trivial particulars which have been
 "objected against us ; and that we may not be again re"proached with any more prudent ommissions. If we have "been compelled to sharper language than we affect, let "it be considered, how vile, how insufferable, our provo"cations have been : And except to repel force, be to "assault, and to give punctual and necessary answers to "rough and insolent demands, be to make invectives, we "are confident the world will accuse us of too much mild-"ness, and all our good Subjects will think we are not "well dealt with, and will judge of us, and of their own "happiness and security in us, by our actions ; which we

 "God upon them and us, than they shall be directed to "the glory of God, in the maintenance of the true Pro"testant Profession, to the preservation of the property, "and the liberty of the Subject, in the observation of the "Laws, and to the maintenance of the rights and free"dom of Parliament, in the allowance and protection of "all their just privileges."

Explication of the Differences between the King and Parliament.

After all these Papers in this second part of the reign of Charles I. one should, it seems, have a perfect knowledge of the differences between the King and the Parliament, and the subject be exhausted. Nevertheless, if the Reader should keep to the Papers published on both sides, he would not have a very clear idea of the cause of these differences.
 To this end, he must understand the motives which they took care not to discover in their Manifestos, published only with design to gain the approbation of the people. The following recital will, in my opinion, serve to give a clear and plain idea of these differences. I shall say nothing but what has been said in several places, and yet, I believe, it will not be superfluous, briefly to recapitulate the whole, which may be of service to show the grounds and causes of the Civil Wars.

It must be laid down as an undeniable fact, after what has been said, that the King had formed a design to establish an arbitrary Government in England. They who deny this, have only to seek in their imagination, a more natural cause of the people's discontent against his Government. But it is certain, whatever their system may be, they will never be able, without this, to reconcile it with the events, as to satisfy the impartial. The four preceding Parliaments considered all the King's proceedings, from the beginning of his reign, as tending to establish an absolute power. This was what they called their Grievances, the redress whereof they had frequently, though in vain, demanded.

Charles I. inherited the King his Father's mortal aversion to the Puritans or Presbyterians. He was, like him, persuaded, that their principles concerning Church-government, were directly opposite to Monarchy. They both went still farther. They believed not only, that all the Puritans were antimonarchical, but also, that all those who were against a despotick power were truly Puritans. This made Charles I. resolve to ruin such as were not submissive enough to his will, by confounding them all under the name of Puritans. To that purpose he admitted into his Council, and publick Offices, such only as were of his principles. Hence sprung all the severities exercised by the Council, the Star-Chamber, the High-Commission, the Judges, and all the Magistrates, upon those that, according to the notions of the Court, were infected with Puritanism, though many of these men were sincerely attached to the Church of England. Herein the King, contrary to his intention, did a very considerable service to the true Presbyterians, since he confounded their interests with those of a great number of people, who, otherwise, would have had no inclination to Presbyterianism. The truth is, they were both threatened with the same destruction. And therefore, in the elections for this last Parliament, many were returned of contrary principles to the King and Court. Among these, the Presbyterians were the most ardent, perceiving their ruin was determined, and would soon approach, if the King succeeded in his designs. Thus, the Presbyterian-party, which before made an inconsiderable figure in the Kingdom, grew very powerful, by the junction of the other sort of Puritans, whom the Court was pleased to confound with them.

On the other hand, Archbishop Laud and some of the Court-Bishops, devised a means, which could not fail to afford them occasions to persecute the Puritans. This was to enjoin with great rigour the observance of certain practices, which most people looked upon as indifferent. Nay, they added sundry innovations, which offended not only the Presbyterians, but also many Church of England men. This produced great murmurs. But people were not satisfied with complaining, they openly disobeyed, and their disobedience afforded a pretence to punishment. Hereby the Bishops, who were the chief authors of these innovations, made themselves so odious, that many believed to have just reason, to suspect a design to restore the Popish Religion, since the establishment of these innovations was so ardently pursued, which seemed to tend only to draw the Church of England nearer to that of Rome. If to this discontent be added that, occasioned by the King's Government, with regard to the liberties of the People and the privileges of the Parliament, it will not be difficult to conceive, that the nation in general was extremely dissatisfied.

Though, in this last Parliament there were many Presbyterians for the reason above mentioned, they were not however strong enough to form a Party capable of opposing that of the Church, had they at first discovered their intentions. So, it may be affirmed, that in general, the design of this Parliament, when they met, was not to overthrow the Church of England, and establish Presbyterianism in its room, though it can scarce be doubted, that this was the private aim of the Presbyterians. But, as their number was too small to oppose all the rest of the Parliament, they resolved to join with the opposite party to the King, for procuring the redress of grievances.
 Among these grievances, some concerned Religion, as the innovations which offended the Church-men no less than the Presbyterians themselves. Upon this subject, these last scrupled not to declaim strenuously when occasion offered, and to represent these grievances as being of very dangerous consequence. They could do it without discovering themselves too openly, because, as I said, most of the Members of Parliament were already prejudiced against the innovations and the conduct of the Bishops. As the King was extremely zealous for the Church of England, and of the number of those who considered the innovations and some other trifles as necessary to the solemnity of the publick worship, he opposed their suppression as much as possible, not directly, but by means of the Bishops, Popish Lords, and others of his Party. Wherefore the Presbyterians endeavoured to convince all the rest of the contrary party, that as long as the Bishops should sit in the House of Lords, it would be almost impossible to attain an entire redress of grievances. The House of Commons persisted therefore in so ordering it, that the Bishops votes should be taken away, wherein they met with great obstacles.
 But at length, by means of the tumults they frightened them away, and induced them to present the Protestation, which occasioned the sending of twelve of them to the Tower. By the same means, the Popish Lords were also forced to absent themselves from the Parliament.
 From that time the King's party became very weak, and the Presbyterians acquired new strength.

Afterwards, the Presbyterian party having gained so much ground, diligently applied themselves to cherish the dissention between the King and the Parliament. It was they that caused the Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom to be passed, which was presented to the King at his return from Scotland, and was as the signal of the Rupture. Unhappily, there was in the Presbyterian party, another party which concealed themselves, and were afterwards known by the name of Independents. This party, as they could not accomplish their secret designs without disorder and confusion, affected a rigid Presbyterianism, and strove to carry things to extremities, under colour of maintaining Presbyterianism, though in truth their intention was to destroy it as well as the Church of England.

Mean while, the King retiring to York, and perceiving a war unavoidable, sent private notice to all whom he thought his friends in both Houses, to leave the Parliament and repair to York or elsewhere. Many obeyed, and by their retreat, the Presbyterian party became superior in the two Houses. Before that time, when any thing was moved by the Presbyterians, tending to the subversion of the Church of England, those who had any regard for the Church did not fail to oppose it, and of this number were all the King's friends. But as soon as these were retired, the Presbyterian party, by their superiority in both Houses, passed whatever they pleased. This is what the King observed in several passages of his answer. Thus, the Presbyterian party prevailing in both Houses, and secretly intending to alter the Church-Government ; but the thing being impracticable, so long as the King should preserve his power, it is evident, that according to this project it was the Parliament's interest, which was directed by the Presbyterians, carefully to avoid whatever tended to an accommodation, which would have broken all their measures. But they took care not to discover entirely their designs. It was not yet time, till they had put it out of the King's power to prevent the execution. So, though they rendered their fears and jealousies of the King as plausible as possible, and though it should be granted, they had reason to suspect and fear, there is however room to think, that the danger they represented as being so near and imminent, was not so real as they pretended. Their grand aim, was to induce the King to begin the breach, wherein the King seems not to have soon enough perceived the snare that was laid for him.

As for the King, it is almost impossible to know perfectly his secret motives and intentions, because, since the opening of the Parliament, it had never been in his power to show them evidently, by any effects. It is true, he gave his assent to several advantageous Bills to the People, and thereby seemed to express a kind of repentance for his past conduct. But his situation, when he passed these Acts, made it something doubtful, whether he sincerely consented to the redress of grievances, or whether it was only to accommodate himself to the times. He assured, that his intention was to govern for the future according to Law, and called God to witness his sincerity. But they would not rely on his word. Thus much is certain, that whatever he said or did in favour of the Laws, was little agreeable to the principles he had followed for fifteen years. If they were persuaded, that his asseverations and promises were sufficient for the Nation's security, others thought to have just cause to question their sincerity, because they came at a time when he had no other refuge than the Laws to support himself, nor other means than his promise to observe them, to hinder the whole nation from entirely deserting him. I shall not pretend to decide so difficult a question, which is beyond human reach, there being none but God alone who knows perfectly what passes in the heart. I believe it rash to affirm, that Charles I. was not sincere in his promises. But I believe also, his sincerity may be doubted, since he had never opportunity to demonstrate it by effects.

Whatever was the King's private intention, he fully perceived that of the prevailing party in the Parliament, and saw that force alone could free him from his danger. His proposals for an agreement were rejected, and his promises to keep the Laws for the future, considered as so many snares, and unfortunately for him he had given but too much cause for distrust. He could not disown it with respect to what had passed before this Parliament; and even during this Parliament, he had taken some steps, which his enemies knew how to turn to their advantage. Such was the Plot to seduce the army, in which probably he was concerned, though he could affirm, he knew of no resolution to bring up the army to London. Such was the accusation of the six Members of Parliament, which could not but breed a suspicion of some hidden design. The project to secure Hull, his withdrawing to York, the Queen's voyage into Holland, the motive whereof was discovered in time, were things that helped not to cure the People's suspicions. So both Houses steadily keeping to the occasions of jealousy, fear and distrust, which they had, or pretended to have of the King, made use of them to convince the People, that there was no depending on his promises, unless it was put out of his power to break them. This occasioned the affair of the Militia, on account of which the King was drawn into a freight, from whence he could not get clear. For, by granting the Militia, he would himself have been subservient to the execution of the Parliament's designs, and by refusing it, he gave occasion to say, he was willing to agree with both Houses, without giving them other security than his word, which, as they pretended, could not be relied on. It is also true, that the King would not recede from any of his rights, neither would he offer other assurance than his word, to satisfy the Parliament.

After what has been seen, it will not be hard to perceive the ground of the quarrel, and the difficulties of an accommodation. That concerning the government of the Church, was one of the principal, though it may not be clearly explained in the Manifesto's of both parties. If the King's interests had been solely in question, perhaps he would have agreed to some concessions, at least, for a time. But he found, that one chief reason of his enemies desiring to lessen his authority, was, the more easily to accomplish a change in the ecclesiastical Government, which he thought himself bound in conscience to oppose to the utmost of his power. He was so strongly, and so sincerely attached to the Church of England, that he looked upon any concession which might tend to her ruin, as the blackest crime he could be guilty of, and persisted in this opinion, even when his affairs were grown desperate. All his Counsellors were of the same principles. They believed the episcopal Government of the Church to be absolutely necessary, that a Church without Bishops was no true Church in their opinion. On the other hand, the Presbyterians were no less possessed with their notions, and without distinguishing what is essential in Religion from what is only external, they considered the usages and practices of the Church of England as a sort of Popery. Besides, they were so convinced of the King's enmity to them, that they could not think themselves safe, so long as it was in his power to oppress them. Matters standing thus, it is evident, that force of arms alone was capable of obliging one or other party to yield.

A war being almost unavoidable, the Earl of Bristol, though he had no great reason to be pleased with the King, made his last effort to procure an accommodation, by a Speech in the House of Peers. He represented, that the thing was not impossible, if it was sincerely endeavoured. After having enumerated all the mischiefs of a civil war, and the calamities it is usually attended with, he moved to appoint a select Committee of both Houses, truly to state all the differences betwixt the King and the Parliament, with the most probable ways of reconciling them; what the King ought to do to satisfy the People, and what security he should give. He added several other things, which plainly showed, he inclined to the King's side, and because, which, he mentioned Religion but very slightly and in general terms, his Speech had no great effect.

The same, or the next day, the Commons voted:

"1. That it appeared, That the King, seduced by wicked counsels, intended to make war against the Parliament, who, in all their consultations and actions, had proposed no other end unto themselves, but the care of his Kingdom, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person."

"2. That whensoever the King made war upon the Parliament, it would be a breach of the trust reposed in him by his People, contrary to his oath, and tending to the dissolution of the Government."

"3. That whosoever should serve or assist him in such wars, would be traitors by the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom; and had been so adjudged by two Acts of Parliament, and ought to suffer as traitors, 11 K. 1. c. 35. II. Hen. IV. c. 11."

May the 22d, the Lord-Keeper Littleton delivered the Great-Seal to be carried to the King, and followed it himself the next morning, before the Parliament had any knowledge of it.

The 23d, both Houses sent a Petition to the King, to desire him to disband the Horse and Foot raised under colour of a guard for his person. They told him, if he did not dismiss these forces, they should be obliged to preserve the peace of the Kingdom by the most proper means. The King returned a very sharp answer to this Petition, reproaching both Houses, that they had raised a guard for themselves, and ordered the Sheriffs to oppose with the power of the Counties, such as should be drawn together by the King's command (2).

A war, as I said, was resolved on both sides; but each still proceeded with some caution, in order to cast the blame on the contrary party. For, in a civil war, it is chiefly the People that are wanted, because in them lies the strength of the two parties. The Earl of Bristol, in his Speech to the Lords, the 20th of May, observed, that it was not impossible to propound and settle the differences betwixt the King and the Parliament; but that the great difficulty consisted in finding such security, as might stand with the King's honour, and the People's satisfaction. He chiefly insisted upon this, that the King offering to give reasonable security, they were not to reject the offer, and charge themselves with the events of a war. As this offer, though made in very general terms, appeared plausible, the Parliament was apprehensive, it would make some impression on the People. And therefore, they judged it necessary, to show that the King, by this general offer, did however offer only his word for security, which could not be a firm foundation of a good agreement. To this end, they sent him, the 2d of June, nineteen Propositions, which they considered as proper to establish a good peace, and strict union between the King and the Parliament. The Propositions were these:

"1. That the Lords, and others of your Majesty's

(1) These Votes were passed before the King's Answer to the Parliament's Manifesto, and therefore are mentioned by him in that Answer. Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 712, 722.

642. "Privy-Council, and such great officers and ministers of State, either at home or beyond the seas, may be put from your Privy Council, and from those offices and employments, excepting such as shall be approved of by both Houses of Parliament; and that the persons put into the places and employments of those that are removed, may be approved of by both Houses of Parliament; and that the Privy-Council shall take an oath for the due execution of their places, in such forms as shall be agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament.

"2. That the great affairs of this Kingdom may not be concluded or transacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unworn Counsellors, but that such matters as concern the publick, and are proper for the High-Court of Parliament, which is your Majesty's great and supreme Council, may be debated, resolved, and transacted only in Parliament, and not elsewhere; and such as shall presume to do any thing to the contrary, shall be referred to the censure and judgment of Parliament: And such other matters of State, as are proper for your Majesty's Privy-Council, shall be debated and concluded by such of the Nobility and others, as shall from time to time be chosen for that place, by approbation of both Houses of Parliament: And that no publick Act concerning the affairs of the Kingdom, which are proper for your Privy-Council, may be esteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unless it be done by the advice and consent of the major part of the Council, attested under their hands; And that your Council may be limited to a certain number, not exceeding five and twenty, nor under fifteen. And if any counsellor's place happen to be void in the interval of Parliament, it shall not be supplied without the assent of the major part of the Council; which choice shall be confirmed, at the next sitting of Parliament, or else to be void.

"3. That the Lord High-Steward of England, Lord High-Constable, Lord-Chancellor, or Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, Lord-Treasurer, Lord Privy-Seal, Earl-Marshall, Lord-Admiral, Warden of the Cinque-Ports, chief Governor of Ireland, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Master of the Wards, Secretaries of State, two Chief-Justices and Chief-Baron, may always be chosen with the approbation of both Houses of Parliament, and, in the intervals of Parliament, by assent of the major part of the Council, in such manner as is before expressed in the choice of Counsellors.

"4. That he or they, unto whom the government and education of the King's children shall be committed, shall be approved of by both Houses of Parliament; and, in the intervals of Parliament, by the assent of the major part of the Council, in such manner as is before expressed in the choice of counsellors; and that all such servants as are now about them, against whom both Houses shall have any just exceptions, shall be removed.

"5. That no marriage shall be concluded, or treated for any of the King's children, with any foreign Prince or other person whatsoever, abroad or at home, without the consent of Parliament, under the penalty of a Præmunire, upon such as should conclude, or treat of any marriage as aforesaid; and that the said penalty shall not be pardoned or dispensed with, but by the consent of both Houses of Parliament.

"6. That the Laws in force against Jesuits, Priests, and popish Reculants, be strictly put in execution, without any toleration or dispensation to the contrary; and that some more effectual course may be enacted by authority of Parliament, to disable them from making any disturbance in the State, or eluding the Law by trusts, or otherwise.

"7. That the votes of popish Lords in the House of Peers may be taken away, so long as they continue Papists; and that your Majesty will consent to such a Bill as shall be drawn, for the education of the children of Papists by Protestants, in the Protestant Religion.

"8. That your Majesty will be pleased to consent, that such a reformation be made of the Church-government, and Liturgy, as both Houses of Parliament shall advise; wherein they intend to have consultations with Divines, as is expressed in their Declaration to that purpose; and that your Majesty will contribute your best assistance to them, for the raising of a sufficient maintenance for Preaching-ministers through the Kingdom; and that your Majesty will be pleased to give your consent to Laws, for the taking away of innovations and superstition, and pluralities, and against scandalous Ministers.

"9. That your Majesty will be pleased to rest satisfied with that course that the Lords and Commons have appointed for ordering of the Militia, until the same shall be farther settled by a Bill, and that your Majesty will recall your Declarations and Proclamations against the Ordinance made by the Lords and Commons concerning it.

"10. That such Members of either House of Parliament, as have, during the present Parliament, been put out of any place or office, may either be restored to that place and office, or otherwise have satisfaction made for the same, upon the petition of that House, whereof he or they are Members.

"11. That all Privy-Counsellors and Judges may take an oath, the form whereof to be agreed on, and settled by Act of Parliament, for the maintaining of the Petition of Right, and of certain Statutes made by the Parliament, which shall be mentioned by both Houses of Parliament; and that an enquiry of all the breaches and violations of those Laws may be given in charge, by the Justices of the King's Bench every term, and by the Judges of Assize in their Circuits, and Justices of the Peace at the Sessions, to be presented and punished according to Law.

"12. That all the Judges, and all the Officers placed by approbation of both Houses of Parliament, may hold their places, quamdiu bene se gesserint.

"13. That the justice of Parliament may pass upon all Delinquents, whether they be within the Kingdom, or fled out of it; and that all persons cited by either House of Parliament, may appear and abide the censure of Parliament.

"14. That the general Pardon offered by your Majesty may be granted, with such exceptions as shall be advised by both Houses of Parliament.

"15. That the forts and castles of this Kingdom may be put under the command and custody of such persons as your Majesty shall appoint, with the approbation of your Parliament; and in the intervals of Parliament, with the approbation of the major part of the Council, in such manner as is before expressed in the choice of Counsellors.

"16. That the extraordinary guards, and military forces now attending your Majesty, may be removed and discharged; and that for the future you will raise no such guards or extraordinary forces, but according to the law, in case of actual rebellion or invasion.

"17. That your Majesty will be pleased to enter into a more strict alliance with the States of the United Provinces, and other neighbour Princes and States of the Protestant Religion, for the defence and maintenance thereof, against all designs and attempts of the Pope and his adherents to subvert and suppress it, whereby your Majesty will obtain a great access of strength and reputation, and your Subjects be much encouraged and enabled in a Parliamentary way, for your aid and assistance, in restoring your Royal Sister and her Princely Issue to those dignities and dominions which belong unto them, and relieving the other Protestant Princes who have suffered in the same cause.

"18. That your Majesty will be pleased, by Act of Parliament, to clear the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the House of Commons, in such manner, that future Parliaments may be secured from the consequence of that evil precedent.

"19. That your Majesty will graciously be pleased to pass a Bill, for restraining Peers made hereafter, from sitting or voting in Parliament, unless they be admitted thereunto with the consent of both Houses of Parliament.

"And these our humble desires being granted by your Majesty, we shall forthwith apply ourselves to regulate your present revenue, in such sort as may be for your best advantage; and likewise to settle such an ordinary and constant increase of it, as shall be sufficient to support your royal Dignity in honour and plenty, beyond the proportion of any former grants of the Subjects of this Kingdom to your Majesty's royal Predecessors. We shall likewise put the town of Hull into such hands as your Majesty shall appoint, with the consent and approbation of Parliament, and deliver up a just account of all the magazine; and cheerfully employ the utmost of our power and endeavours in the real expression and performance of our most dutiful and loyal affections, to the preserving and maintaining the royal honour, greatness and safety of your Majesty and your posterity.

The King made to these Propositions, a long Answer, that is to say, with so long periods, and so frequent parentheses, that it is no easy task to translate it without losing something of its force.

The King's Answer to the Nineteen Propositions.

"Before we shall give you our answer to your Petition and Propositions, we shall tell you, that we are now clearly satisfied, why the method which we

1642. "traced out to you by our message of the 20th of January, and have since so often pressed upon you, as the proper way to compose the distractions of this Kingdom, and render it truly happy, hath been hitherto declined, and is at length not thought fit to be looked upon. We now see plainly, (and desire that you and all other our good Subjects should do so too) that the cabalists of this business have with great prudence reserved themselves, until due preparations should be made for their design. If they had unseasonably vented such propositions, as the wisdom and modesty of your predecessors never thought fit to offer to any of our progenitors; nor we in honour or regard to our regal authority, (which God hath intrusted us with for the good of our people) could receive without just indignation (and such many of your present propositions are) their hopes would soon have been blasted, and those persons, to whom offices, honours, power and commands were designed, by such ill-timing of their business, would have failed of their expectation, not without a brand upon the attempt. Therefore, before any thing of this nature should appear, they have (certainly, with great wisdom in the conduct of it) thought fit to remove a troublesome rub in their way, the Law, to this end, (that they might undermine the very foundations of it) a new power hath been assumed to interpret and declare Laws without us by extemporary votes, without any case judicially before either House, (which is in effect the same thing as to make Laws without us) orders and ordinances made only by both Houses, (tending to a pure arbitrary power) were pressed upon the People as Laws, and their obedience required to them.

"Their next step was, to erect an upstart authority without us (in whom, and only in whom the Laws of this realm have placed that power) to command the Militia, (very considerable to this their design.) In further order to it, they have wrested from us our magazine and town of Hull, and abetted Sir John Hotham in his bold-faced treason. They have prepared, and directed to the people, unprecedented invectives against our Government, thereby (as much as lay in their power) to weaken our just authority and due esteem among them; they have, as injuriously, as presumptuously, (though we conceive by this time, impudently itself is ashamed of it) attempted to cast upon us aspersions of an unheard-of nature, as if we had favoured a Rebellion in our own bowels. They have likewise broached a new doctrine, that we are obliged to pass all Laws that shall be offered to us by both Houses, (howsoever our own judgment and conscience shall be unsatisfied with them) a point of policy as proper for their present business, as destructive to all our rights of Parliament, and so with strange shamelessness will forget a clause in Law still in force, made in the second year of King Henry V. wherein both Houses of Parliament do acknowledge, that it is of the King's regality to grant or deny such of their Petitions as pleaseth himself. They have interpreted our necessary guard, legally assembled, for the defence of us and our children's persons, against a traitor in open rebellion against us (1), to be with intent to levy war against the Parliament, (the thought whereof our very soul abhorreth) thereby to render us odious to our People.

"They have awed our good Subjects with pursuivants, long chargeable attendances, heavy censures, and illegal imprisonments, that few of them durst offer to present their tenderness of our sufferings, their own just grievances, and their sense of those violations of the Law, (the birth-right of every subject in this Kingdom) though in an humble petition directed to both Houses; and if any aid, it was stifled in the birth, called Sedition, and burnt by the common hangman.

"They have restrained the attendance of our ordinary and necessary Household Servants (2), and seized upon those small sums of money, which our credit had provided to buy us bread, with injunctions that none should be suffered to be conveyed, or returned to us York, or any of our Peers or Servants with us; so that (in effect) they have blocked us up in that county.

"They have filled the ears of the People with the noise of fears and jealousies, (though taken up upon trust) tales of skippers, salt-fleets, and such like, by which alarms they might prepare them to receive such impressions as might best advance this design when it should be ripe. And now it seems they think we are sufficiently prepared for these bitter pills. We are in a handsome posture to receive these humble desires (which probably are intended to make way for a superintention of a (yet) higher nature, if we had not made this discovery to you) for they do not tell us this is all. In them we must observe, that these contrivers (the better to advance their true ends) disguised as much as they could their intents, with a mixture of some things really to be approved by every honest man; others, specious and popular; and some which are already granted by us, all which are cunningly twisted and mixed, with those other things of their main design of ambition and private interest; in hope, that at the first view, every eye may not so clearly discern them in their proper colours.

"We would not be understood, that we intend to fix this design upon both or either House of Parliament: We utterly profess against it, being most confident of the loyalty, good affection, and integrity of the intentions of that great Body; and knowing well, that very many of both Houses were absent, and many dissented from all those particulars we complain of: But we do believe, and accordingly profess to all the world, that the malignity of this design (as dangerous to the laws of this Kingdom, the peace of the same, and the liberties of all our good Subjects, as to ourselves and our just Prerogative) hath proceeded from the subtle informations, mischievous practices, and evil counsels of ambitious turbulent spirits, disaffected to God's true Religion, and the unity of the professors thereof, our honour and safety, and the public peace and prosperity of our People, not without a strong influence upon the very actions of both Houses. But how faulty (soever others are, we shall (with God's assistance) endeavour to discharge our duty with uprightness of heart; and therefore, since these propositions come to us in the name of both Houses of Parliament, we shall take a more particular notice of every of them.

"If the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 9th, 10th, 15th, 16th, 19th Demands, had been writ and printed in a tongue unknown to us and our People, it might have been possible we and they might have charitably believed the Propositions to be such, as might have been in order to the ends pretended in the Petition (to wit) the establishing of our honour and safety, the welfare and security of our Subjects and Dominions, and the removing those jealousies and differences, which are said to have unhappily fallen betwixt us and our people, and procuring both us and them a constant course of honour, peace, and happiness: But being read and understood by all, we cannot but assure ourselves, that this profession, joined to these Propositions, will rather appear a mockery and a scorn, the demands being such; as though we were unworthy of the trust reposed in us by the Law, and of our descent from so many great and famous ancestors, if we could be brought to abandon that power, which only can enable us to perform what we are sworn to, in protecting our People and the Laws, and so assume others into it, as to divest ourselves of it, although not only our present condition (which it can hardly be) were more necessitous than it is, and we were both vanquished, and a prisoner, and in a worse condition than ever the most unfortunate of our predecessors have been reduced to, by the most criminal of their Subjects. And though the bait laid to draw us to it, and to keep our Subjects from indignation at the mention of it, the promises of a plentiful and unparalleled revenue were reduced from generals (which signify nothing,) to clear and certain particulars; since such a bargain would have but too great a resemblance of that of Esaus, if we should part with such flowers of a Crown, as are worth all the rest of the garland, and have been transmitted to us from so many ancestors, and have been found so useful and necessary for the welfare and security of our Subjects, for any present necessity, or for any low and sordid considerations of wealth and gain. And therefore all men knowing that those accommodations are most easily made, and most exactly observed, that are grounded upon reasonable and equal conditions, we have great cause to believe, that the contrivers of these had no intention of settling any firm accommodation, but to increase those jealousies, and widen that division, which (not by our fault) is now unhappily fallen between us and both Houses.

"It is asked, that all the Lords and others of our Privy-Council, and such (we know not what you mean by such, but we have cause to think you mean all) great Officers and Ministers of State, either at home or beyond the seas, (for care is taken to leave out no person or place, that our dishonour may be sure not to be bounded within this Kingdom, though no subtle insinuations at such a distance can probably be believed to have been the cause of our distractions and danger) should be put from our Privy-Council, and from those "offices,

1642. "offices and employments, unless they be approved by "both Houses of Parliament, how faithful soever we have "found them to us and the publick, and how far soever
 "they have been from offending against any Law, the "only rule they had, or any others ought to have, to "walk by. We therefore to this part of this demand
 "return you this answer, that we are willing to grant,
 "that they shall take a larger oath than your selves desire "in your 11th demand, for maintaining not of any part,
 "but of the whole Law. (1.)

REMARK (1.) This is said, because in the whole body of the Law were contained those Laws, which ascribed to the King the Prerogatives they had a mind to deprive him of.

"And we have and do assure you, that we will be "careful to make election of such persons in those places
 "of trust, as shall have given good testimony of their "abilities and integrities, and against whom there can be "no just cause of exception, whereon reasonably to ground
 "a diffidence; that if we have or shall be mistaken in "our election, we have and do assure you, that there is "no man so near to us in place or affection, whom we "will not leave to the justice of the Law, if you shall "bring a particular charge and sufficient proofs against "him; and that we have given you (the best pledge of "the effects of such a promise on our part, and the best "security for the performance of their duty on theirs) a "Triennial Parliament, the apprehension of whose justice
 "will, in all probability, make them wary how they pro"voke it, and us wary how we charge such, as by the "discovery of their faults may in any degree seem to dif-
 "credit our election, but that without any shadow of a "fault objected, only perhaps because they follow their "consciences, and preserve the established Laws, and "agree not in such votes, or assent not unto such bills, as "some persons, who have now too great an influence even "upon both Houses, judge, or seem to judge to be for the "publick good, and as are agreeable to that new Utopia of "Religion and Government, into which they endeavour "to transform this Kingdom. (2.)

REM. (2.) This alludes to Sir Thomas Moor's Utopia.

"For we remember what names, and for what rea"sons, you left out in the Bill offered us concerning the "Militia, which you had your selves recommended in
 "the ordinance. We will never consent to the displacing
 "of any, whom, for their former merits from, and affec"tion to us and the publick, we have intrusted; since "we conceive, that to do so would take away both from
 "the affection of our Servants, the care of our service, "and the honour of our justice; and we the more wonder
 "it should be asked by you of us, since it appears by the "12th demand, that you your selves count it reasonable,
 "after the present turn is served, that the Judges and Of"ficers who are then placed, may hold their places quam"diu se bene gesserint; and we are resolved to be as "careful of those we have chosen, as you are of those you "would choose, and to remove none till they appear to "us to have otherwise behaved themselves, or shall be "evicted by legal proceedings to have done so.

"But this demand, as unreasonable as it is, is but one "link of a great chain, and but the first round of that "ladder, by which our just, antient, regal power, is en"deavoured to be fetched down to the ground. For it "appears plainly, that it is not with the persons now cho"sen, but with our chusing, that you are displeased; for "you demand, that the persons put into the places and "employments of those who shall be removed, may be "approved by both Houses; which is so far (as to some at "first sight it may appear) from being less than the power "of nomination, that of two things (of which we will "never grant either) we would sooner be content, that "you should nominate, and we approve, than you ap"prove, and we nominate; the mere nomination being so "far from being any thing, that if we could do no more,
 "we would never take the pains to do that, when we "should only hazard those whom we esteemed, to the "scorn of a refusal, if they happened not to be agreeable,
 "not only to the judgment, but to the passion, interest,
 "or humour, of the present major part of either House.

"Not to speak now of the great factions, animosities,
 "and divisions, which this power would introduce in both "Houses, between both Houses, and in the several Coun"ties, for the choice of persons to be sent to that place
 "where that power was, and between those persons that "were so chosen. Neither is this strange potion prescribed "to us only for once, for the cure of a present pressing "desperate disease, but for a diet to us and our posterity:
 "It is demanded, that our Counsellors, all chief Officers,
 "both of Law and State, commanders of Forts and Cas"tles, and all Peers hereafter made (as to voting, with"out which, how little is the rest?) be approved of (that "is, chosen) by them from time to time; and rather "than it should ever be left to the Crown, (to whom "it doth and shall belong) if any place fall void in the in"termission of Parliament, the major part of the approved

 "Council is to approve them; neither is it only demand"ed, That we should quit the power and right our pre"decessors have had, of appointing persons in these pla"ces, but for Counsellors we are to be restrained, as well "in the number as in the persons, and a power must be "annexed to these places, which their predecessors had "not; and indeed, if this power was passed to them, it "were not fit we should be trusted to chuse those who "were to be trusted as much as we.

"It is demanded, that such matters as concern the pub"lick, and are proper for the High Court of Parliament, "(which is our great and supreme Council) may be de"bated, resolved, and transacted, only in Parliament, and "not elsewhere; and such as presume to do any thing to "the contrary, shall be referred to the censure and judg"ment of the Parliament; and such other matters of State,
 "as are proper for our Privy Council, shall be debated
 "and concluded, by such of our Nobility, (tho' indeed,
 "if being made by us, they may not vote without the "consent of both Houses, we are rather to call them
 "your Nobility) and others, as shall be from time to time
 "chosen for that place, by approbation of both Houses "of Parliament; and that no publick Act concerning "the affairs of the Kingdom, which are proper for our "Privy-Council, may be effected of any validity, as "proceeding from the royal authority, unless it be done by "the advice and consent of the major part of our Coun"cil, attested under their hands; which demands were of "that nature, that to grant them, were in effect, at once
 "to depose both our self, and our posterity.

"These being past, we may be waited on bare-headed,
 "we may have our hand kissed, the stile of Majesty con"tinued to us, and the King's authority declared by both "Houses of Parliament, may be still the stile of your "commands; we may have swords and maces carried
 "before us, and please our self with the sight of a Crown "and Scepter; (and yet even these twigs would not long "flourish, when the stock upon which they grew were "dead) but as to true and real power, we should remain
 "but the outside, but the picture, but the sign of a King.
 "We were ever willing that our Parliament should de"bate, resolve, and transact, such matters as are proper "for them, as far as they are proper for them, and we "heartily with, that they would be as careful not to ex"tend their debates and resolutions, beyond what is pro"per to them, that multitudes of things punishable, and "causes determinable by the ordinary judicatures, may not "be entertained in Parliament, and so cause a long, charge"able and fruitless attendance of our people, and (by de"grees) draw to you, as well all the causes, as all the "faults, of Westminster-Hall, and divert your proper bu-"sines: That the course of Law be no ways diverted,
 "much less disturbed, as was actually done by the stop
 "of the proceedings against a riot in Southwark, by or"der of the House of Commons, in a time so riotous
 "and tumultuous, as much increased the danger of popu"lar infolencies, by such a countenance to riots, and dis-
 "countenance of Law: That you descend not to the lei"sure of recommending Lecturers to Churches, nor as"cend to the legislative power, by commanding (the Law
 "not having yet commanded it) that they whom you "recommend be received, although neither the Parson
 "nor Bishop do approve of them; and that the refusers
 "(according to the course so much formerly complained of
 "to have been used at the Council-table) be not sent for
 "to attend to shew cause at least, that you would con"sider conveniency, if not Law, and recommend none
 "but who are well known to you to be orthodox, learned,
 "and moderate, or at least such as have taken Orders,
 "and are not notorious depravers of the Book of Com"mon-Prayer; a care which appeareth by the discourses, "sermons, and persons of some recommended by you, not "to have been hitherto taken; and it highly concerns
 "both you in duty, and the Common-wealth in the con"sequences, that it should have been taken: That neither "one Estate transact what is proper for two, nor two what "is proper for three; and consequently, that (contrary to "our declared will) our forts may not be seized, our arms
 "may not be removed, our monies may not be stoppt, our "legal directions may not be countermanded by you, nor
 "we desire to countermand them our self; nor such en"trances made upon a real war against us, upon pretence
 "of an imaginary war against you, and a chimera of ne"cessity. So far do you pass beyond your limits, whilst
 "you seem by your demand, to be strangely straitened
 "within them; at least we could have wished, you would "have expressed what matters you meant as fit to be "transacted only in Parliament, and what you meant by "only in Parliament.

"You

"You have of late been persuaded, by the new doctrine of some few, to think that proper for your debates, which hath not used to be at all debated within those walls, but been trusted wholly with our predecessors and us; and to transact those things, which, without the regal authority, since there were Kings of this Kingdom, were never transacted: It therefore concerns us the more, that you speak out, and that both we and our People may either know the bottom of your demands, or know them to be bottomless. What concerns more the publick, and is more (indeed) proper for the High Court of Parliament, than the making of Laws, which not only ought there to be transacted, but can be transacted no where else? But then you must admit us to be a part of the Parliament; you must not (as the sense is of this part of the demand, if it have any) deny the freedom of our answer, when we have as much right to reject what we think unreasonable, as you have to propose what you think convenient or necessary: nor is it possible our answers, either to Bills, or any other propositions, should be wholly free, if we may not use the liberty of every one of you, and of every Subject, to receive advice (without their danger who shall give it) from any person, known or unknown, sworn or unsworn, in these matters, in which the manage of our vote is trusted by the Law, to our own judgment and conscience; which how best to use, is (and ever shall be) left likewise to us: And most unreasonable it were, that two Estates proposing something to the third, that third should be bound to take no advice, whether it were fit to pass, but from those two that did propose it. We shall ever in these things, which are trusted wholly to us by the Law, not decline to hearken to the advice of our great Council, and shall chuse to hear willingly the free debates of our Privy-Council, (whensoever we may be suffered to have them for sending forth, and they shall not be terrified from that freedom by votes, and brands of malignants and enemies to the State, for advising what no Law forbids to advise) but we will retain our power, of admitting no more to any Council than the nature of the business requires, and of discoursing with whom we please, of what we please, and informing our understanding by debate with any persons, who may be well able to inform and advise us in some particulars, though their qualities, education, or other abilities, may not make them so fit to be of our sworn Council; and not tie our self up not to hear any more than twenty five (and these not chosen absolutely by us) out of a Kingdom so replenished with judicious and experienced persons of several kinds. And though we shall (with the proportionable consideration due to them) always weigh the advices both of our Great and Privy-Council, yet we shall also look upon their advices as advices, not as commands or impositions; upon them as our counsellors, not as our tutors and guardians; and upon our self as their King, not as their pupil or ward: For whatsoever of Regality were, by the modesty of interpretation, left us, in the first part of the second demand, as to the Parliament, is taken from us in the second part of the same, and placed in this new-fangled kind of Counsellors, whose power is such, and so expressed by it, that in all publick Acts concerning the affairs of this Kingdom, which are proper for our Privy-Council, (for whose advice all publick Acts are sometimes proper, tho' never necessary) they are desired to be admitted joint Patentees with us in the Regality; and it is not plainly expressed, whether they mean us so much as a single vote in these affairs; but it is plain, they mean us no more at most, than a single vote in them, and no more power than every one of the rest of our Privy-Counsellors only leave to us, out of their respect and duty, (and that only is left of all our ancient power) a choice, whether these that are thus to be joined with (or rather set over) us, shall be fifteen or twenty five: And great care is taken, that the oath which these men shall take, shall be such, in the framing the form of which (though sure we are not wholly unconcerned in it) we may be wholly excluded, and that wholly reserved to be agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament.

"And to shew that no more care is taken of our safety, than of our power, after so great indignities offered to us, and countenanced by those who were most obliged to relent them: After our town and fort kept from us, (from which, if it were no otherwise ours, than the whole Kingdom is, we can no more legally be kept out, than out of our whole Kingdom, which sure your selves will not deny to be treason) our arms, our goods sent away, and our money stopped from us, our guards (in which we have no other intention, than to hinder the end of these things from being proportionable to their beginnings) are not only desired to be dismissed, before satisfaction for the injury, punishment of the injurers, and care taken for our future security from the like. But it is likewise desired (and for this, Law is pretended, and might as well have been for the rest, which yet with some ingenuity, are it seems acknowledged to be but desires of grace) that we shall not for the future raise any guards, or extraordinary forces, but in case of actual rebellion or invasion; which if it had been Law, and so observed in the time of our predecessors, few of those victories, which have made these nations famous in other parts, could have been legally achieved: Nor could our blessed predecessor Queen Elizabeth have so defended herself in eighty eight. And if no forces must be levied till rebellions and invasions (which will not stay for the calling of Parliaments, and their consent for raising of forces) be actual, they must undoubtedly (at least most probably) be effectual and prevalent.

"And as neither care is taken for our rights, honour nor safety, as a Prince; so our rights, as a private person, are endeavoured to be had from us; it being asked, that it may be unlawful and punishable, not only to conclude, but even to treat of any marriage with any person for our own children, or to place governors about them, without consent of Parliament; and in the intermission of these, without the consent of our good Lords of the Council; that we may not only be in a more deplorable state than any of our predecessors, but in a manner and viler condition than the lowest of our Subjects, who value no liberty they have more, than that of the free education and marriage of their children, from which we are asked to debar our self; and have the more reason to take it ill that we are so, because of our choice of a governor for our Son, and a husband for our Daughter, (in which the Protestant Religion was our principal consideration) we conceived we had reason to expect your present thanks, and the increase of your future trusts.

"We suppose these demands by this time to appear such, as the demanders cannot be supposed to have any such real fear of us, as hath been long pretended; they are too much in the title, not only of equals, but of conquerors; and as little to be intended for removing of jealousies, (for which end they are said to be asked; and that is not as Merchants ask at first, much more than they will take, but as most necessary to effect it, which (if they be) God help this poor Kingdom, and those who are in the hands of such persons, whose jealousies nothing else will remove) which indeed is such a way, as if there being differences and suits between two persons, whereof one would have from the other several parcels of his ancient Land, he should propose to him, by way of accommodation, that he would quit to him all those in question, with the rest of his estate, as the most necessary and effectual means to remove all those suits and differences: But we call God to witness, that as for our Subjects fake these rights are vested in us, so, for their sakes, as well as for our own, we are resolved not to quit them, nor to subvert (though in a parliamentary way) the ancient, equal, happy, well-poised, and never-enough commended constitution of the government of this Kingdom; nor to make our self of a King of England, a Duke of Venice, and this of a Kingdom, a Republick.

"There being three kinds of Government among men, absolute Monarchy, Aristocracy, and Democracy; and all these having their particular conveniences and inconveniences; the experience and wisdom of our ancestors, hath so moulded this out of a mixture of these, as to give to this Kingdom (as far as human prudence can provide) the conveniences of all three, without the inconveniences of any one, as long as the balance hangs even between the three Estates, and they run jointly on in their proper channel, (begetting verdure and fertility in the meadows on both sides, and the overflowing of either on either side, raise no deluge or inundation. The ill of absolute Monarchy, is tyranny; the ill of Aristocracy, is faction and division; the ill of Democracy, are tumults, violence, and licentiousness. The good of Monarchy, is the uniting a nation under one Head, to resist invasion from abroad, and insurrection at home: The good of Aristocracy, is the conjunction of Council in the ablest persons of a State for the publick benefit: The good of Democracy, is liberty, and the courage and industry which liberty begets.

"In this Kingdom, the Laws are jointly made by a King, by a House of Peers, and by a House of Commons, chosen by the People, all having free votes and particular privileges. The Government, according to these Laws, is trusted to the King; power of Treaties, of War, and Peace, of making Peers, of choosing Of-“ nefit of Confiscations, power of pardoning, and some “ more of the like kind are placed in the King. And “ this kind of regulated Monarchy, having this power to “ preserve that authority; without which it would be dis“ abled to preserve the Laws in their force, and the Sub“ jects in their liberties and properties, is intended to “ draw to him such a respect and relation from the great “ ones, as may hinder the ills of division and faction;

 “ and such a fear and reverence from the People, as may “ hinder tumults, violence, and licentiousness.

“ Again, That the Prince may not make use of this “ high and perpetual power to the hurt of those for whose “ good he hath it; and make use of the name of publick “ Necessity, for the gain of his private favourites and fol“ lowers, to the detriment of his People, the House of “ Commons, (an excellent conferrer of liberty, but “ never intended for any share in Government, or the “ chusing of them that should govern) is solely intrusted “ with the first propositions concerning the levies of mo“ nies, (which is the sinews as well of peace as of war)
 “ and the impeaching of those, who for their own ends, “ though countenanced by any surreptitiously gotten com“ mand of the King, have violated that Law, which he “ is bound (when he knows it) to protect; and to the “ prosecution of which they were bound to advise him,
 “ at least not to serve him in the contrary. And the “ Lords being trusted with a judicatory power, are an ex“ cellent screen and bank between the Prince and People;
 “ to assist each against any encroachments of the other;
 “ and by just judgments to preserve that Law, which “ ought to be the rule of every one of the three. For the “ better enabling them in this, beyond the examples of “ any of our ancestors, we were willingly contented to “ oblige our self, both to call a Parliament every three “ years, and not to dissolve it in fifty days: And for the “ present exigent, the better to raise money, and to “ avoid the pressure; (no less grievous to us than them)
 “ our People must have suffered by a longer continuance “ of so vast a charge as two great armies; and for their “ greater certainty of having sufficient time to remedy the “ inconveniences arisen, during so long an absence of Par“ liaments, and for the punishment of the causers and “ ministers of them, we yielded up our right of dissol“ ving this Parliament, expecting an extraordinary mode“ ration from it, in gratitude for so unexampled a grace, “ and little looking that any malignant party should be “ encouraged, or enabled to have perverted them, first,
 “ to countenance the injustices and indignities we have “ endured, and then by a new way of satisfaction for “ what was taken from us, to demand of us at once to “ confirm what was so taken, and to give up almost all “ the rest.

“ Since therefore the power, legally placed in both “ Houses, is more than sufficient to prevent and refrain
 “ the power of tyranny; and without the power, which “ is now asked from us, we shall not be able to discharge “ that trust, which is the end of monarchy, since this “ would be a total subversion of the fundamental laws, and “ that excellent constitution of this Kingdom, which hath “ made this nation, for many years, both famous and happy
 “ to a great degree of envy; since to the power of pun-“ nishing, (which is already in your hands according to “ law) if the power of preferring be added, we shall have “ nothing left for us but to look on; since the encroach“ ing of one of these Estates upon the power of the other,
 “ is unhappy in the effects, both to them and all the rest;
 “ since this power, of at most a joint Government in us
 “ with our counsellors (or rather our guardians) will re“ turn us to the worst kind of minority, and make us “ despicable both at home and abroad, and beget eternal “ factions and dissensions (as destructive to publick hap“ piness as war) both in the chosen, and in the Houses “ that chose them, and the People who chose the “ chusers; since so new a power will undoubtedly intox-“ cate persons who were not born to it, and beget not “ only divisions among them as equals, but in them con“ tempt of us, as become an equal to them, and insolence “ and injustice toward our People, and now so much their “ inferiors, which shall be the more grievous unto them,
 “ as suffering from those who were so lately of a nearer “ degree to themselves: And being to have redress only “ from those that placed them; and fearing they may be “ inclined to preserve what they have made, both out of “ kindness and policy, since all great changes are extremely “ inconvenient, and almost infallibly beget yet greater “ changes, which beget yet greater inconveniences.

“ of the Kingdom; since the second Estate would in all “ probability follow the fate of the first, and by some of “ the turbulent spirits, jealousies would soon be raised a“ gainst them, and the like propositions for reconciliation “ of differences would be then sent to them, as they now “ have joined to fend to us till (all power being vested in “ the House of Commons, and their number making them “ incapable of transacting affairs of State with the neces“ sary service and expedition, those being entrusted to “ some close Committee) at last the common people (who “ in the mean time must be flattered, and to whom li“ cence must be given in all their wild humours, how “ contrary soever to established Law, or their own real “ good) discover this Ancient Imperij. That all this “ was done by them, but not for them; and grow weary “ of journey-work, and set up for themselves, call parity “ and independence Liberty; devour that Estate which “ had devoured the rest; destroy all rights and properties, “ all distinctions of families and merit; and by this means
 “ this splendid and excellently distinguished form of Go“ vernment, end in a dark equal chaos of confusion, and
 “ the long line of our many noble ancestors in a Jack “ Cade, or a Wat Tyler.

“ For all these reasons, to all these demands our answer
 “ is, Nolumus Leges Angliæ mutari: But this we promise; “ that we will be as careful of preserving the Laws, in “ what is supposed to concern wholly our Subjects, as in “ what most concerns our self: For indeed we profess to “ believe, that the preservation of every Law concerns “ us, those of obedience being not secure, when those of “ protection are violated; and we being, most of us, in“ jured in the least violation of that, by which we enjoy
 “ the highest rights and greatest benefits, and are therefore “ obliged to defend no less by our interest, than by our “ duty, and hope that no jealousies to the contrary shall be “ any longer nourished in any of our good people, by the “ subtle insinuations, and secret practices of men, who “ for private ends, are disaffected to our honour and safety, “ and the peace and prosperity of our People. And to “ shew you, that no just indignation at so reproachful of“ fers, shall make us refuse to grant what is probable to “ conduce to the good of our good People, because of the “ ill company it comes in, we will search carefully in this “ heap of unreasonable demands, for so much as we may “ (complying with our conscience, and the duty of our “ trust) assent unto, and shall accordingly agree to it.

“ In pursuance of which search in the fourth proposi“ tion, under a demand, which would take from us that “ trust, which God, Nature, and the Laws of the Land
 “ have placed in us, and of which none of you could en“ dure to be deprived, we find something to which we “ give this answer, That we have committed the princi“ pal places about our children to persons of quality, integ“ rity and piety, with special regard that their tender “ years might be so seasoned with the principles of the “ true Protestant Religion, as (by the blessing of God “ upon this our care) this whole Kingdom may in due “ time reap the fruits thereof: And as we have been like“ wise very careful in the choice of servants about them, “ that none of them may be such, as by ill principles, or
 “ by ill examples, to cross our endeavours for their pious “ and virtuous education; so if there shall be found (for “ all our care to prevent it) any person about our chil“ dren, (or about us, which is more than you ask) a“ gainst whom both Houses shall make appear to us any “ just exception, we shall not only remove them, but “ thank you for the information; only we shall expect that “ you shall be likewise careful, that there be no under“ hand dealing by any, to seek faults, to make room for “ others to succeed in their places.

“ For the fifth demand, as we will not suffer any to “ share with us in our power of treaties, which are most “ improper for Parliaments, and least of all in those trea“ ties in which we are nearest concerned, not only as a “ King, but as a Father; yet we do (such is our desire “ to give all reasonable satisfaction) assure you by the word
 “ of a King, that we shall never propose or entertain “ any treaty whatsoever for the marriage of any of our “ children, without due regard to the true Protestant “ Profession, the good of our Kingdom, and the honour
 “ of our Family.

“ For the sixth demand, concerning the Laws in force “ against Jesuits, Priests, and Popish Recusants, we have,
 “ by many of our messages to you, by our voluntary “ promises to you so solemnly made, never to pardon any “ Popish Priest, by our strict Proclamations lately pub“ lished in this point, and by the publick examples which “ we have made in that case since our residence at York,
 “ and before at London, sufficiently expressed our zeal here“ in. Why do you then ask that in which our own in“ clination hath prevented you? And if you can yet

" find any more effectual course to disable them from disturbing the State, or eluding the Law by trust, or otherwise, we shall willingly give our consent to it.

" For the seventh demand, concerning the votes of the Popish Lords; we understand, that they in discretion have withdrawn themselves from the service of the House of Peers, (and had done so when use was publicly made of their names to asperse the votes of that House, which was then counted as malignant, as those, who are called our unknown and unworn counsellors, are now;) neither do we conceive, that such a positive Law against the votes of any whose blood gives them that right, is so proper in regard of the Privilege of Parliament, but are content, that so long as they shall not be conformable to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England, they shall not be admitted to sit in the House of Peers, but only to give their proxies to such Protestant Lords as they shall choose, who are to dispose of them as they themselves shall think fit, without any reference at all to the giver.

" As to the desires for a bill for the education of Papists by Protestants in the Protestant Profession, many about us can witness with us, that we have often delivered our opinion, that such a course (with God's blessing upon it) would be the most effectual for the rooting Popery out of this Kingdom; we shall therefore thank you for it, and encourage you in it, and when it comes unto us, do our duty: And we heartily wish for the publick good, that the time you have spent in making ordinances without us, had been employed in preparing this and other good bills for us.

" For the eighth, touching the reformation to be made of the Church-Government and Liturgy, we had hoped, that what we had formerly declared concerning the same, had been so sufficiently understood by you, and all good Subjects, that we should not need to have expressed our self further in it. We told you in our answer to your petition, presented to us at Hampton-Court the first of December, that for any illegal innovations which may have crept in, we should willingly concur in the removal of them; and if our Parliament should advise us to call a national Synod, which may duly examine such ceremonies as give just cause of offence to any, we should take it into consideration, and apply our self to give due satisfaction therein; that we were persuaded in our conscience, that no Church could be found upon the earth, that professeth the true Religion with more purity of Doctrine than the Church of England doth, nor where the Government and Discipline are jointly more beautified, and free from superstition, than as they are here established by Law. Which, (by the grace of God) we will with constancy maintain (while we live) in their purity and glory, not only against all invasions of Popery; but also from the irreverence of those many schismatics and separatists, wherewith of late this Kingdom, and our city of London abounds, to the great dishonour and hazard both of Church and State; for the suppression of whom we required your timely and active assistance. We told you in our first Declaration, printed by the advice of our Privy-Council, That for differences amongst our selves for matters indifferent in their own nature concerning Religion, we should, in tenderness to any number of our loving Subjects, very willingly comply with the advice of our Parliament, that some Law might be made for the exemption of tender consciences from punishment, or prosecution for such ceremonies, and in such cases, which by the judgment of most men are held to be matters indifferent, and of some to be absolutely unlawful; provided that this case should be attempted and pursued with that modesty, temper, and submission, that in the mean time the peace and quiet of the Kingdom be not disturbed, the decency and comeliness of God's service discountenanced, nor the pious, sober, devout actions of those reverend Persons who were the first labourers in the blessed Reformation, or of that time, be scandalized and defamed. And we heartily wish, that others whom it concerned, had been as ready as their duty bound them, though they had not received it from us, to have pursued this caution, as we were, and still are willing and ready to make good every particular of that promise. Nor did we only appear willing to join in so good a work, when it should be brought us, but pressed and urged you to it by our message of the 14th of February, in these words: And because his Majesty observes great and different troubles to arise in the hearts of People, concerning the Government and Liturgy of the Church, his Majesty is willing to declare, that he will refer the whole consideration to the wisdom of his Parliament, which he desires them to enter into speedily, that the present distractions about the same may be composed; but desires not to be pressed to any single act on his part, till the whole be so digested and settled by both Houses, that his Majesty may clearly see what is fit to be left, as well as what is fit to be taken away: Of which we the more hoped of a good success to the general satisfaction of our People, because you seem in this proposition to desire but a Reformation, and not, as is daily preached for as necessary in those many conventicles, which have within these nineteen months begun to swarm, and which, though their leaders differ from you in this opinion, yet appear to many as countenanced by you, by not being punished by you (few else, by reason of the order of the House of Commons of the 9th of September, daring to do it) a destruction of the present Discipline and Liturgy. And we shall most cheerfully give our best assistance for raising a sufficient maintenance for preaching Ministers, in such course as shall be most for the encouragement and advancement of piety and learning.

" For the Bills you mention, and the consultation you intimate, knowing nothing of the particular matters of the one (though we like the titles well) nor of the manner of the other, but from an informer, (to whom we give little credit, and we with no man did more) common fame, we can say nothing till we see them.

" For the eleventh, we would not have the oath of all Privy-Counsellors and Judges straitened to particular Statutes of one or two particular Parliaments, but extend to all Statutes of all Parliaments, and the whole Law of the Land; and shall willingly consent, that an enquiry of all the breaches and violations of the Law may be given in charge by the Justices of the King's Bench every term, and by the Judges of Assize in their circuits, and Justices of the Peace at the Sessions, to be presented and punished according to Law.

" For the seventeenth, we shall ever be most ready, (and we are sorry it should be thought needful to move us in it) not only to join with any (particularly with the States of the United Provinces, of which we have given a late proof in the match of our Daughter) for the defence and maintenance of the Protestant Religion against all designs and attempts of the Pope and his adherents; but singly (if need were) to oppose with our life and fortune all such designs in all other nations, were they joined: And that for considerations of conscience, far more than any temporal end of obtaining access of strength and reputation, or any natural end of restoring our Royal Sister and her Princely Issue to their dignities and dominions, though these be likewise much considered by us.

" For the eighteenth, it was not our fault that an Act was not passed to clear the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the House of Commons, but yours, who inserted clauses into both the preamble and Act, (perhaps persuaded to it by some who with not that you should in any thing receive satisfaction from us) as by passing the preamble, we must have wounded our honour, gained our conscience, and by another clause have admitted a consequence, from which we could never have been secured, by declaring, that no member of either House, upon any accusation of treason, could have his person seized without the consent of that House of which he is a member; though the known Law be, That Privilege of Parliament extends not to Treason; and if it did, any member (the House being for a short time adjourned, and so their consent not being so had) how treasonable soever his intentions were, how clearly soever known, and how suddenly soever to be executed, must have fair leave given him to go on, and pursue them, no way, how legal soever, after the passing such a clause, being left to prevent it. (3).

REMARK. (3.) The King, in showing the inconveniences of this clause, lays down a case different from that of the six members accused. For he supposes, to demonstrate these inconveniences, that the treason is manifest, and just going to be executed. Whereas the difference between the King and the Parliament consisted, in that the Parliament desired to see the proofs, before they consented to the prosecution of their Members. Besides, this maxim, that the privileges of Parliament extend not to treasonable cases, is very ambiguous. For it may signify, either that in case of real, manifest, or apparent treason, the members of Parliament have no more privilege than the rest of the Subjects, or else that by a bare accusation of treason, true or false, a Member may be committed to prison like any other private person. The King took it, and would have it taken, in this last sense, but the Parliament would admit it only in the first. But that the King's sense was wrong, evidently appears, in that when, for instance, a Peer is accused of treason, he is not sent to the Tower, according to the usual course of Justice, as a private person would be, but by order of his House, which thinks proper to consent to his prosecution. Without this consent, the King cannot send him to the Tower by his own authority.

1642. rity, and upon a bare accusation. In short, no less inconveniences would attend the King's fence, since in that case the King, upon bare accusations, true or false, might imprison all the principal members of both Houses.

"To conclude, we conjure you, and all men, to rest satisfied with the truth of our professions, and the reality of our intentions, not to ask such things as deny themselves; that you declare against tumults and punish the authors; that you allow us our propriety in our towns, arms and goods, and our share in the legislative power, which would be counted in us not only breach of privilege, but tyranny and subversion of Parliaments, to deny to you. And when you shall have given us satisfaction upon those persons who have taken away the one, and recalled those Declarations (particularly that of the 26th of May) and those in the point of the Militia (our just rights, wherein we will no more part with than with our Crown, left we enable others by them to take that from us) which would take away the other, and declined the beginnings of a war against us, under pretence of our intention of making one against you; as we have never opposed the first part of the thirteenth demand, so we shall be ready to concur with you in the latter.

"And being then confident, that the credit of those men, who desire a general combustion, will be so weakened with you, that they will not be able to do this Kingdom any more harm, we shall be willing to grant our general pardon, with such exceptions as shall be thought fit, and shall receive much more joy in the hope of a full and constant happiness of our People in the true Religion, and under the protection of the Law, by a blessed union between us and our Parliament (so much desired by us) than any such encrease of our revenue, (how much sooner beyond former grants) as (when our Subjects were wealthiest) our Parliament could have settled upon us."

I shall make but one general remark upon this answer of the King, and which to me seems absolutely necessary, namely, that all the beginning, which includes two thirds, is entirely needless, since the King treats not of the point in dispute between him and the Parliament. The question was not to know, whether the Laws ascribed such and such power to the King, but to know, whether the King having abused this power, his promise, that he would govern according to the Law of the Land, was to be depended upon for the future. The King, throughout the beginning of his answer, supposes an ignorance of what is due to a King of England, or a careless denial of the same. As to the first point, he pretends to acquaint the publick with the nature of the English Constitution, which was very needless, since no body disagreed with him. He keeps to the general position acknowledged by all the world, but says not a word to the particular question, which was the sole subject of the dispute. As to the second point, he does not deny that he had abused his Power, but makes no other answer to the consequence drawn by the Parliament from this abuse, than that he promises to behave better for the future.

It is easy to see, that neither the Parliament's propositions, nor the King's answer, were proper to beget an accommodation. Accordingly, it may be affirmed, that neither side thought of any such thing. When the King published his answer, he had received some arms, ammunition, and pieces of Ordnance from Holland, and besides that, was preparing to besiege Hull. Though great part of the arms were now removed to London, he hoped still to find there sufficient for his most urgent occasions. Moreover, this place, which was one of the strongest in the Kingdom, could be of great service to him, to keep the adjacent Country in his interest.

On the other hand, the Presbyterian party, who then prevailed in the Parliament, had almost attained their desire, that is, had brought things to a rupture, which gave them room to hope, they should quickly have opportunity to accomplish the rest of their project. Indeed, this rupture between the King and the Parliament being supposed, it was manifest, the Kingdom was to be governed by the Parliament and the King, separately, and not jointly, as before, that is, they would each govern those of their party; in which case, the Parliament would have no more occasion for the King's consent, who would be looked upon as an enemy, and consequently, they might ordain whatever they pleased, without any opposition. This was precisely the point to which all the proceedings of the Presbyterian party had tended, without their discovering themselves however, any more than was necessary to support the expectations of their adherents. For till now it highly concerned them to make the Publick, and the Members who were not of their side, believe, that they acted in conjunction with the other Members, only with the view of vindicating the common Liberty, against the encroachments of the King.

It is certain, that from the beginnings, there was in this Parliament, a Presbyterian party, whose aim was to alter the Church-government. But that this was the sole aim of the Presbyterians, as many assert, is what does not to me appear evident. Why might not these men, in striving to erect their discipline upon the ruins of the Church, have another end, I mean, the prevention of the King's and his party's encroachments upon the publick Liberty. There were, certainly, in this very Parliament, Members who were very far from being Presbyterians, and yet had the same end: Why might not the Presbyterians have it too, jointly with that which was peculiar to them? Is it so uncommon a thing, to see people propose to themselves two different ends, in one and the same undertaking? I confess, I do not see the improbability of such a supposition. The Presbyterian party therefore must be considered as acting with those two views, and this is so true, that undeniable proofs of it will appear in the sequel of this reign. But their enemies have been pleased to ascribe to them the first only, in order to charge them with putting the Kingdom in a flame, for the sake of establishing the Presbyterian Government in the Church. I do not deny, that this motive contributed very much to it. But it does not follow, that the reasons on which the Parliament refused to confide in the King, were frivolous. The contrary may be rather inferred. For if these reasons had not been plausible, the Presbyterians would never have been able to execute their projects, and form so strong a party in a Kingdom, where, at the beginning of this Parliament, they made so inconsiderable a figure. But they politically made use of the general discontent, which actually subsisted, to bring matters to the point they desired. They cannot be said to have caused this universal discontent, though it is certain, they helped to inflame it, because it was necessary to their views.

The Parliament having received advice from Holland, that the Queen had pawned or sold some of the Crown-jewels at Amsterdam, published the 2d. of June, an order, declaring, that whosoever was concerned in the selling or pawning these Jewels, or in the bringing any money to the King, by way of bill of exchange, or otherwise, should be accounted an enemy to the State. But the Queen had already laid out the money in purchasing arms and ammunition, which she had conveyed to the King, in a small Ship called the Providence, which, the very day the Parliament published this order, safely arrived in Burlington Bay, after having been warmly pursued by part of the Parliament's fleet, commanded by the Earl of Warwick (1).

Some time before, the King finding a war unavoidable, had ordered his friends in both Houses, to absent themselves from the Parliament. He hoped, by lessening so considerably the number of the Members, to lessen the credit of the Parliament. But this policy turned not to his advantage. It is true, both Houses were considerably lessened in number. But withal, the King's party there grew so weak, that they could no longer oppose the resolutions taken against the King. Though the two Houses were not sorry to be rid of these spies, they believed however, it was necessary to take some measures, either to hinder a greater desertion, or to convince the people, it was not their fault if the Parliament was not so numerous as hitherto. The Commons therefore ordered all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, to give notice to the Representatives, to attend the House by the 16th of June, on the forfeiture of one hundred pounds, [to be employed in the wars in Ireland] and on pain of undergoing such farther punishment as the House should think fit.

But the Lords went still farther, for they ordered nine of their Members (2), who had repaired to the King at York, to appear at the bar the 8th of June as Delinquents. These nine Lords having sent their excuse by a letter, July 20, the Commons forthwith prepared an impeachment against them, and sent it up to the Lords. The 27th of the same month (3), the Peers pronounced sentence against the nine Lords, declaring, they should not fit or vote in the House during the present Parliament, and should stand committed to the Tower during the pleasure of the House.

These were little preludes to the war which was going to be kindled. But the 10th of June, both Houses gave a more evident proof of their design; for upon receiving advice, that the King was actually giving out Commissions to levy forces, they published proposals for the bringing in of money or plate, [at eight per cent] for the defence of the Kingdom (1). This is what the King's friends will have to be considered as the first declaration of war on the Government's side, and pretend thereby to show, that both Houses were the aggressors. But it is certain, the King, long before, had taken measures to prepare for war, and there is no doubt the Parliament had done the same, though perhaps more secretly than the King. Be this as it will, after having seen what were the true grounds and causes of the war, it seems of little moment to know, which of the two parties first discovered the measures taken, whether to attack or defend. For that at most is the meaning of the question, Which of the parties began the war?

The King having notice of what the Parliament had done for the speedy raising of money, writ to the Lord Mayor of London, commanding him to publish his Letter, wherein he forbid the Citizens to lend any money to both Houses. This letter occasioned their publishing a Declaration, the aim whereof was to show the people, that the Parliament was under an absolute necessity of preparing for their defence. They said, his Majesty having so often threatened them about Hull and the Militia, they could not but consider his preparations as a design to levy war against his Parliament.

The King made to this Declaration a long answer, full of reproaches of the illegal proceedings of both Houses against him. He did not deny, that he intended to have justice in the cases of Hull and the Militia, or lose his life in requiring it; and affirmed, that this was no proof of a design to make war against the Parliament, but only of his intention to defend himself against their attacks. The Parliament said the same thing on their part, and each endeavoured to cast the blame of the war on the opposite party. I did not think it necessary to insert these last Papers, there being nothing new in them. They contain the same reproaches, and the same vindications on both sides, as were seen in the former Declarations. I shall only observe, that even when the war was going to commence, and there was no more hopes of an accommodation, the King thought it very strange, that his prerogatives should be violated, and the Parliament raise forces without his approbation. He always used the same stile, even in the very midst of the war. In short, the Parliament, weary of these paper skirmishes, of which there was no end, and which consumed a great deal of time, prohibited, by a printed order, the publishing any declarations or papers in the King's name, that should be contrary to the ordinances of the Parliament. After that, there was no hope of peace, and accordingly, all thoughts of it were laid aside by both parties.

The King, before he came to an open declaration, had a mind to execute two designs he had formed. The first was, to become master of the Fleet; the second, to besiege Hull. The project of the Fleet was solely founded in the expectation, that the Captains of the Ships would declare for him as soon as commanded. In this belief, he writ to each Captain in particular, requiring him, without delay, and without demanding the orders of his superiors, to bring away his Ship to Burlington Bay, and yield no further obedience to the Earl of Warwick. He sent withal a letter to the Earl of Warwick, to discharge him from the command of the Fleet. The letters to the Captains were to be delivered, as indeed they were, before that directed to the Earl of Warwick. The King dispatched at the same time a messenger to London, to carry to the Earl of Northumberland a revocation of his commission of Admiral, under the Great Seal. The Earl of Warwick, who was then on shore, having notice of what passed in the Fleet, went immediately on board his Ship, and summoned all the Captains to attend him at a Council of War. All obeyed, notwithstanding the King's orders, except five, who united together to make their defence, in case they should be attacked. The rest protested to their Admiral, they would obey his commands. As soon as he had secured these half, he caused them to come to an anchor round the five others, to force them to submit. But three of them thought fit to come in upon a summons. The two that still remained obstinate, suffered themselves to be shamefully taken by unarmed boats, and were sent to London. Thus the King was disappointed of his aim, for which, though of great importance, he had not doubtless taken very proper measures, as appeared by the event (2).

After this fruitless attempt, the King believed it in vain to dissemble any longer, and that he must at last begin the war. To that end, he ordered [William Cavendish] Earl of Newcastle to secure the town of Newcastle; which was performed, though with some difficulty, and then he caused also Tinnmouth Castle to be seized. At the same time, he sent many Lords and Gentlemen into their respective shires to levy forces, and by a Patent under the Great Seal, appointed [William Seymour] Earl of Hertford, his Lieutenant-General of the western Counties. He kept near his person [Robert Barre] Earl of Lindsey, to be, under him, General of his army. Sir Jacob Ashley was General of the Foot; and the place of General of the Horse, was reserved for Prince Rupert, the King's nephew, and brother to the Elector Palatine, who was daily expected.

Though the King had pretended to raise only a guard for his person, it was found however, that in the beginning of July, he had about three thousand Foot, and seven or eight hundred Horse, with which he resolved to march to Hull. He stayed some days at Beverly, and published a Proclamation, to signify his intention to besiege Hull, and the reasons that induced him thereto. As they have already been mentioned, it is needless to repeat them. Three days after, he sent the Proclamation to the Parliament, with a message, requiring them, that the town of Hull might be forthwith delivered to him.

Before the Parliament received this message, they had resolved to present a Petition to his Majesty, to pray him, in a very humble manner, to forbear all preparations for war; to remove his forces from about Hull; to dismiss his troops; to send away his garrisons from Newcastle, Tinnmouth, and other places; for which they promised also, on their part, to discontinue all the preparations they had been forced to make for their defence. The King returned a long answer in writing to this Petition, wherein he repeated great part of what he had said in his Declarations. He made likewise some propositions to both Houses, allowing them to the 27th of July for a full and positive answer.

The Parliament having returned an unsatisfactory answer to the propositions, the King resolved to begin the siege of Hull. But this enterprize was so unsuccessful, that after having been some time before the town, without making any progress, he was obliged to raise the siege, or rather blockade, and return to York. The Earl of Clarendon says, the King undertook the siege of Hull, upon the assurance given him by Sir John Hotham, that he would surrender the town at the first shot, but that it was not possible for Hotham to perform his word (3).

The King, as I before said, had, some months since, gained Colonel Goring Governor of Portsmouth, who feigning to keep the place for the Parliament, held it indeed for the King. He received money from both sides, to reinforce the garrison and raise new works, the Parliament not mistrusting him, and the King relying on his word. At last, about the time the King was before Hull, Goring openly declared for him. This happened in the beginning of August, but three weeks after the Parliament had issued orders for levying an army, to be commanded by [Robert Devereux] Earl of Essex (4). This army not being yet ready, both Houses, though astonished at Goring's defection, were not however discouraged. As it was of the utmost importance to recover this place, the strongest efforts in the Kingdom, before the King should be able to relieve it, they hastily dispatched a committee, whom they empowered to assemble the Militia of the neighbouring counties, to block up Portsmouth by land, whilst the Earl of Warwick, by their order, blocked it up by Sea. Happily for the Parliament, Goring, though he had received from them three thousand pounds, and the like sum from the King, had neglected to lay in the necessary provisions for a siege, and particularly corn and salt, so that in the very beginning of the blockade, he perceived, he could not resist long. This made him resolve to capitulate. He sur-

And this, he says, induced the King to march to Beverly, in order to besiege Hull, before he had any thing in readiness for such an undertaking. Clarendon, Tom. 1. p. 56. 57.

The King's During the blockade of Portsmouth, the King not doubting but Goring was in condition to defend that place, published at last a Declaration that had long been prepared, wherein he sums up all the complaints he had already made against both Houses. As the Reader is sufficiently informed, there is no occasion to insert here this new Declaration. Only it must be remarked, that the King declared both Houses guilty of High-Treason, and forbid all his Subjects to obey them: At the same time was also published a Proclamation, requiring all men who could bear arms, to repair to him by the 25th of August at Nottingham, where he intended to set up his royal Standard, which all good Subjects were obliged to attend. The setting up of the royal Standard was the antient manner of making known to the People the King's urgent occasion for their aid, and the place to which they were to repair to assist him. The King could not forbear thinking, he was still to be considered as an ordinary King, and to have the same respect and obedience paid to him, as if he had never given his People any cause of complaint. He imagined, that the acts of grace he had passed in this Parliament, and his promises to behave better for the future, had effaced all the ill impressions made by his past Government upon his Subjects, and that, though there was a powerful party against him in the Parliament, it was otherwise among the People. He thought therefore, the setting up of his Standard would make a strong impression on the People, and induce them to appear in arms at Nottingham. But the prejudices were too deeply rooted in the minds of most of the Subjects, for a bare ceremony to remove them.

Whilst the day appointed for the setting up of the Standard was expected, the King endeavoured to augment the number of his Forces. He gave out fresh commissions, and sent the Earl of Hereford and some other Lords [and Gentlemen] to manage his concerns, and raise troops, in the Western parts. For himself, he departed from York some days before the 25th of August, and in his way took Lincoln, from whence he drew the arms of the trained-bands for his troops, after which he came to Nottingham, and the next day reviewed his Horse.

The review was no sooner ended, but he was informed that two regiments of Foot were marching to Conventry by the Earl of Essex's orders. Whereupon he hastened thither with his cavalry, consisting of seven or eight hundred horse, in hopes of preventing the Parliament's forces, and possessing himself of that city. Accordingly he arrived there the day before the two regiments: but the Mayor of the city, though without a garrison, shut the gates against him, and fired upon his men. He was very sensibly touched with this indignity; but as there was no remedy, he was forced to return to Nottingham, leaving the command of his cavalry to Commissary-General Wilmet.

The next day, his Horse being upon a plain of five or six miles extent, where nothing incumbered them, had a clear view of a body of twelve hundred of the enemies Foot, guarded only by one troop of Horse. Wilmet, it seemed, could not have wished for a fairer opportunity to attack with advantage this body of Foot, who had nothing to secure them. But, for what reason it is not known, instead of attacking the enemies, he thought only of avoiding them, and even retreated with some precipitation. This was a bad omen to a war just commenced.

At last on the 25th of August, the King caused his Standard to be erected on a turret of Nottingham Castle (1), having with him only some unarmed trained-bands. His Proclamation had produced so little effect, that few were come to attend the royal Standard. Nay, it happened, the very day the Standard was erected, to grow so tempestuous, that it was blown down, and could not be fixed again in a day or two. This was looked upon by many as a fatal preface of the war.

HE King had imagined, that the setting up of his Standard would draw great numbers of people to Nottingham, who would come and offer him their service: but he was very much disappointed. He had with him but three hundred Foot, and some trained-bands drawn together by [Sir John Digby] Sheriff of the County. His cavalry consisted only of eight hundred Horse, and his artillery was still at York, from whence it was difficult to bring it, many things being yet wanted to prepare and form it for marching, and besides, there were no Foot to guard it. Nevertheless, as he had given out many commissions, and ordered his forces to repair to Nottingham, he expected them in that town, though not without danger, the Parliament having at Coventry five thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse. Thus the King was in a very melancholy state before the war was well begun. He had appointed Robert Bartu Earl of Lindsey for General; but had yet no army. The Princes Rupert and Maurice his nephews, brothers of the Elector Palatine, being come to offer him their service in the beginning of September, he made Prince Rupert General of his Horse, quartered at Leicester, whither the Prince went and took upon him the command.

The King, it is certain, was in extreme danger at Nottingham. That town was not in condition to make a long resistance, and the King having scarce any forces, if the Parliament's troops, which were within twenty miles of the place, had marched directly to him, he must have been forced to retire with dishonour to York, unless he would have hazarded his being made prisoner. All those about him saw the danger, it being so evident; but it was not easy to avoid it, without quitting Nottingham, which could not but be very prejudicial to him. For this reason it was moved in the Council, to send a message to both Houses, with some overture to incline them to a treaty.

His Council advise him to propose a Peace.

The intent of this proposition, was doubtless to intimate to the King, that his affairs were in such a situation, that peace alone could free him from the perplexity and danger he was exposed to. But the mover of this advice could hardly think, that a bare offer of Peace was able to effect it, after what had passed before the rupture. Very likely, therefore, his design was that, in proposing a peace, something more should be offered, than what had been offered before. The King easily perceived the intimation, and was so offended at it, that he broke up the Council, that it might be no longer urged.

However, the next day the same motion was renewed, but under a different view. As it was doubtless perceived, that what had offended the King, was the plain meaning of proposing a peace, namely, that his Majesty must depart from some of his pretensions, care was taken to remove this odious meaning, and it was advised only to send a message to both Houses, in order to gain time. The King still opposed it, alledging, to offer peace in such a juncture, would be discovering his weakness: That his enemies would reject the offer with insolence, and nothing but dishonour would thereby reflect on himself. But it was represented to him, that such a message might do good, but could do no harm: That indeed, both Houses, very likely, would reject the offer, but they would thereby render themselves odious to the people, who were desirous of peace, and who would be the more inclined to serve his Majesty, for his endeavours to procure it: That if the overture was accepted, the King would have an opportunity of demonstrating, that the war, on his part, was purely defensive: In short, that the bare offer of peace would of course retard the preparations of the Parliament, because men's minds would be in suspense, whilst the King's levies might be continued by virtue of the commissions already sent out.

The King yielded to these reasons, because the point was not to offer any new conditions, but only to lay a snare for the Parliament, and retard their preparations. This was the sole motive of the message, wherein, as we shall see presently, the King proposed nothing new, and which, however, he represented afterwards as an evident sign of his sincere desire of peace. But though some pretend, that his Majesty's message, and the Parliament's refusal, contributed very much to facilitate the King's levies, and undeceive the people of their good opinion of the intentions of both Houses, I cannot believe, that such weak reasons were able to produce so great effects. It is true, if by the people, be meant only those who were devoted to the King, it is not unlikely, that the refusal of peace might render the Parliament odious to them, and promote their taking arms for the King. But if by the people, be understood the Parliament's party, or rather all the people in general, 1642. general, and without distinction, it is not easy to conceive, how the refusal of a bare proposition, without any thing new in it, could produce such an effect (1). The people, no doubt, wished for peace rather than war. But they would have a solid peace, supported by other foundations than the King's bare word, and not a peace in general, such as his Majesty proposed. They had already rejected such a peace; and upon this sense of the nation it was, that the Parliament's whole authority was founded. This was no new thing: it had been long disputed without coming to any conclusion. How therefore could the bare proposal of a treaty, without any particular offer, incline the people so strongly to the King, and render the Parliament more odious, if it was rejected? And yet, upon this foundation the King constantly built, from the beginning of the war, as will appear in the sequel. The second reason was wholly founded on the prejudices of the Privy-Counsellors. For, supposing the negotiation had been entered into, by what fresh evidence would the King have been able to demonstrate, that the war was only defensive on his part, since he had already alledged all that could be said on that subject, and since his papers were publick? The third reason was of no greater force. For if the bare overture of a treaty was capable of keeping people in suspense, and retarding the Parliament's levies, it might also have the same effect with regard to the King's. But the counsellors supposed, his Majesty's levies would be continued with vigour, whilst the Parliament's preparations would be interrupted: That is to say, the Parliament's friends would fall into the snare, whilst care should be taken privately to warn the King's to avoid it. Nothing more clearly shows, with what spirit they advised the King to send this message to the Parliament.

Be this as it will, the message was sent the 25th of August, (three days after the setting up of the Standard) (2) by [Thomas Wriothley] Earl of Southampton, Sir John Culpepper, and some others (3).

He propounded to both Houses, "That some persons might be by them enabled, to treat with the like number authorized by him, in such a manner, and with such freedom of debate, as might best tend to the peace of the Kingdom. And he assured them, that nothing should be wanting on his part, which might advance the Protestant Religion, oppose Popery, secure the Laws of the Land, and confirm all just power and privileges of Parliament. If this proposition should be rejected, he protested, he had done his duty so amply, that God would absolve him from any of the guilt of that blood which must be spilt."

As the war was sufficiently proclaimed by the erecting of the Standard, it seems, the King should have demanded a safe-conduct for his messengers. But though he had neglected to take this precaution, they pretended, on what grounds I know not, to go and sit in their respective places, without any previous notice (4). The Lords, offended at the Earl of Southampton's boldness, called upon him to withdraw, and ordered him to send his message in writing, and wait for an answer out of London. The Commons also obliged Culpepper to deliver his message at the Bar, at which the King took great offence.

The answer of both Houses to his Majesty's message was, "That notwithstanding their endeavours to prevent the distracted estate of the Kingdom, nothing had followed but proclamations and declarations against both Houses of Parliament, whereby their actions were declared treasonable, and their persons traitors. So that until those proclamations were recalled, and the Standard taken down, they could not, by the fundamental privileges of Parliament, give his Majesty any other answer to his message."

The King's messengers being returned to Nottingham with this answer, His Majesty, says the Lord Clarendon, was contented to make so much farther use of their pride and passion, as to give them occasion, by another message, to publish more of it to the people. It is easy to judge from hence, whether the King's real motive was a sincere desire of peace, since his messages were intended only to render the Parliament odious. He said in his reply: "That he never designed to declare both Houses of Parliament traitors, or set up his Standard against them, and much less to put them and the Kingdom out of his protection; he utterly protested against it before God and the world. But he promised, that if a day were appointed by them, for the revoking of their declarations against all persons as traitors or otherwise for assisting him, he would, with all cheerfulness, upon the same day, recall his proclamations and declarations, and take down his Standard."

In this message, as in all his other Papers, may be observed the genius and character of Charles I. He always made use of obscure expressions, the interpretation whereof he referred to himself. It is true, he had not in express terms declared both Houses traitors: but he called their members by that name, as the Earl of Essex and others. So, according to his way of reasoning, those that executed the orders of both Houses were traitors and rebels, though the Houses themselves were not so. It may be affirmed, that those little artifices were one of the principal causes of this Prince's misfortunes, as they made him forfeit the trust and confidence of his Subjects. They inspired the Parliament with a perpetual jealousy of being intangled by treaties, wherein it would have been impossible to avoid such ambiguous expressions.

The two Houses answered, "That his Majesty not having taken down his Standard, recalled his proclamations and declarations, whereby he had declared the actions of both Houses of Parliament to be treasonable, and their persons traitors, and having published the same since his message of the 25th of August, they could not recede from their former answer. That if his Majesty would recall his declarations, and return to his Parliament, he should find such expressions of their fidelities and duties, that his safety, honour, and greatness could only be found in the affections of his People, and the sincere counsels of his Parliament, who deserved better of his Majesty, and could never allow themselves, representing likewise the whole Kingdom, to be balanced with those who gave evil Counsels to his Majesty."

Mean while, both Houses perceiving, that the King's aim was to keep the People in suspense by an uncertain expectation of peace, published a declaration, protesting, they would never lay down their arms till his Majesty had left the Delinquents to the justice of the Parliament.

The King, on his part, failed not, pursuant to his purpose, to make use of the answers of both Houses to his two messages, in a third which he sent to them, saying, "That let all the world judge who had used most endeavours to prevent the present distractions, either he who had condescended to desire and press it, or the two Houses, who had refused to enter into a negotiation. That for the future, if they desired a treaty of him, he should remember that the blood which was to be spilt in this quarrel was that of his Subjects, and therefore would return to his Parliament, as soon as the causes which had made him absent himself from it should be removed."

Both Houses finding, the King's design was to render their refusal to treat, odious to the People, returned a stronger and more particular answer to this message than they had made to the two first. The substance whereof was as follows:

"That at the very time his Majesty propounded a treaty, his soldiers were committing numberless oppressions and rapines."

"That they could not think his Majesty had done all that in him lay to remove the present distractions, as long as he would admit of no peace, without securing the authors and instruments of these mischiefs from justice."

"That they besought his Majesty to consider his expressions, That God should deal with him and his posterity, as he desired the preservation of the just rights of Parliament. That nevertheless, his intention was not to deny the Parliament the privilege of declaring to be Delinquents those they deemed such, a privilege which belonged to the meanest Court of Justice in the Kingdom."

"That his Majesty hath no cause to complain, that he was denied a treaty, when they offered all that a treaty could produce, Security, Honour, Service, Obedience, Support, and fought nothing but that their Religion and Liberty might be screened from the open violence of a wicked party."

"That if there were any cause of treaty, they knew no competent person to treat betwixt the King and the Parliament."

"That besides, the season was altogether unfit, whilst

(1) It is judiciously observed by a modern Author, That those on whom the Parliament's Representations prevailed, were generally People of the Midland Counties, and the Traders in the Southern Parts of the Kingdom, who had smarted most by the Arbitrary Acts of Power, such as Seizures of Goods, Prosecutions for Ship-Money, Loans, Tunnage, and Poundage, illegal Imprisonment, &c. Those on whom the King's Representations prevailed, were generally his Subjects in the farthest Parts of the Nation, in Wales, Cornwall, Cumberland, &c. who were the least sensible, and had been the least assisted with the late Pressures and Sufferings, after the King's departing from the known Laws. Akerley, p. 535.

(2) This supposes the Standard was set up the 22d of August, as indeed Whitelock and Rushworth both say. Though Rapin, after the Lord Clarendon, said it was erected the 12th. See above, p. 457.

1642. "his Majesty's Standard was up, his proclamations and declarations recalled, whereby his Parliament was charged with treason.

"That indeed his Majesty had often protested his tenderness of the miseries of Ireland, and his resolution to maintain the Protestant Religion, and the Laws of this Kingdom. But that these Protections could give no satisfaction to reasonable and indifferent men, when at the same time several of the Irish Rebels, the known favourers of and agents for them, were admitted to his Majesty's presence with grace and favour, nay, some of them employed in his service: When the cloaths, munition, horse, bought by his Parliament for the supply of the Irish war, were violently taken away, and applied to the maintenance of an unnatural war against his People.

"That if his Majesty would be pleased to come back to his Parliament, they should be ready to secure his Royal person, crown and dignity, with their lives and fortunes."

The King did not leave this answer without a reply. But instead of doing it by way of message, he published a declaration to this effect:

"In the first place, he alleged the Laws in his favour.

"He denied that his soldiers had committed any disorders or violence, and affirmed, he had never suffered them to oppress any person whatever.

"He recriminated upon the Parliament. He denied that there were any Irish about him, and maintained, that it was a notorious calumny, like that cast upon him heretofore by Mr. Pym.

"He said, the artillery-horses he had taken at Chester were few in number, and of small value. And for the cloaths, if his soldiers had taken any that were designed for the service of Ireland, it was done without his order; and though he might have seized three thousand suits which were going thither, yet he refused to do it, and gave order for their speedy transportation.

"That the Parliament made no scruple to employ in the war against their King, a hundred thousand pounds particularly appointed for the relief of Ireland.

"That of near five hundred members, of which the Lower-House consisted, there remained not above three hundred, the rest having been driven away by tumults and threats, or withdrawn themselves, out of confidence, from their desperate consultations. That of above a hundred Peers, there remained but fifteen or sixteen in the Upper-House.

"That it was not the body of the Parliament, but only the violent leading members that were the authors of the war."

I omit several general assertions which might then be necessary to the King's designs, but which have been already seen in the foregoing Papers.

During these paper-skirmishes, both sides prepared for war. The Earl of Essex having ordered his forces to assemble at Northampton, departed from London the 9th of September to head the army; and having reviewed them, found about sixteen thousand men well armed, and well appointed with a good train of artillery. Then the King, perceiving he could no longer remain at Nottingham with safety, marched towards the borders of Wales with his troops (1), which were yet so few in number, that they did not deserve the name of an army. He was unresolved in what place to expect the forces that were to come to him from several parts: but intended to secure, if possible, Shrewsbury or Chester, without knowing however whether either of these towns would receive him, the Parliament having in all those Parts very active and vigilant agents, who employed all their pains to procure them adherents. For this reason the King marched but very slowly. When he came to Wellington, about seven miles from Shrewsbury (2), he drew his little army together, and caused his military orders for the discipline thereof to be read before them; after which he took occasion to make a Speech to his soldiers, and the better to satisfy them of his good intentions to the Publick, he made the following protestation.

I do promise, in the presence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his blessing and protection, That I will, to the utmost of my power, defend and maintain the true Reformed Protestant Religion established in the Church of England, and by the grace of God, in the same will live and die.

I desire to govern by all the known Laws of the Land, and that the liberty and property of the Subject may be by them preserved, with the same care as my own just rights. And if it please God, by a blessing upon this army, raised for my necessary defence, to preserve me from this Rebellion, I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the sight of God, to maintain the just privileges and freedom of Parliament, and to govern by the known Laws of the Land to my utmost power, and particularly to observe inviolably the Laws consented to by me this Parliament.

In the mean while, if this time of war, and the great necessity and straits I am now driven to, beget any violation of these, I hope it shall be imputed by God and man to the authors of this war, and not to me, who have so earnestly laboured for the preservation of the peace of this Kingdom.

When I willingly fall in these particulars, I will expect no aid or relief from any man, or protection from heaven: But in this resolution, I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men, and am confident of God's blessing.

The King was not contented with making this Protestation to his army, but moreover, in all the considerable places he passed through, he assembled the inhabitants, and endeavoured to convince them of the sincerity of his intentions. These were necessary precautions, at a time when the chief point was to gain the people to his interest, for on the people depended the strength of both parties.

From Wellington the King marched to Shrewsbury, having received the agreeable news that the town had declared in his favour, and the inhabitants would give him a joyful reception. Here he resolved to fix his head quarters, and appoint the rendezvous of his army. This was a very convenient place to expect the troops which were levying for him in Wales, Yorkshire, and Lancashire, and to send for his ordnance, which had not been able to follow him to Nottingham for want of horses. This had forced him to make use of a hundred draught horses sent by the Parliament to Chester, to be transported into Ireland. He desired to have the Earl of Leicester's consent, who was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and was then with him at Nottingham. But the Earl constantly refusing to give any orders about these horses, bought with the Parliament's money, the King gained one Errington, a servant of the Earl's, who took them in his master's name, and delivered them to the King (3). This the Parliament, as hath been seen, taxed the King with. As for arms, the King not having a sufficient quantity for all the troops that were to come from divers parts, had taken the arms of the Militia in all the places through which he passed: but it was by way of loan, that is, he obtained the consent of the officers of the Militia to take away their arms, on promise of restoring them. As soon as the King came to Shrewsbury (4), the number of his troops so considerably increased, that in a few days he had an army of ten thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with which he was entirely secured from the danger he was in, whilst his army was forming.

It is something strange, that the Earl of Essex should neither molest the King whilst at Nottingham, nor in his march to Shrewsbury. Probably, if presently after his arrival at Northampton he had marched directly against him, he would have greatly embarrassed him, and perhaps, disabled him from assembling an army. This neglect can be ascribed only, to his not having power to act directly against the King's person, till he received his instructions, which he expected every day, and which came too late. Both Houses, it seems, could not believe, the King would be able to be ready so soon as he was, and imagined, that his inability to raise men and money, would compel him to retire to some corner of the Kingdom, or to throw himself into their arms. At least, this is what they strove to infuse into the people, for fear of terrifying them with the notion of a war, the event whereof might be doubtful.

The King made an advantage of this error, to assemble all his forces at Shrewsbury, and provide himself with money, which he wanted extremely. His friends at London had taken care of this last article, and privately sent considerable sums to Oxford. Moreover, the University, which had always been firmly attached to the King, had engaged to deliver to him all the Plate belonging to the Colleges, which was very considerable. The point was only how to convey this aid safely to his Majesty. To that end, the King sent thither Sir John Byron, with a small detachment of Horse, not daring to give him a stronger, for fear of raising a suspicion, that it was for some considerable affair. Byron coming to Oxford, received the money and plate, and returned towards Shrewsbury, by way of Worcester, taking all possible precautions not to be attacked in his march. For this aid of money, which the King

In the mean time, the Earl of Essex, after staying some days at Northampton, and securing Warwick, resolved to fix his head-quarters at Worcester. To that purpose, he sent Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes before, who came to Worcester at break of day, some hours after Sir John Byron was entered with his convoy. Fiennes, at his arrival being told, that there were some of the King's Horse in the town, the number whereof he did not know, hastily retreated, without making any attempt. Presently after Prince Rupert arrived, and to secure Byron's convoy, who was resting himself in order to march on, passed through the town, and posted himself, with his Horse, at some distance on the other side. As he did not believe there were any enemies in those parts, he was not very careful to hinder many of his troops from staying in the town. When he came to the place he had chosen, he unlighted with his Brother Prince Maurice, and most of the Officers, reposing themselves on the ground. On a sudden they perceived, within musket-shot, five hundred Horse of the enemy marching up a narrow lane. These were a body commanded by Colonel Sandys, whom the Earl of Essex had sent before to take possession of Worcester. Prince Rupert instantly mounting his horse, without a moment's hesitation, charged these troops, as they came out of the lane, and the charge was so vigorous, that the enemy was entirely routed, and Sandys slain, with thirty of his men. This action gained the Prince a great name, not only for the valour he showed, but chiefly for his sudden and very seasonable resolution, in attacking his enemies as they came out of the lane, and when they least expected it. Some Historians in relating this skirmish, seem to represent Prince Rupert, as one of those romantic Heroes, who with five or six persons, attacked and routed whole armies. But, after all, there is nothing wonderful in this action of the Prince's, who had not posted himself beyond Worcester, without having with him his detachment. Besides, it is not said, what was the number of the body he commanded. Nevertheless, this action, how little important soever it was, failed not to strike great terror into the Parliament's troops, chiefly by reason of Prince Rupert's activity and courage, who afterwards gave them cause to be confirmed in their high opinion of his valour, for he was one of the bravest Princes in Europe. But though he had gained some little advantage, he did not think fit to expect the enemy at Worcester. He went from thence some hours after, and safely conducted the convoy of money to Shrewsbury, where the King immediately ordered the plate to be coined. The next day, the Earl of Essex possessed himself of Worcester, and making some stay there, secured in the mean while, Hireford, Gloucester, and Bristol.

It would doubtless be very strange, that in the twenty days the King staid at Shrewsbury, his army should so greatly increase, as, some say, it was the effect of the Parliament's denial to treat with his Majesty. For, so short a space does not seem sufficient to determine the people to repair to the places where they were lifted, and to conduct these new-raised troops to Shrewsbury. It may at least be affirmed, that it is much less surprising, that the King's new levies, which could not be ready whilst his Majesty was at Nottingham, or which did not care to go to a place so exposed, should be in condition to march during his stay at Shrewsbury, though it was but of twenty days, since he had issued his Commissions before he left Lark.

However this be, the King finding himself at the head of an army little inferior in number to the Earl of Essex's, and perceiving, it was not sufficient to remain in quiet at Shrewsbury, whilst the enemy was taking, without resistance, the principal towns in the heart of the Kingdom, believed he ought to seek means to put a speedy conclusion to the war. There were two: One was to fight the enemies, the other, to gain some marches upon them, and appear before London, before they could arrive. The King took this last course, in the expectation that he should raise an universal confection in London, which might afford his friends opportunity to serve him effectually. So, on a sudden beginning to march the 12th of October, with his army, which was not much incumbered with baggage, there being not one tent, and but little artillery, he quartered that night at Bridgenorth, ten miles from Shrewsbury, next day he came to Wolverhampton, the third day to Birmingham, and the fourth to Kenelworth, where he rested one day. It was two days before the Earl of Essex had notice of his march, and began to follow him. It evidently appears by the King's rout, that if he was not in quest of the enemies, at least he feared them not, since he could not be ignorant how easy it was for the Earl of Essex, either to put himself in his way, or overtake him. In all likelihood, he imagined the Earl would not dare to hazard a battle, or that being much more incumbered with baggage and artillery, his march would be considerably retarded. Be this as it will, it was not till the 22d of October, that the two armies came within six miles of one another, without having received any notice of each other's march, till that day, which appears very strange. But what is still more surprising, is, that the King, to whom speed was so necessary, had so little advanced in five days, since, leaving Kenelworth the 17th, he was on the 22d, but four miles north of Banbury, and that the Earl of Essex, who departed the 15th from Worcester, should be only at Keinton the 22d, which is not above twenty miles. The King, who till then knew not where the Earl of Essex was, lay incamped near a village called Edget, where he had intelligence the 22d in the night, that the enemies were at Keinton, about six miles distant. He found then it would be very difficult to execute his design upon London, whilst he should be so closely followed by the enemies. And therefore he resolved to give them battle. To that end, he drew up his army on Edge-hill, from whence might be seen all Keinton plain, where the Parliament's army stood in battle array, the 23d in the morning. The fight began not however till three in the afternoon. It is not known what induced the King to defer it so long (1): But for the Earl of Essex he had a very strong reason not to be in haste. For not imagining himself so near a battle, he had left behind two thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, with his artillery, and consequently, delay could not but be advantageous to him.

Prince Rupert, who commanded the King's right wing of Horse (2), marching down the hill, and advancing to charge the enemies left wing, on a sudden, Sir Faithful Portefeu, who commanded a troop of the Parliament's Horse, moving forward with his whole troop from the grofs of the cavalry, and joining Prince Rupert, with his Highness charged those he had deserted (3). This unexpected accident inspired the Parliament's Horse with such a terror, each man looking upon his companion as upon an enemy, that they were entirely routed, and pursued above two miles from the field of battle. By this unadvised pursuit, the King was in danger of the same fate which his predecessor Henry III. had at the battle of Leaves. The Parliament's right wing stood their ground no better than the left. They ran away full speed, and were pursued with the same fury and imprudence. What was moreover fatal to the King, was, that his reserve of a regiment of Horse, thinking the victory unquestionable, by the flight of the enemies cavalry, with spurs and loose reins followed the chase, and could not be hindered by their commanders.

All this while the Foot of both armies were engaged without victory's inclining to either side. But at last, Sir William Balfour, to whom the Earl of Essex had given the command of the Reserve, turned the scale. As soon as he saw the King's Horse employed in the pursuit of the flying troops, he went and charged the Foot in the flank, and put them into such disorder, that the King, with the two Princes his Sons, were in danger of being made prisoners. The Earl of Lindsey, the King's General, was taken, having been shot in the thigh, of which he died the next day, and the Standard, which was always near the King's person, was lost by the death of the Standard-bearer, [Sir Edmund Verney,] but it was recovered afterwards in some unknown manner (4).

The return of Prince Rupert with his Horse, prevented the King's entire defeat. For Balfour, who had only a small body of Reserve, seeing the cavalry returning from the chase, suddenly quitted the fight, and secured himself near the Earl of Essex's Foot. Could the King and Prince Rupert have persuaded their Horse to charge the Parliament's infantry, who had scarce any cavalry to support them, very probably they would have routed

(1) The Lord Clarendon says, though the Horse were ready, the Foot were quartered at such a distance, that many Regiments marched seven or eight Miles to the Rendezvous, so that it was one a Clock before the King's Forces moved. Tom. 2. p. 35.

(2) The left Wing was commanded by Commissary-general Wilms, assisted by Sir Archer Aston. The Earl of Lindsey led the Foot, and next to him were Sir John Mordaunt, with the King's Regiment. On the Parliament's side: Their right Wing, which consisted of three Regiments of Horse, was commanded by Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Balfour, and the Lord Fledding. Sir John Mordaunt's Brigade led the van, Colonel Essex was next, and Colonel Hallard, and Holla, and the Lord Brooke, in the rear. 1642. them, and obtained a compleat victory. But the Horse that were returned from the pursuit in extreme disorder, could never be brought to charge the enemies, who stood in good order, though they were in great danger. As soon as the Earl of Essex saw the enemies cavalry returning, he had drawn off his infantry from the battle, and ranged them in the best manner he could, in order the better to support the charge of the King's Horse, who, in all appearance, would come and attack them. But it was not his business to renew the fight. It was sufficient for him to keep his ground, as he did, till night which freed him from his uneasiness.

When the battle began, there remained not above two or three hours day, and as the King's Horse had spent some time in the pursuit of the runaways, and, after their return, could not be prevailed with to renew the fight, it was too late for the King to rally his infantry, who were in great disorder, and whereof above two thirds were missing. Both armies kept their posts all night, and in the morning neither thought themselves in condition to renew the battle. It is true, the forces left behind by the Earl of Essex arrived in the night with his artillery. However as he had no other cavalry than the five hundred Horse that were newly come, and the small body commanded by Bulwer, he did not think he ought to hazard a second battle against a body of cavalry that had been victorious the day before, and were still facing his army. The King, on his side, finding himself without infantry, and considering that his troops had suffered very much by the cold, which was extremely sharp that night, believed it sufficient to let his enemies see he feared them not. In this disposition, the two armies faced one another the whole day, without any desire to engage. At last, the Earl of Essex ordering his baggage to be drawn off, the King retired to the quarters he had taken the day before the battle, and the Earl of Essex marched towards Warwick (1). The number of the slain on the field of battle

T. H. p. 40. was about five thousand. But what the Earl of Clarendon says, that two days after, the King reviewing his army, found there were not above three hundred men left, is hardly credible, even according to his own description of this battle. But without dwelling upon the particular circumstances of the battle, which were extremely disguised or exaggerated by both parties, who equally claimed the victory, the consequences demonstrate, that they might have more justly owned, that each had been worsted (2). The King went from Shrewsbury with design to make an attempt upon London; but after the battle, he relinquished that thought, though the road to London was open, and believed it more proper to retire to Oxford. On the other hand, the Earl of Essex follows the King to obstruct his going to London, but after the battle leaves the way open to him, and retiring to Warwick, puts it out of his power to prevent or stop him. I believe this suffices to show, it was a drawn Battle, which afforded no real matter of triumph either to the King or the Parliament. Indeed, three or four days after the battle, the King took Banbury castle, where was a garrison of eight hundred Foot, and a troop of Horse. But if the circumstances of taking this place be well considered, it will be found, that it was far from being a consequence or effect of victory. For first, the King summoned the castle, contrary to the opinion of all his Generals, who believed his army little able to undertake the siege. Secondly, he alledged for reason, that he could not determine what course to take, till he was informed of the intention of the enemies, and that if they designed to attack him, he could not fight in a more advantageous place. From hence it may be inferred, that he was not himself fully satisfied of the reality of his victory, since he imagined the Earl of Essex in condition to attack him. In short, Banbury castle surrendered at the first shot, which leaves it uncertain, whether the King would have persisted in the siege in case of resistance, and whether the Earl of Essex would have suffered him to do it unmolested. The taking of Banbury determined the King to withdraw to Oxford, the only place in those parts at his devotion, by means of the University, whose members were extremely attached to his interest.

93. King returns to Oxford. Clarendon, T. II. p. 45. Great Contentment in the Parliament. The King's Friends take occasion to praise a Peace.

Though the Parliament challenged also the victory, they were very veniable they had no great reason to triumph. They were obliged however to make a parade of this pretended victory, as if it had been real, to contradict the King's friends who were trying to strike terror into the Londoners, and induce them to sue for peace, on account of this pretended success of his Majesty's arms. The King had still many friends in the city, there having been yet no measures taken to drive them away. Nay, in the Parliament itself, there were not a few who flayed there on purpose to do the King service, when occasion should offer, and who failed not to improve the present. The news concerning the battle of Edge-Hill or Keinton, being very various at first, the King's friends at London, indolently magnified all the circumstances which might give room to believe that the King was victorious, in order to dispose the People to peace. For it must be observed, that since the breach, the King's grand aim had ever been to dazzle the People with the specious term of Peace, and he had never ceased to hope that the nation would oblige the Parliament to come to an agreement, by leaving him in possession of all his Prerogatives. This was his favorite project, from which he never swerved, not even when his affairs were most prosperous. It will hereafter appear on sundry occasions, with what constancy he endeavoured to execute this scheme. The present occasion was the first since the beginning of the war. When both Houses had perfect information of the success of the late battle, what publick demonstrations soever they made, to cause the People to believe their army victorious, they were very sensible, such victories were little capable to oblige the King to throw himself into their arms, though the People had been amused with such hopes. Then the King's Adherents who were still in the House of Commons, observing the conformation expressed by most of the Members, grew more bold, and scrupled not to propose a Peace, as the only means to free themselves from trouble. Very probably, this was done with the King's consent, who at the same time was using his utmost endeavours to persuade the Publick, that he had obtained at Edge-hill a compleat victory.

The day before the battle, both Houses had published a Declaration, of which I shall content my self with relating the substance: for having given to many of these Papers, I am afraid I shall tire my Readers if I insert here at large those that follow.

The two Houses protested in the first place, "That no private passion or respect, no evil intention to his Majesty's person, no design to the prejudice of his just honour and authority, engaged them to raise forces, and take up arms. "That his Majesty had refused to receive an humble and dutiful Petition, which they had directed the Earl of Essex to deliver to him. "That they were fully convinced, that the King was so engaged to the Popish party, that all hopes of peace were excluded. "That great numbers of Papists had in few conformed themselves to the Protestant Religion, in order to qualify themselves for posts in the King's army. "That his Majesty endeavoured at first to keep off all jealousies and suspicions, by many fearful oaths and imprecations, concerning his purpose of maintaining the Protestant Religion, and the Laws of the Kingdom, causing some professed Papists to be discharged out of his army, and none to be received that would not come to Church, receive the Sacrament, and take the oaths. "But that afterwards his confidence in the priests did more clearly appear: Persons imprisoned for Priests and Jesuits having been released out of the goal of Lancaster, and commissions granted to professed Papists.

Here fourteen of them were named. "That the Lord Herbert, Son to the Earl of Worcester, a notorious Papist, was made General of the King's troops in all South-Wales. "That those who raised forces for his Majesty in the North of England, did arm and employ Papists. "That men had been sent to Hamburgh and Denmark to raise forces there, and to bring them over to join with the Earl of Newcastle, and the army of Papists which was intended to be raised in Newcastle. "That the King had received in his Court divers Papists in Ireland; some of which were indicted of high-treason for their Rebellion there; namely, the Lord Taffé, &c. "That divers English traitors were the chief counsel-

(2) In this battle were killed on the King's side, Robert Barton Earl of Lindsey, the Lord Stewart, the Lord Ashby, Son to the Duke of Lennox, Sir Edm. ... On the Parliament's side, perished the Lord Sir John of Blarney, and Colonel Chas. ... In order to relieve his Father the Earl of Lindsey. Upon the news of this battle (says Whitlock, p. 64.) all Counties were alarmed at the sight, being a strange thing in England. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 40, 41. T. May. Some say, there were but about a thousand killed. See Manly, p. 48, &c. With relation to this battle, Daniel Lord Hillis tells a remarkable Story, from his own knowledge, concerning the famous Oliver Cromwell; and that the field at Keinton Battle, where he, with his troop of Horse came not in, imprudently and did calamity off on the day after, that he had been all that day seeking the Army and place of fight, though his Quarters were but at a Village near by, whence he could not find his way, nor be directed by his ears, when the Ordnance was heard twenty or thirty miles off. Hillis's Mem. p. 17.

1642. "Ions and actors in this unnatural war, as the Lord Digby, Omeal, Wilmot, Pellard, Affburnham, &c.
"That divers Jesuits and Priests, in foreign parts, made great collections of money for the relief of the Papists in Ireland, and the furthering of his Majesty's designs against the Parliament.

"For all which reasons they were resolved to enter into a solemn Oath and Covenant, and expected that their brethren of Scotland would help and assist them, according to the act of pacification between the two Kingdoms."

The King answered this Declaration with two others, which were published after the battle of Edge-hill. In the first he said:

"That notwithstanding the solemn Protestation of both Houses, of having no evil intention to his person, yet they had used their utmost power, by the strength of their army, to have destroyed him.

"That if he refused to give admittance to the Petition sent by the Earl of Essex, it was because it was sent by persons whom he had particularly accused of High-Treason. [Here he gave a long account of this whole matter.]

"He denies his ever having had any inclination to the Papists, or that he had released any Priests or Jesuits out of the goal of Lancaster.

"He says, that the Papists supposed to have commissions were not so much as known to him, and that they had no command, to his knowledge, in his army.

[It must be observed upon these two last articles, 1st, That the prisoners he had released out of the goal of Lancaster, had been imprisoned as Papists, Priests and Jesuits, but had not been convicted as such. And therefore the King thought he might deny he had released any Priests, &c.

2dly, The King, when he said there were no papish officers in his army, meant by his army, that which he commanded in person, and the Parliament understood that which was commanded by the Earl of Newcastle. It might therefore be true, that the papish officers, commissioned by the Earl of Newcastle, were not known to the King. But the army in the north was as much his army, as that commanded by himself.]

"He expressly denied, that he ever sent to raise forces in Hamburg or Denmark.

"He affirmed, the Parliament entertained several Papists in their troops, and of this he spoke knowingly, as having taken several of them prisoners at the battle of Edge-hill" (1).

The second Declaration was intitled, His Majesty's Declaration to all his loving Subjects, after his late victory against the rebels on Sunday the 23d of October, 1642. This title was prefixed on purpose to cherish the fears, the King's friends were endeavouring to insufe into the people, on account of the pretended victory lately obtained by the King against the Parliament's army.

The intent of this Declaration was to vindicate the King upon three principal articles, namely, 1. That his Majesty favoured Popery, and employed Papists in his army. 2. That his design was to root out Parliaments.

3. That it was his intention, by the commission of array, to take away part of Gentlemen's estates from them. I shall speak here of the first only, because, after what has been seen, it would be needless to repeat what the King alleged in his vindication upon the two last. As to the first therefore he said:

"That although he should employ Papists, no one would wonder, who considered the hardships and streights he was driven to, and the little scruple the Parliament made to employ papish Officers and Soldiers, who served in great numbers in their army; the industry they used to corrupt their loyalty; the private promises they allured them with to their service, even to the assuring them, that all the penal Laws should be repealed. That notwithstanding the artifices of his enemies, and the weakness of his own condition, he could not prevail with himself to recall his Proclamation, against receiving into his army such as had not taken the oaths. He owned, however, that he had swerved from this general rule, in favour of some of eminent abilities in command and conduct."

We shall find hereafter, that though this Proclamation was not recalled, it was very far from being punctually observed.

Presently after, both Houses returned an answer to this Declaration, the substance whereof was as follows:

"That it was astonishing, the King, having affirmed so positively, that a far greater number of Papists served in their army than in his, should not have been pleased to name a single instance: That they should have been glad of knowing their names, as it would have afforded means to remove those of that Religion, who under the profession of Protestants, might have crept into the army without their privacy."

Then they pretended to show, by several reasons, the absurdity of saying, that the Parliament endeavoured to corrupt the loyalty of the Papists, with the promise of repealing the penal Laws, and alleged divers instances of their severity against them, during the sitting of the present Parliament.

But for a demonstration, said they, that the King acted not with sincerity, when he alleged, in his vindication, that he had ordered no Recufant to be received into his troops, and that this order was a mere illusion, they named several papish Officers, who had commissions under the King's own hand, which commissions then remained in the House of Commons. Moreover, they annexed to this Declaration a Petition, presented to the King by the papish inhabitants of the County of Lancashire, desiring leave to provide themselves with arms for his service, and the King's answer granting their request. This Petition, and his Majesty's answer, seem to me so decisive upon the present case, which was so often repeated, that I think they ought to be inserted in their own terms.

To the King's most excellent Majesty.

The humble Petition of us the Inhabitants of Lancashire, whose names are under-written, in behalf of our selves, and divers others being Recufants,

Humbly sheweth,

"THAT whereas we, and the rest of this County, your Majesty's most loyal Subjects, are disarmed, and not sufficiently provided for the defence of your royal person and our own families; our most humble supplication to your Majesty is, That we may be received into your most gracious protection from violence, have our arms, taken from us, re-delivered in this time of actual war, and by your Majesty's special directions, be enabled further to furnish our selves with competency of weapons for the security of your royal person, (if we be thereunto required) our countries and families, who now are, not only in danger of the common disturbances, but also menaced by unruly people to be robbed: And when, by the Almighty's assistance, your Majesty's Kingdom shall be settled, in case we be again disarmed, that a full value of money in lieu thereof may be restored."

The KING's Answer.

To our Trusty and Well-beloved, Sir William Gerard Baronet, Sir Cecil Trafford Knight, Thomas Clifton, Charles Townley, Christopher Anderton, and John Clansfield, and other of our Subjects Esquires, in the County of Lancashire.

Charles R.

"TRUSTY and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas by reason of the Laws and Statutes of our realm, by which all Recufants convicted are to be without arms, your arms have been taken from you: So that now, in this time of imminent danger, wherein there are armies raised against our commands, and contrary to our Proclamations, and are marching against us, and divers of our good Subjects, for obeying our lawful commands, and opposing the rebellious proceedings of others ill-affected, they are by a strong hand seized upon and imprisoned, their houses plundered, and their goods taken away; and the like is threatened to our selves, who, as all other our Subjects, ought to have our protection against unlawful violence and force: And the Laws made for disarming Recufants, were made only for a provision to prevent danger in time of peace, and were not intended to bar you from a necessary use of arms in time of actual war, for your own safety, or for the defence of our person against all rebels and enemies, which by your duty and allegiance you are bound unto; which is not, nor ever was meant to be discharged, or taken away by any Act: And whereas, the arms which were taken from you, ought by Law to have been kept and preserved, to have been made use of by you in such time of open war, or by such others as you should provide, yet under the specious pretence of disarming Recufants, and persons ill-affected, your arms have been disposed and dispersed into the hands of several persons ill-affected, and for the most part, fomenters and excitors of the commotions now raised in this Kingdom; Our will and command therefore is, that we charge and require you, upon your allegiance, and as you tender the safety of our person, and the peace and welfare of our Kingdom, That you, with all possible speed,

"provide

"provide sufficient arms for your selves, your servants, and your tenants, which we authorize and require, during the time of open war raised against us, to keep and use for the defence of us, and of your selves, and of your country, against all forces and arms raised, or to be raised against us, or against our content, or contrary to our proclamations, by colour of any order, or ordinance, or authority whatsoever: And we shall (according as we are bound to all our Subjects) use our utmost powers for the protection of you and yours, against all injuries and violence. And whensoever these arms which you shall so provide (after it shall please God to put an end to these dangers and distractions) shall be taken away from your custody, by reason of our Laws now in force, we do hereby assure you, we will allow you for the same, so much as you shall have dispensed in provision thereof."

It is proper to observe, concerning these two papers, that the question between the King and both Houses was not, Whether the King might lawfully, or not, employ Papists in his service, but whether he did really employ them? Care therefore must be taken, not to confound the right with the fact, the last only being the point in question. Now these two papers demonstrate, that the King actually employed Papists in his service, even at the beginning of the war, and before any effusion of blood: for this Petition was presented to him, whilst he was yet at Sherburn (1).

For a greater conviction, both Houses annexed also to their Declaration, a list of the names of twenty eight Officers, Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, Sergeants, Majors, Captains, and Lieutenants, that were Papists, and actually in the King's service, in the Earl of Newcastle's army.

The King and the Parliament were in this state of animosity, when his Majesty's private friends in the House of Commons moved to sue for peace, under colour of the Parliament's inability to continue the war, after their late loss at Edge-hill. The King, on his part, to confirm the opinion his friends were striving to infuse into the People, that the Parliament's army was entirely routed, and to encourage his well-wishers in London to join with those in the Parliament, sent an offer of pardon to the cities of London and Westminster; thereby insinuating to the inhabitants, that such an offer could not but proceed from the superiority he had acquired by his victory. He practised the same thing with regard to some other towns. It is certain, there was then a great agitation in London, caused by the King's friends, who under pretence of dreading a war, which, according to them, was so unfortunately begun, used their utmost endeavours to induce the People openly to demand a peace. Against these secret practices, it was the business of the leading men in the Parliament to provide. And as they were no less able than their adversaries, they quickly found means to baffle this project. Instead of opposing the motion to sue to the King for peace, they supported it with all their power. They said, "That the Parliament had not taken arms for the sake of going to war, but only to procure a good peace, the most desirable thing in the world: That both Houses ought not to be ashamed to make the first advances, and humbly sue for peace to their Sovereign, but withal, care was to be taken, that a too great zeal for peace might not be a means to leave them at the mercy of their enemies: That in order to make such a peace as was necessary to the welfare of the Kingdom, the King was to be told, that they were not yet reduced to the point, of being forced to accept of such terms as he should please to impose, and therefore, if they would have a peace wherein every man might find his safety, it was necessary to take good measures for the continuance of the war: That among all the means which could be used, they saw none more proper, than to invite their brethren of Scotland to their assistance, pursuant to the treaty between the two Nations. Not that they actually wanted them, the Parliament's affairs not being reduced to such an extremity, that Foreigners were to be hastily introduced into the Kingdom, but that the Scots would doubtless answer their request, as to convince the King, this refuge would not fail the two Houses in case of need: That thereby they should become more formidable, and if the King was really desirous of a peace, he would be forced to grant it upon reasonable terms, which was all that ought to be expected."

As this advice was very plausible, and besides, proposed by men in whom the majority had great confidence, it was approved by the House. Indeed, none could be ignorant, that by the peace which the King had hitherto offered, and which his friends moved to sue for, could be meant only a peace that should put him in possession of all his prerogatives, and that his word should be taken for security that he would abuse them no more. But though the Members of Parliament doubted not that the King would grant an Act of Oblivion, such as they should desire, they did not believe, that such a peace could be advantageous to the Kingdom, because they did not believe the King's word to be a sufficient security. Besides, the Presbyterians were no better pleased than they had been hitherto, with a peace which would of course restore Episcopacy in all its former lustre. Wherefore things not being yet brought to that state, that the Parliament should be induced to with for such a peace, it was resolved, 1. That his Majesty should be addressed for settling the peace of the Kingdom. 2. That the preparations of forces and other necessary means for defence should be prosecuted with all vigour, if an honorable and safe peace might not be obtained. 3. That the Scots should be applied to for assistance, if there should be occasion. These resolutions entirely broke all the measures of the King's friends, who had flattered themselves, that the pretended victory of Edge-hill would produce some great effect.

Pursuant to these resolutions, the Parliament took care to recruit the Earl of Essex's army, and to that end it was ordained, that such Apprentices as should be listed for Soldiers, should reckon the time spent in the Wars, as part of their Apprenticeship. Whereupon great number of Apprentices engaged in the Parliament's service.

After that, both Houses sent a Declaration to Scotland, wherein they did not demand indeed an immediate aid; but said, "That they did not doubt but the Scots would assist them, if there should be occasion, according to the treaty of amity and alliance between the two Nations. That therefore they desired them to raise such forces, as they should think sufficient to secure their own borders against the attempts of the Army of Papists, levied by the Earl of Newcastle in the North of England. To engage them the more to what they desired, they said, "the enemies of the Protestant Religion were so prevalent with his Majesty, that he had rejected all the Petitions presented to him. That the present war was for the maintenance of Religion, against the efforts of those who had projected its destruction, and that in order to preserve it more effectually, they had willingly embraced the invitation of the Scots, to a nearer degree of union in matters of Religion and Church-Government, which they had accordingly resolved to pursue."

It was now some months, since the Scotch Commissioners residing at London, had intimated in a memorial presented to the Parliament, that the Scots passionately desired an union of the Churches of England and Scotland in the same worship and discipline. As this proposition was expressed by way of wish only, and besides was worded in such a manner, that it might be understood, either that the Scots desired the English to embrace the worship and discipline of the Church of Scotland, or that they themselves were willing to conform to the Church of England, the Parliament had, in the same ambiguous terms, civilly answered, that they also wished the same thing, and would heartily concur in accomplishing the Project. This answer was doubtless framed by the leading Presbyterians, to serve as a corner-stone, of which they hoped one day to make good use. But it was not yet time to declare their intention more openly, for fear of losing all the Church of England men that were against the King. Probably these men would have been alarmed, if they had clearly known, that the Presbyterians meant to establish their worship and discipline upon the ruins of the Church. For the same reason also, in the declaration above mentioned, both Houses, or rather the Directors, thought not proper to speak more plainly, and in saying, that both Houses intended to pursue this union, the proposition was left in all its ambiguity, though it was easy for the Scot to perceive, that in time they should receive satisfaction. For it is not to be imagined, there were none but Presbyterians in the Parliament's party, though this may be the notion some would give us of that party, their aim being to insinuate, that the war between the King and the Parliament was properly a religious war, and that the Parliament's sole design was to destroy the Church of England, and establish Presbyterianism in its room. As this design was unjust in itself, they would infer, that the war against the King was unjust. This reasoning would be solid and convincing, were it true, that the opposite party to the King had proposed to themselves no other end. But as it is certain, the Presbyterians were not the only persons that had cause to complain of the King, it is no less so, that the party of his enemies consisted not of Presbyterians alone, but also of a very great number of Church-men, who saw, that under colour of destroying Presbyterianism, an arbitrary Power was going to be established. It is easy to conceive, that these men were ill-offended to the King.

had joined with the Parliament, and as yet were attached to their party. But it is inconceivable, that the Presbyterians, who at the beginning of the Parliament made so inconsiderable a figure in both Houses, as well as in the Kingdom, should be grown to very numerous in the space of two years, or that the members of the Church of England, who complained of the King's former administration, should have entirely renounced the Church, and embraced Presbyterianism. It is certain therefore, though the Presbyterian party, considered as a Religious Party, had prevailed in the Parliament, there were however in that same party, considered as enemies to the King, many Churchmen who had no other view than the reformation of the civil Government, and the security of the nation's liberties. These were the men the Parliament were to manage, for fear of alarming them, till they could be engaged to turn Presbyterians, whether by the superiority the Parliament should acquire in the course of the war, or by the absolute necessity they should be under of relinquishing the People's Liberties, or of recurring to the assistance of the Scots, which could be obtained but by changing the Government of the Church. On the other hand, the Church of England-men could not take it ill, that the Parliament managed the Scots, since their assistance might happen to be absolutely necessary. The ambiguous expressions therefore in the declaration, with respect to the union of the two Churches, served to manage all those who were concerned for the Parliament's affairs. The Scots were gladly suffered to think, that the proposition was understood in the sense they themselves gave it, and the Church of England-men were told, that the Parliament was properly bound to nothing, in promising to endeavour an union, because there was no more reason for the Church of England to conform to that of Scotland, than for this last to conform to that of England. That however great advantage would accrue from this pretended engagement, in that the King, from the apprehension of seeing the Parliament closely united with Scotland, would be induced to make peace upon reasonable terms.

Though on this occasion, the King's enemies had gained some advantage in the Parliament, his friends did not think themselves vanquished. They plainly saw, that so long as both Houses should be able to act with freedom, the King's adversaries would always be superior, and that it was scarce possible to take away this freedom without an extraordinary assistance. Wherefore whilist men were still in the agitation occasioned by the battle of Edge-hill, they sent the King word, that if he would appear before London with his army, they did not question, such commotions would be raised in the city, as would turn to his advantage, in which his friends would not fail to exert themselves to the utmost of their power. This made him resolve to march to London. To that end, he ordered a body of Horse to go before, who advancing to Reading, the Parliament's troops, quartered there, were seized with such a terror, that they entirely abandoned the place, and the King came thither soon after with his army. Both Houses were alarmed when they heard the King was within thirty miles of London. So, whether for that reason, or with design to amuse him, they sent and desired a safe-conduct for a committee of Lords and Commons to attend his Majesty with a petition for Peace, pursuant to a resolution taken some days before. The King granted a safe-conduct for the committee, excepting only Sir John Evelyn, because he was proclaimed traitor (1.) In the mean time, both Houses had advice that the Earl of Essex was marching towards London with the utmost speed. For this cause they were in no haste to send the committee to the King, on pretence of his scrupling to admit Evelyn. It is hard to conceive why the King, who could not be ignorant, that the execution of his project depended upon his diligence, stayed long enough at Reading to give the Earl of Essex time to come to London as soon as himself. However this be, he marched the 11th of November to Colebrook, fifteen miles from London. Mean while the Earl of Essex's army arrived about the same time, in the neighbourhood of London. But whether it was not ready soon enough, or the Parliament was alarmed, the committee was sent to his Majesty the same day, with a very humble petition, to appoint a place for a treaty. The King returned a gracious answer to this petition, testifying, he wished for nothing more than a peace, and to that end, was content to enter into treaty. The committee returning to London with this answer, the Parliament immediately sent orders to their forces not to exercise any hostility.

But presently after the departure of the committee, the King began to march towards Brentford, which is but seven miles from London, and arriving there the 12th in the morning, attacked the town, where some of the Parliament's troops were quartered, and became master of it, after some resistance (2). Immediately after he sent a message to both Houses to inform them, that since his answer to their petition last night, he had received advice, that the Earl of Essex was drawing his forces out of London towards him, which had obliged him to march to Brentford: That however he was still desirous of peace, and expected their committee at Brentford that night, or early the next morning.

The Earl of Essex's army was indeed arrived near London the 7th, and the Earl himself was actually in the House of Peers the 12th, during the assault of Brentford. Whereupon both Houses ordered the Lord Mayor to send out the trained-bands, to join with the Earl of Essex's army, and by that it became much superior to the King's (3). The same day the General made the necessary preparations for battle; but the King not thinking fit to expect him, retired towards Kingston.

The Parliament complained, the King had deceived them under the false show of desiring to treat of a peace, since immediately after the departure of the committee, he marched to surprize Brentford. The King justified himself two ways. He said first, that not only there was no truce agreed upon, but none so much as desired. Secondly, that after the committee's departure, he received certain information, that the Earl of Essex had sent forces to Kingston, Alton, and other places, to surround him, which had obliged him to advance to Brentford. The former of these reasons was the best, for there being no cessation of arms, he might justly take all advantages as he thought proper. But he insisted the least upon this, for being disappointed, he would not have it appear that his design was to become master of London, or at least to raise commotions there in his favour, for fear of expelling his friends to a strict inquisition. The latter was not of the same force. For if he was afraid of being surrounded at Colebrook, he did not avoid that inconvenience, by advancing eight miles nearer London. He rather made it greater by that march, unless he advanced with design to attack the enemy, which did not appear by his conduct.

The King is furnished with another reason, not contained in a sort of Manifesto, published by himself on this occasion. Prince Rupert, it is said, had advanced to Hounslow with the Horse, without the King's order, and when there, was informed that the Parliament had sent forces to Kingston, Alton, and other places: so, finding he was going to be surrounded, sent to the King to desire him to advance with his infantry to disengage him. This reason to me seems very weak, that I should think it needless to refute it, if it did not come from the illustrious author of the History of those times. I will not say, that it does not much redound to Prince Rupert's honour to affirm, he had advanced without the King's order with his cavalry, which too is not very likely. But first, if the Prince did think himself in danger, it was much easier for him to retire to the King, than for the King to march to his relief. Secondly, what probability was there, that the Parliament's forces, which are supposed to have been detached to surround the Prince, should post themselves between him and the King? Thirdly, the Earl of Essex's army came near London but that very day, and was not in condition to march ten or twelve miles farther to attack the Prince.

It is therefore extremely probable, that the King, when he left Oxford, intended to surprize London, or hoped, that his friends would so manage, that he should be received there without opposition, before the Earl of Essex could arrive. But he either lost too much time at Reading, or was prevented by the Earl's expedition. Nevertheless, since he was not ignorant that the Parliament's forces were now very near London, one cannot well see what it signified to attack Brentford, unless it was to brave the Parliament, or having first designed to give battle, he had altered his mind upon hearing that the trained-bands of London were sent out to join the Earl of Essex. Be this as it will, having missed his aim, he was forced to frame reasons to colour his attack of Brentford, and to try to persuade the People, it was done only in his own defence. After all, it is very likely, that when he sent back the committee from Colebrook, he was determined to march to Brentford, and was not sorry the Parliament amused them-

(2) Part of Colonel Waller's Regiment were quartered there, who made a vigorous defence, but would, in all probability, have been most of them cut off, if the Lord Broke's and Colonel Hanger's Regiment had not come to their relief, and maintained a fierce and bloody fight till night, wherein many were slain, others driven into the river, and many taken prisoners. So that they quitted the town in the night, and the King pursued to Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 59. Waller's, p. 63.

selfes with the hopes of a treaty. At least, the reasons he alleged in his vindication, did not prove the contrary.

This war continued all the winter in several parts of the Kingdom, there being scarce a County free from it. My design is not to descend to the particulars of all the skirmishes and conflicts during the war. Such circumstances may be agreeable to the English, who are acquainted with the situation of the places, or concerned for the honour of those who signalized themselves on these occasions. But Foreigners, for whom I write, being little concerned, I shall confine my self briefly to relate some of the principal actions.

In the beginning of December, the Earl of Newcastle, who had levied an army for the King in the northern parts, began his march towards York. He was stopped at the passage of the River Tees, which parts the Bishoppick of Durham from Yorkshire, by young Hatham, who had with him a detachment of the little army commanded by the Lord Fairfax in that County for the Parliament: But the Earl forced the passage, and came to York, with about eight thousand men.

There were likewise during this winter, in the same County, two pretty warm actions. The first at Tadcaster, where the Lord Fairfax was intrenched, and where he was attacked by the Earl of Newcastle, who, after an obstinate dispute, was obliged at last to retreat. The second was at Gisbrough, where Sir Hugh Cholmley defeated six hundred of the King's party, commanded by Colonel Slingby, who was taken prisoner, with a good number of his men.

Some days after, Sir Thomas Fairfax the General's Son, attacked the town of Leeds, defended by Sir William Savil with fifteen hundred men, carried it by storm, and took five hundred prisoners. These were the most remarkable actions in the North, during the winter that followed the first Campaign.

In the South, Sir William Waller, Commander for the Parliament, blew up Farnham Castle, and made the garrison prisoners of war. Shortly after he took Winchester, and then Chichester, after an eight days siege.

In the midland Counties, several notable actions, though little decisive, were also performed. The 5th of December, Wilnot Commilitary-general of the King's Horse, the Lord Digby, and others, attacked the town of Marlborough, fortified by the Parliament, where was a numerous garrison. The town being carried by storm, was plundered and burnt, and about a thousand of the garrison slain and taken prisoners.

February the second, Prince Rupert took Girencester by storm, and made twelve hundred prisoners (1).

March the first, the Lord Brooke attacked some of the King's Forces intrenched in the clofe of the Cathedral of Lichfield, and was there slain; but after his death his men carried the clofe.

The 10th of the same month, a battle was fought at Salt-Heath near Stafford, which was maintained on both sides four hours, till at last [Spencer Compton] Earl of Northampton, who commanded the King's forces, being slain, the Parliament's troops became victorious.

The same day Sir William Waller killed the Lord Herbert, who was besieging Glocester, surprized five hundred of his men, and took above a thousand prisoners. After that, he took Chepstow in Monmouthshire, and then the town of Monmouth itself.

I proceed now to what passed in the western Counties, from the beginning of the war, to March the next year, 1643. As the war was always very sharp in those parts, and as the superiority was there obstinately disputed, it will be necessary, for the better understanding these events, to give a particular account of what passed in these Counties.

From the time the King was at Bevrlly, after having failed in his attempt upon Hull, he sent the Marquis of Hertford into the West, to try to raise a party capable to give the Parliament's forces a diversion. He granted him a Commission to command all the western parts, and the Marquis made Sir Ralph Hopton his General of Horse. The Marquis being come into Somersetshire, fixed his quarters at the Bath, where he could raise but few men, by reason of the vigilance of the Committee of the Militia, who greatly obstructed his levies. At last, the Earl of Bedford, who commanded in those parts for the Parliament, having drawn together much more numerous forces than were those of the King, the Marquis of Hertford was obliged to retire into Wales. He sent however Sir Ralph Hopton with about one hundred and fifty Horse into Cornwall, to endeavour to gain that County to the King's Interest. The Earl of Bedford neglected to pursue this little troop, not doubting but the Committee of the Militia would be able to disperse them, and went and joined the Earl of Effex. This passed before the battle of Edge-hill.

Hopton was well received in Cornwall, and seconded by Sir Bevil Grenvill a Cornish Gentleman, who so ordered it, that the County declared for the King. Then Hopton drew together three thousand of the trained-bands, and marched towards Lancoston, from whence they chased the Committee of the Militia, who had assembled some troops. But endeavouring to lead these trained-bands into Devonshire, they refused to march out of their County. For which reason he dismissed them, having first driven the Committee from the little town of Saltash.

Mean while, with the assistance of the Gentlemen of the County, he found means to levy fifteen hundred regular troops, with whom he became absolute master of all Cornwall, and even made incursions into Devonshire.

The Parliament having intelligence of Hopton's progress in Cornwall, ordered all their forces in Dorset and Somerset to join with those of Devon, and gave the command of this army to [Henry Grey] Earl of Stamford. The Earl heading these Troops, sent Ruthen a Scotchman Governor of Plymouth, with a detachment into Cornwall. He was no sooner there, but was met by Sir Ralph Hopton, who put him to rout, killed many of his men, and took above twelve hundred prisoners. Ruthen, after his defeat, retired to Saltash, where he endeavoured to fortify himself, and the Earl of Stamford threw himself into Taustock (2).

Hopton taking advantage of the terror, he had struck into the Parliamentarians, divided his forces into two bodies; with one of which he marched towards Ruthen, and beat him out of Saltash, and thereby remained again master of Cornwall. The other body moved towards Taustock, which the Earl of Stamford also quitted, and retiring to Plymouth, enabled Hopton with the more ease to fix quarters in Devonshire. But shortly after, both parties having agreed to observe an exact neutrality in the two Counties of Devon and Cornwall, in order to remove the war into other parts, Hopton retired with his forces into Cornwall.

Having related the principal military actions of the first campaign, and the following winter, it will be necessary to mention some other things, which indeed flowed from the war, but were not decided by arms.

Money being the sinews of war, it is not strange the King and the Parliament should do their utmost to raise all they could. But the wonder is, that they should upbraid each other with the expedients made use of to that end. According to the laws of the land, the King cannot levy money upon the Subject, without consent of Parliament; but it is no less certain, that the Parliament cannot impose taxes without the Royal assent. Taxes are laid by Acts, to which the King and both Houses must necessarily give their approbation. But what is to be done when the King and Parliament are at war with one another? Neither of them, according to the laws, must levy money upon the people, and then it will be almost impossible to wage war, or else both must be left at liberty to raise it, without regarding each other's consent. This was what the King and the Parliament practised, and yet they reproached one another with breach of the Laws. If we believe the authors who writ in favour of the King, his Majesty had no other money than what he was supplied with voluntarily by gift or loan (3). If he sometimes taxed the Counties in his power, it was always with the consent of the inhabitants. But this is a kind of artifice to deceive the Reader. For it means nothing more, than that some of the leading men of a town or county were gained, by whom it was resolved to give the King such a sum, after which it would have been in vain for the rest to oppose it, or refuse to pay their share. The Parliament proceeded in much the same manner. They demanded for the maintenance of the war, contributions, which they termed voluntary, but which were very far from being so. This very clearly appeared in an ordinance of the 29th of November, for assembling such as had not freely contributed. The King, considering this ordinance as an express breach of the law, issued out a Proclamation, enjoining all his Subjects not to submit to it. He published another of the same nature, to command all persons not to execute the ordinance of Parliament for paying Tunnage and Poundage to the two Houses. All this was founded upon the laws, requiring the Royal assent for the imposition of taxes. But such were the times, that a strict observance of the laws was become impracticable. The Parliament answered this last Proclamation, not by acknowledging, the laws were violated by their ordinance, but by saying, that the Statute urged by the King, was made to hinder the King from imposing any tax, without consent of both Houses, and not to divest the Parliament of a right to impose what they thought proper. It is easy to perceive, that this was only a cavil, since the King's consent was no less necessary for imposing a tax, than that of both Houses. Or rather, they had no right, neither the one nor the other separately, if the laws had been kept to. And yet the King, in the next February, published another Proclamation, ordering that the Customs upon Good-Imports, should be paid him at Oxford, which, in all appearance, was not performed. This subject so often returns, not only with respect to levies of money, but also with regard to every thing enjoined separately by the King or both Houses, that it will not be amiss to have some knowledge of the principles of both parties, in order to avoid passing a wrong judgment (1).

Ever since the beginning of this Parliament, the King had constantly professed a strict adherence to the laws of the land. This he perpetually opposed to the conduct and pretensions of the Parliament. When the war was begun, he pretended in the like manner, that the laws were to be observed with the same strictness as in full peace. It is very visible, how advantageous to him this principle was. According to the law, the two Houses could raise neither men nor money, much less employ them against their Sovereign; for he always supposed the war was only defensive on his part. He found therefore no better way to restore the public tranquillity, than to adhere to the laws, on the observance whereof depended the Nation's happiness. Nothing was truer than this principle, taken in general, and independently of the particular case the Kingdom was in. But, as the King himself owned, the laws being only an empty name, if not kept, and the executive power being lodged in the King's hands, the point was to know, whether the King could be relied upon for the discharge of this trust, after what had passed the fifteen first years of his reign? There lay the difficulty of the question between the King and the Parliament; to solve which the King offered only his bare word, whereon the Parliament could not, or would not rely. It is therefore evident, that when the King urged the laws in his behalf, he said nothing that in the least prejudiced the Parliament's claims. The thing was not to know, whether the laws ascribed such or such prerogatives to the Sovereign? The Parliament did not deny it: but the question was to know, whether the King was to be trusted with the executive power, after what had passed? So the whole difficulty consisted in knowing, by what means the execution of these same laws, agreed to by both parties, might be secured. The King carefully avoided the examination of this point, whether the people had a right to demand security of him, and used his utmost endeavours to reduce the dispute to this, Whether this or that were enjoined by the Laws? This is the reigning principle in all his papers, without one exception.

On the other hand, the Parliament were no less embarrassed. It is true, they clearly showed, the King had abused his prerogatives, whilst he fully enjoyed them, and from thence inferred, it was necessary to reduce his power within certain bounds. But they supposed, that in order to reduce him within these bounds, there was no other way than to strip him entirely of this same power, by depriving him of the command of the Militia, and some other prerogatives. The question in this respect was therefore, whether it was possible to find expedients, which being added to the King's word and oath, might secure to the Nation their Liberties. But the two Houses industriously avoided to enter upon that question. They were contented to suppose, without alleging any positive proof, that the King had taken arms to destroy the privileges of the people and Parliament, and consequently the war was but defensive on their part. By that they pretended to vindicate their daily manifest breaches of the Laws, representing them as absolutely necessary to attain the end they proposed to themselves, of settling the peace of the Kingdom. One can scarce help perceiving in this conduct, the aim of certain men, who laboured to render an accommodation impracticable, the better to execute the project of altering the government of the Church, to which a peace would have brought insuperable obstacles. Could the King have prevailed with himself to consent to that change, expedients would not have been wanted to adjust the other points. We shall be convinced of this hereafter, when we come to see the difficulties of the peace reduced, as I may say, to this single article.

The King, as I said, had sent the Earl of Newcastle into the North, to gain to his party the Bishoppick of Durham, with the Counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and to levy an army. The Earl happily executed the King's design. He so managed, that these four Counties entered into association to furnish him at the common expence, with men and money, so that he raised an army of eight thousand men. But at the same time, he taught the King's enemies to form the like associations, which perhaps they would never have thought of. As soon as the Parliament was informed of this association, they ordered the like to be entered into by the Counties that owned their authority, and appointed Generals to command their forces. The Lord Fairfax was made General of Yorkshire, Sir William Brereton of Cheshire, Sir William Waller of Hampshire, the Lord Grey of Lancashire, Major-General Brown of Berkshire, the Earl of Denbigh of Shropshire, Colonel Middleton of Wales, and the Earl of Manchester of Essex and the Counties adjoining, called the Eastern Counties, namely, Essex, Cambridge, Isle of Ely, Hertford, Norfolk, Suffolk, and the City of Norwich (2). By means of these associations, the Parliament had forces always ready, who indeed were designed only for the defence of the associated Counties, but were however employed sometimes in other services. The King frequently tried to prevent these associations in Counties where he knew he had a good number of friends, as for instance, in Kent, and some others. But when both Houses perceived the King's practices were like to prevail in any of the Counties where they were superior, they obliged them to associate with others, and furnish their quota.

Besides these associations between the Counties of the same party, there were also at the beginning of the war, private agreements between neighbouring Counties of different parties, to observe, between them, an exact neutrality. These agreements were founded on the common advantages of the contracting Counties, as they removed the war from their own doors, and settled a mutual commerce between them, which they could not well be without. I have given an instance in the Counties of Devon and Cornwall. The like agreement was made between the two parties in Yorkshire and Cheshire. But the Parliament refused to authorize these private agreements, because they were too advantageous to the King, who in the end would have been able, by this means, to assemble all his forces in one place, whereas he was obliged to disperse them throughout the whole Kingdom. Besides, the King's party had so well managed his concerns, that these agreements were made only in places where it was for his advantage; as for example, in Yorkshire, where the sole view was to stop the Inroads of the Garrison of Pontefract Castle, which very much annoyed the City of York.

The King retiring to Oxford, after the Brentford affair, carried thither the Prisoners taken at Brentford and Edgehill. Within few days after his return, he granted to Sir Robert Heath a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, to try some of these prisoners, among whom was Captain John Lilburn, who with some others was condemned to die, for being taken in arms against the King. The Parliament having notice of this sentence before its execution, declared, that if any prisoner of war should be put to death at Oxford, or elsewhere, they would inflict the like punishment upon such prisoners as were or should be taken hereafter. This Declaration saved the lives of the condemned, the King not thinking proper to expose his Officers to the same fate.

Though the measures of the King's friends to oblige the Parliament to make peace were broken, as I said, they were not discouraged. As the King, after the business of Brentford had fortified Reading, and left there a strong garrison, they pretended, the Inhabitants of London had cause to be extremely alarmed at their neighbourhood. So under colour of preventing the danger, they drew a Petition, to which they procured as many hands as possible, to desire leave of both Houses to present to the King some propositions which he might consent to with honour. Many of the Inhabitants of Westminster, and of the Parishes of St. Martin's and Covent-Garden, known to be the King's Adherents, prepared also the like Petition. It was a very uncommon thing, and of dangerous consequence, for private persons, without the interposition or approbation of the Magistrates, to take upon them to make overtures of peace to the King. Accordingly, the Parliament would not receive their petition, nay, ordered that the authors should be brought to justice. Probably, they did not expect, the Parliament would make use of their mediation for a peace: But in publishing this petition, wherein they called themselves the richest and most considerable Inhabitants of London, their aim was to insinuate to the People, that the honest part of the Citizens wished for peace upon more moderate terms than the Parliament, but were restrained by the Magistrates. The two Houses fully perceiving the motives of this petition, ordered it so, that the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, sent a very humble petition to the King, wherein they took care to clear themselves from all disloyalty, and expressed an earnest desire of peace. To that purpose, they besought his Majesty to return to his Parliament, accompanied with his royal, not martial attendance; to the end whatsoever was amiss in Church and State might be reformed by the advice of both Houses, and such a peace obtained, as should be for the honour of his Majesty, and the welfare of his Subjects. This Petition shewed, that the City of London desired no other peace than what the Parliament should please to agree upon with the King. It had this advantage of the first, that it came from the Mayor and Common-Council, whereas the other was subscribed only by private hands.

(1) According to some Authors, the Parliament raised in all upon the Nation, during the course of the civil War and afterwards, above ninety five millions, five hundred and twelve thousand pounds. And, according to Mr. Waller, there was levied, from the year 1641 to 1647, above forty millions in money, and in the billings per week. See Hist. of Taxes, p. 259, 267. In March 1642, they made an Ordinance for raising thirty four thousand, one hundred and fifty pounds per week. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 130.

The King's
Id. p. 85.

The King was really persuaded, that the Londoners desired and would accept of such a peace as he should be pleased to grant, but that the Magistrates, in concert with the Parliament, did their utmost to prevent it. This Petition being presented to him the 10th of January 1642-3, he returned a very gracious answer, and gave it in writing to the Committee of Aldermen. He said, "That he never entertained any misapprehension of the loyalty of his City of London, or of the Inhabitants in general: but could not say the same with regard to their Magistrates, and particularly Alderman Pennington their pretended Lord-Mayor, and two or three more (1), who endeavoured, with all their power, to prevent the People, and excite them to Rebellion. Then he enumerated all the outrages exercised at London upon himself and the Laws, and assured, he was ready to return to them, when they should be in a fit posture to receive him with honour and safety, and had apprehended the disturbers of the public peace, that they might be proceeded against by course of law, as guilty of High-Treason." The King greatly flattered himself with respect to his Papers, which he readily believed to be unanswerable. But the wonderful effects he hoped from thence did not always answer his expectations. In this belief, when he delivered his answer in writing to the Committee of Aldermen, he told them, it was his desire, that it should be read publicly at a Common-Hall and before the People. The Lord-Mayor, with the consent of both Houses, willingly gave his Majesty this satisfaction, and his answer was accordingly read in publick. But the Parliament had sent a Committee of Lords and Commons to be present at the reading, and afterwards to reject the King's answer. This did Mr. Pym, one of the Committee, in a set Speech, the design whereof was to shew, that the King's whole answer was full of scandalous and injurious aspersions upon the City and Parliament. So the King had little reason to be satisfied with the success of his answer, on which however he had much depended, imagining it would be capable of sowing discord between the people of London and the Magistrates.

Some days after, the King sent to the Sheriffs of London a Declaration, grievously complaining of Pym's Speech, and of the publication of a Pamphlet in the City in his name, as if he retracted his former promises. He required also the master and wardens of the several Companies of the City, to summon all their Members, and read this Declaration with his fore-mentioned answer, publicly in their several Halls. He declared that Isaac Pennington not being regularly elected according to their Charter, or lawfully admitted, could not be looked upon as Lord-Mayor of London, and ordered the Sheriffs to commit him to safe custody, with some other Aldermen. But the Parliament perceiving, the King's aim was to incite the people of London against their Magistrates, commanded the Sheriffs not to execute this order.

As the King frequently sent private Agents to London, to correspond with his friends there, and to be fully informed of what passed in the City and Parliament, both Houses thought proper, in order to render this practice more difficult, to declare, that all persons coming from the King's quarters to London without a safe-conduct, should be treated as spies.

During this winter, before the opening of the second campaign, the contest about the number of Papists in the service of the King and of the Parliament was renewed, on occasion of some Papers published by the Earl of Newcastle and the Lord Fairfax against each other. The Earl of Newcastle did not deny that he had Papists in his army; but maintained, they were few in number, and besides, it was lawful to employ them, since it was not the cause of their Religion, but for their loyalty. On the other hand, he affirmed, there were great numbers in the Parliament's army, and appealed for the truth of what he said to their muster rolls. I confess this proof to me seems of no weight. For besides that these rolls were not published, and consequently not easy to be examined by every body, probably, the Religion of the officers and soldiers was not specified (2). However this be, the King and the Earl of Newcastle openly asserted, there were many Papists in the Parliament's army. The Earl of Clarendon has advanced the same thing: but in all their writings, there is not a single Catholic named: Whereas the Parliament produced lists of Popish Officers in the King's service, with their names, quality, and employs. Besides, it is easy to see, that the King, according to his principles and behaviour to the Papists, from the beginning of his reign, made no scruple to employ them, and that they could themselves expect some advantage in serving him. But what interest the Parliament could have to employ Catholics, or what advantage could accrue to them from that service, does not so clearly appear. Nevertheless, the imputation perpetually cast upon him afterwards of having Popish armies, because he refused not the assistance of Papists, and the consequence drawn from thence, that his design was to destroy the Protestant Religion, must be deemed a very great aggravation, and a mere calumny to render the King odious.

Since the Queen was in Holland, she had not been idle. She laboured effectually to procure the King officers, arms, and ammunition, which was facilitated by the Prince of Orange her Son-in-law's credit. September 1642, both Houses sent an Agent, Walter Strickland, to the Hague, to complain to the States-General of the preparations making in Holland for the King, and of the supplies that were sent him. But Strickland was received very coldly, by reason of the Prince of Orange's credit in the assembly of the States. Besides, the States-General did not consider him as a publick Minister, because hitherto the Parliament had never sent Agents abroad in their own name. They were contented therefore to depute one of the members of their Assembly, to know what he had to say. Strickland put into their hands a Declaration from the Parliament, to this effect:

"That the Lords and Commons understood by an intercepted letter of the Lord Digby's, that he had addressed himself to the Prince of Orange, and by his countenance and help made provision of great quantities of ordnance, powder, arms, and divers other sorts of warlike provision: And the said Prince, the better to encourage divers commanders of English Regiments in the service of the States, to resort to the King's aid against the Parliament, had promised to relieve their places for them in their absence.

"That they could not believe, this was done by any authority of the States, considering the great help they had received from England, when they lay under the heavy oppression of their Princes. Neither could they think, that they would be forward to help to make those slaves, who had been useful and assistant in making them freemen: or that they would forget, that the troubles and dangers of them both issued from the same fountain, and that those who were set at work to undermine Religion and Liberty in England, were the same, which by open force had fought to do the like in the Low-Countries.

"That it could not be unknown to them, that the Jesuitical Faction had corrupted the King's counsels, and the consciences of a great part of the Clergy, plotted to destroy the Parliament, raised a cruel rebellion in Ireland, endeavoured to divide the King from his Parliament and People, and by false slanders incited his Majesty so, as that he had resolved to set up his Standard, and draw his sword for the destruction of his People, whom by the Laws and Constitutions of the Kingdom he is bound to preserve and protect.

"That the question was not, whether the King should enjoy the same Prerogative and Power which belonged to former Kings his predecessors; but whether that Prerogative and Power should be employed to the defence or the ruin of the Kingdom.

"That it could not be denied, but that it would be more honour and wealth, safety and greatness to his Majesty, in concurring with his Parliament, than in the course he was in; but that his counsellors looked more

(1) Pym, Coulb, and Manswring, are named by the King.

(2) The Earl says, in one of his papers, "That the Parliament had had, for many months, great numbers under their pay, both English, French, and Scots, whom, at the time of their enrolment, and ever since, they did know to have been protestant Papists: whereas, it was notoriously known, that before this course was taken on the other party, his Majesty and his Ministers did not admit to, nor continue any soldiers in pay, who were suspected to be that way inclined, or who refused the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy." Rushworth, Tenth. 50. p. 30.

"upon the prevailing of their own party, than upon any of those great advantages, which he might obtain by joining with his People.

"That both Houses had lately expressed to earnest inclinations to a national love and amity with the United-Provinces, that they had petitioned his Majesty, that they might be joined with them in a more near and strict league and union: And they could not but expect some returns from them of the like expressions; therefore desired, that they would be so far from blowing the fire which began to kindle amongst them, that they would rather endeavour to quench it, by strengthening and encouraging them, who had no other design but not to be destroyed, and to preserve their Religion."

This Declaration was long neglected, the States-General not vouchsafing to return any answer. At length, Strickland having presented it to the States of Holland, they promised to observe a strict neutrality, and engaged the Province of Zealand to take the same resolution. They even arrested some ships laden with ammunition and soldiers for the King. Then the States-General could no longer help taking notice of the Parliament's Declaration, and returned in answer: "That they would expressly forbid every body to transport any weapons or warlike ammunition into England, and would gladly employ their mediation for putting an end to the troubles."

But this could not hinder the indirect supplies that were sent to the King, by reason of the Prince of Orange's great credit. During the winter, General King, a Scotchman, brought his Majesty's ordinance and ammunition (1), and General Goring brought over some English officers that were in the service of the States. It is true, that from time to time the English ships seized some of those vessels that were sent to the King. Strickland made frequent complaints of these supplies: but the States-General took no notice of them. Nay they granted the Queen, who was preparing to return to England, so large and general a passport, that by virtue thereof she might transport into England troops, ordinance, arms and ammunition, in what quantities she pleased. Nevertheless the States of Holland, whom it concerned to keep fair with the Parliament, stopped one of the Queen's vessels laden with ammunition; whereupon she delivered in a Protestation. In all probability, they had a mind thereby to manage both parties, the Parliament, by seizing one of the ships, and the Queen, by stopping but one out of many. We shall see hereafter, that the supply brought to the King by the Queen was very considerable. She arrived about the middle of February in Burlington-Bay, and from thence went to York, where she made some stay (2).

The King, as I said, constantly insisted upon the Laws of the Land, and urged that they ought to be observed in time of war as in time of peace. The admitting of this principle would have turned greatly to his advantage, for the Laws not supposing an actual division between the King and Parliament, ascribed to the King sundry Prerogatives, which he could have made use of against his enemies. For instance, by virtue of the Prerogative, he pretended to adjourn the Courts of Justice to Oxford during Hilary-Term, but the Parliament would not consent to it.

On the other hand, the Counties being divided between the two parties, the Parliament addressed his Majesty, representing the inconveniences that would follow the holding of the Assizes in the several Counties, some whereof were for the King, and some for the Parliament, and besought him to agree to their being deferred to a more convenient season. But the King positively refused it, under colour of the necessity of punishing malefactors at all times. Had he gained this point, he might have condemned as rebels all those that had taken arms against him, for the Judges must have administered justice according to the Law, which not supposing an open war between the King and the Parliament, condemns, without distinction, all that are in arms against the King. But the case, the Kingdom was then in, being wholly extraordinary and unexpected, the Parliament pretended, the Laws could not be executed in that respect, without some restriction and explication. For this reason, they desired the Assizes might be suspended, till some means might be agreed upon, for the impartial rendering of justice. But finding, the King refused to consent to it, they published an Ordinance, forbidding the Assizes to be held till further order.

Though the war was begun in April 1642, and a host of; with several skirmishes, had been fought, the King could hardly be persuaded, that the very persons who were in arms against him, could or dared refuse the obedience that was due to him. Of this notion he gave an evident proof in March 1642-3, on the following occasion. The city of Bristol being in the hands of the Parliament, the King had given Mr. Robert Tomans [the last year Sheriff, and] one of the principal Citizens, and sent him a Commission to raise forces, and appoint what commanders he thought proper, Tomans's design being to surrender the City to the King. To that purpose, he joined with one Bourchier another Citizen, and they both formed a plot, into which many of the inhabitants entered, to seize the City for the King. This plot being discovered the very night it was to be executed, the conspirators were imprisoned, and the Parliament sent down a commission to Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes the Governor, to call a Council of war, and proceed against the prisoners by martial Law. The conspirators being condemned to die, the King writ to the Governor by General Ruthen, [Earl of Forth,] that if he put these men to death, some prisoners in his hands should undergo the same fate. Fiennes returned the General a civil answer: but in showing him however, the difference between prisoners of war, and secret spies and conspirators, he threatened, in his turn, there would be frequent opportunities, in the course of the war, for the Parliament to use reprisals. Whereupon the King writ a thundering letter to the Mayor and Aldermen of Bristol, commanding them, as well as all the inhabitants, to rise against the governor and garrison, and free the condemned prisoners. It was easy to foresee the Mayor would ill obey this order. Accordingly the prisoners (Tomans and Bourchier) were executed, without the King's thinking proper to proceed in the like manner against the prisoners in his power.

Before I relate what passed in the second campaign of the year 1643, I think it absolutely necessary to show the disposition of the King and Parliament to peace and war, Military actions depending upon many circumstances of time, place, number and bravery of the troops, conduct and abilities of the officers, these things indeed are ingredients of History but not the chief. In the recital of warlike exploits, the end of History was to teach the art of war, all the circumstances of the sieges, battles, skirmishes, would be essential: but there is another end more material to the generality of Readers, namely, to know the causes and grounds of the beginning and continuance of wars, and consequently the interests, motives and artifices of the parties concerned, from whence military actions spring. This is the reason why I resolved to be brief in the description of battles, in order to be more large upon the fore-mentioned points, which I look upon as what is most considerable. Nothing, in my opinion, is more proper to show the real dispositions of the King and Parliament, than the Treaty at Oxford in March and April 1643, concerning a peace. And therefore I resolved to give a particular account of that negotiation, and the rather as I shall thereby avoid the necessity of explaining afterwards many things, which otherwise might not be well understood.

Both Houses of Parliament having considered, that the King made some advantage of the inclination he had constantly shown for peace, sent and desired a safe-conduct for Commissioners they intended to send to him, which the King granting, the Commissioners presented to his Majesty certain propositions as proper to serve for foundation to a peace (3). Rushworth has preserved in his Collections two Speeches made in Council upon this occasion, the Earl of Bristol's to persuade the King to continue the war, and the Earl of Dorset's to demonstrate the advantages and necessity of a peace. The substance of the Earl of Bristol's reasons was as follows:

1. That the Parliament had declared divers of the greatest and most eminent among the nobility Delinquents in the highest nature; so that there could not be an accommodation without the utter ruin of themselves and their Families.
2. But granting that this article were removed, his Majesty could not condescend with his honour to beg peace of his Subjects.
3. That no mention could be found in the History of

(1) Six thousand arms. Warrick's Mem. p. 237.

Whereupon, she was forced to remove to an obscure lodging behind a hill. The Marquis of Montrose, and the Lord Ogilby, with two Troops of Horse, conducted her to the Earl of Newcastle, who entertained her at York. Rushworth's Tom. 5. p. 156. Commons War. p. 24.

All kissed his hand, and Waller approaching the last, his Majesty said, Though you are the last, yet you are not the worst, nor the least in my favour. The discovery of a plot then in hand in London to betray the Parliament, wherein Waller was concerned, did manifest the King's courtesy to Waller, to be for that service. Whitelock. p. 67.

1643. "fences and misdemeanours committed before the 10th of January 1643, which have been, or shall be questioned in Parliament before the 10th of January 1643, shall be excepted; which offences and misdemeanours shall nevertheless be taken and adjudged to be fully discharged against all other inferior Courts: That likewise there shall be an exception of offences committed by any persons, which have had any hand in the rebellion of Ireland: And an exception of William Earl of Newcastle, and George Lord Digby.

"XIV. That his Majesty will be pleased to restore such Members of either House of Parliament to their several places, out of which they have been put since the beginning of the Parliament; that they may receive satisfaction and reparation for those places; and that all others may be restored to their offices and employments, who have been put out of the same upon any displeasure conceived against them, for any assistance given to both Houses of Parliament, or obeying their commands, or forbearing to leave their attendance upon the Parliament without licence, or for any other occasion arising from the differences betwixt his Majesty, and his Parliament."

These propositions plainly showed, that though both Houses sued for a treaty in order for a peace, they were however very far from it, since they insisted upon things which the King would scarce have granted, had his condition been much worse than it was at that time. Nevertheless, as he had talked very much of his offer in August last, to treat of a peace, and of the refusal of both Houses, he did not think it advisable absolutely to reject these propositions. He consented therefore, that they should be discussed in a treaty; but gave six others on his part; namely,

"1. That his Majesty's own revenue, magazines, towns, forts, and ships which have been taken or kept from him by force, be forthwith restored unto him.

"2. That whatsoever had been done or published contrary to the Laws of the Land, or derogatory to his Majesty's power and rights be renounced and recalled.

"3. That whatsoever illegal power hath been claimed and exercised by both or either House, over his Subjects, as imprisoning their persons without Law, stopping their Habeas Corpus's, and imposing upon their Estates without Act of Parliament, be disclaimed, and all such persons so committed forthwith discharged.

"4. That a Bill be framed, for the better preserving of the Book of Common-Prayer from the scorn and violence of Brownists, Anabaptists, and other Sectaries, with proper clauses for the ease of tender consciences.

"5. That all such persons, as, upon the treaty, shall be excepted out of the general pardon, shall be tried, per Paries, according to the usual course and known Law of the Land.

"6. And to the intent this Treaty may not suffer interruption by any intervening accidents, that a cessation of arms and free trade for all his Majesty's Subjects be first agreed upon."

Some days after, the King sent a message to both Houses, to desire that his last proposition might be first taken into consideration, to the end that during the cessation of arms, the peace might be treated of with the greater tranquillity; to which they consented.

It was the 28th of February before both Houses sent the terms to the King, on which they proposed to conclude a suspension of arms, during the treaty; namely,

"1. That all manner of arms, ammunition, victuals, money, bullion, and all other commodities, passing without such a safe-conduct as may warrant their passage, may be stayed and seized on, as if no such cessation were agreed on at all.

"2. The same with regard to all manner of persons passing without such a safe-conduct.

"3. That his Majesty's forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer to Windsor than Wheatly, and in Buckinghamshire no nearer to Aylesbury than Brill; and that in Berks the forces respectively shall not advance nearer the one to the other than now they are: And that the Parliament-forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer to Oxford than Henley; and those in Buckingham no nearer to Oxford than Aylesbury: And that his Majesty's forces shall take no new quarters above twelve miles from Oxford any way; and that the Parliament-forces shall take no new quarters above twelve miles from Windsor any way.

"4. That no siege shall be begun or continued against Gloucester, and that his Majesty's forces now employed in the siege shall return to Cirencester, and Malmesbury, or to Oxford, as shall be most for their convenience; and the Parliament-forces which are in Gloucestershire, shall remain in the Cities of Gloucester, Bristol, and the Castle and Town of Berkley, or retire nearer to Windsor, as they shall see cause; and that those of Wales which are drawn to Gloucester, shall return into their quarters, where they were before they drew down to Gloucestershire.

"5. That in case it be pretended on either side, that the cessation is violated, no Act of Hostility is immediately to follow; but first, the party complaining is to acquaint the Lord General on the other side, and to allow three days after notice given, for satisfaction. And in case satisfaction be not given, or accepted, then five days notice to be given before hostility begin: And the like to be observed in the remoter armies by the commanders in chief.

"6. Lastly, That all the other forces in the Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, and not before-mentioned, shall remain in the same quarters and places, as they are at the time of the publishing of this cessation; and under the same conditions as are mentioned in the articles before, and that this cessation shall not extend to restrain the setting forth, or employing of any ships for the defense of his Majesty's dominions."

The King replied to these propositions by a message to both Houses, complaining "That he had been left without an answer almost a month, from the 3d to the 28th of February. He conceived, that the articles of the cessation now presented to him, were so strict, that such of his good Subjects who were not of his army would receive no benefit by the suspension, which he would ever insist upon: and therefore he had returned the articles, with such alterations as he doubted not but both Houses would consent to, since they sufficiently manifested, how solicitous he was for the good of his people, and how desirous to prevent any more effusion of his Subjects' blood. He desired the cessation might begin the 12th of March, or sooner, if the conditions should be sooner agreed on, and was willing the same should continue for twenty days, in which time he hoped by the treaty a full peace might be established throughout the Kingdom. It must be observed, that the King, in this negotiation, proposed to himself three advantages, as will hereafter evidently appear. 1. To gain time to make his preparations. 2. To set on foot, by means of a cessation of arms, a free commerce and correspondence between the quarters of both armies, and particularly, between London and Oxford, which would help to provide himself of many things necessary for the ensuing campaign, by sending for them from London or elsewhere. 3. To convey safely from York the forces and ammunition that were come from Holland. All this was concealed under the pretense of procuring the ease of his people by a free commerce throughout the Kingdom. These are the articles which he sent to both Houses, with the alterations he mentioned.

"I. That all manner of arms, ammunition, money, bullion, and victuals passing for the use of either army, without a pass or safe-conduct from the Generals of each army, may be stayed and seized on, as if no cessation were agreed on at all."

The King omitted here the words [and other commodities.] "II. That all officers and soldiers of either army passing without licence or safe-conduct as aforesaid, may be apprehended and detained, as if no such cessation were agreed upon at all: And that all manner of persons, his Majesty's Subjects, of what quality or condition soever (except officers and soldiers of either army) shall pass to and from the Cities of Oxford and London, and back again at their pleasure, during this cessation, as likewise to and from any other parts of his Majesty's Dominions, without any search, stay, or imprisonment of their persons, or seizure and detention of their goods or estates: And that all manner of trade, traffick, and commerce, be free and open between his Majesty's Subjects, excepting as aforesaid, between the officers and soldiers of either army, or for arms, ammunition, money, bullion, or victuals, for the use of either army, without a pass or safe-conduct, as aforesaid, which may be a good beginning to renew the trade and correspondence of the Kingdom, and whereby his good Subjects may be restored to that liberty and freedom they were born to, and have so happily enjoyed, till these miserable destructions, and which, even during this war, his Majesty hath to his utmost laboured to preserve, opening the way by most strict Proclamations, to the passage of all commodities, even to the city of London itself.

III. The beginning of this article is the same as in the Parliament's, but the end is different, viz.

"And that the forces of neither army shall advance the quarters nearer to each other, than they shall be upon the day agreed on for the cessation to begin; otherwise than in passage and communication between their several quarters respectively, without any acts of hostility."

lity each to other, but may enlarge themselves within their own quarters respectively, as they shall find convenient.

Hereby the King was at liberty to send for his forces from York to Oxford, without any opposition from the Parliament's army.

IV. That the forces of either army in Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, and Wales, as likewise in the cities of Gloucester, Bristol, and the castle and town of Berkley, shall be guided by the rule expressed in the latter-part of the precedent article.

V. This article is exactly the same with the Parliament's.

VI. That all other forces in the Kingdom of England, and Dominion of Wales, not before mentioned, shall remain in the same quarters and places, as they are at the time of publishing this cessation, otherwise than in passage and communication between their several quarters, as is mentioned in the latter-part of the said article; and that this cessation shall not extend to restrain the setting forth, or employing any Ships for the defence of his Majesty's Dominions, provided that his Majesty be first acquainted with the particulars, and that such Ships as shall be set forth be commanded by such persons as his Majesty shall approve of.

VII. Lastly, That during the cessation, none of his Majesty's Subjects be imprisoned, otherwise than according to the known Laws of the land; and that there shall be no plundering or violence offered to any of his Majesty's Subjects. And his Majesty is very willing, if there be any scruples made concerning these propositions and circumstances of the cessation, that the committee for the treaty nevertheless may immediately come hither, and so all matters concerning the cessation may be settled by them."

Though both Houses were by no means pleased with the King's alterations in their articles, yet as he offered to treat upon that subject, they desired a safe-conduct for six Commissioners, namely, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Say, and four Commons (1). The King immediately granted it, excepting the Lord Say, because he was proclaimed traitor (2). When he sent the safe-conduct, he signified to them by a message, that he was content his proposition concerning the magazines, &c. and theirs for disbanding the armies, should be first treated of and agreed, and then the second of his Majesty's, and the second of theirs, and so in order: And that the time of the treaty might not exceed twenty-days.

The Parliament's five Commissioners repairing to Oxford, presented to the King fresh articles concerning the cessation of arms. But they were so little different from the first, that the King was not satisfied with them. And therefore he delivered to the Commissioners the following objections against the last articles.

1. They are in effect the same his Majesty formerly excepted to, and there is not the least mention of freedom of commerce between his Subjects, and consequently they have no ease or benefit by this cessation, though that is his Majesty's chief aim.

2. The putting the Ships that may be employed under the command of persons approved of by his Majesty, is not consented to by these articles; and by that means the conveying of any number of forces from one place to another (which is an act of hostility) remains free to both Houses.

3. The army raised by the Parliament is spoken of, as if his Majesty were no part of the Parliament, or himself to have raised that army. Now in order to prevent any inconveniences that might arise upon real differences or mistakes, upon the latitude of expressions, and to avoid delays, his Majesty desired that the Committee might have liberty to debate any such differences and expressions, and yet no such power is given in these articles, and the committee consigned to his Majesty, they have no liberty, but are strictly bound to the very words of the articles now sent.

4. His Majesty's desire, that during the cessation none of his Subjects might be imprisoned otherwise than according to the Laws of the Land, is in no degree consented to.

5. His Majesty's desire against Violence is not at all taken notice of, nor is his desire against plundering any way satisfied; his Majesty not only meaning thereby the robbing of the Subject by the unruliness of the uncommanded Soldiers, but particularly the violence and plundering used to his Subjects, for not submitting to impositions required from them by ordinances of one or both Houses, which are contrary to the known Laws of the Land.

6. Besides, as there is no consent given to those alterations offered by his Majesty, so where an absolute consent may be supposed, because the very words of his Majesty's articles are wholly preserved, yet by reason of the relation of somewhat going before that is varied by them, the sense of those words is wholly varied too. So that upon the matter, all the propositions made by his Majesty (which did not in terms agree with those presented to him) are utterly rejected. For these reasons his Majesty desires, that the committee now sent may speedily have liberty to debate and agree upon the articles of cessation."

Both Houses perceiving, the King concealed under the little alterations he had made in their articles, more than appeared at first sight, thought proper to tell him, they were not wholly ignorant what advantages he intended to draw from such a cessation of arms as he proposed. To that end, they sent him their reasons in writing, why they were obliged to reject his additions to their articles. The substance of their reasons was to this effect:

1. That if they should grant such a free trade as the Parliament's Majesty desireth to Oxford and other places, where your Forces remain, it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to keep arms, ammunition, money, and bullion, from passing into your Majesty's army, without very strict and frequent searches, which would make it so troublesome, chargeable, and dangerous to the Subjects, that the question being but for twenty-days for so few places, the mischief and inconveniences to the whole Kingdom would be far greater, than any advantage which that small number of your Subjects (whom it concerns) can have by it.

The case then is much otherwise than is expressed by your Majesty's answer; for whereas they are charged not to give the least permission of this liberty and freedom of trade during the cessation, the truth is, That they do grant it as fully to the benefit of the Subjects even in time of war; and that your Majesty, in pressing this for the People's good, doth therein desire that which will be very little beneficial to the Subject, but exceeding advantageous to your Majesty, in supplying your army with many necessities, and making your quarters a staple for such commodities as may be vented in the adjacent Counties, and so draw money thither, whereby the inhabitants will be better enabled by loans and contributions to support your Majesty's army. And as your Majesty's army may receive much advantage, and the other army much danger, if such freedom should be granted to those places; so there is no probability, that the army raised by the Lords and Commons, shall have any return of commodities and other supplies from thence, which may be useful for them: And they conceive, that in a treaty for a cessation, those demands cannot be thought reasonable which are not indifferent, that is, equally advantageous to both parties.

As they have given no interruption to the trade of the Kingdom, but in relation to the supply of the contrary army, which the reason of war requires; so they beseech your Majesty to consider, whether your Soldiers have not robbed the carriers in several parts, where there hath been such reason; and your Ships taken many ships, to the great damage, not only of particular merchants, but of the whole Kingdom. And whether your Majesty have not declared your own purpose, and endeavoured by your Ministers of State, to embark the merchants goods in foreign parts, which hath been in some measure executed upon the Eastland merchants in Denmark, and is a course which will much diminish the wealth of the Kingdom, violate the Law of Nations, make other Princes arbiters of the difference between your Majesty and your People, break off the intercourse between this and other States, and like to bring us into quarrels and dissension with all the neighbouring nations.

2. To demand the approving of the commanders of the Ships, is to desire the strength of one party to the other, before the difference be ended, and against all rules of treaty; to make a cessation at sea, would leave the Kingdom naked to those foreign forces, which they have great cause to believe have been solicited against them, and the ports open for such supplies of arms and ammunition as shall be brought from beyond the seas: But for conveying any number of forces by those means from one port to another, they shall observe the articles of the cessation by which that is restrained.

3. As for the expressions of the army raised by the Parliament, they are contented it should be altered thus (raised by both Houses of Parliament,) as not desiring to differ upon words; but to give any conclusive power in this case to the committee, upon such differences as

(1) Mr. Pierrepont, Sir William Ernyn, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Whitelock. Whitelock, p. 68.

(2) But he told them, in case they thought fit to send any other in his room not liable to the same exception, he should enjoy the benefit of the safe-conduct, as well as if particularly named. But they did not send any in his stead, so only five went. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 173.

1643. "may arise, wherein the Houses have given no express direction, is neither safe for the committee to undertake, nor fit for the two Houses to grant; yet to debate, and to press the reason of their desires, whereby an agreement from your Majesty may be procured, is granted to them; and although the two Houses did think it most proper, the cessation should be first agreed on, and that it was unfit to treat in blood, yet to satisfy the world of their earnest longing after peace, they have given power to the committee, to enter into the treaty upon the two first propositions, notwithstanding the cessation be not yet assented to; and those being agreed, they hope the foundation will be laid not only of a suspension, but a total abolition of all hostility in the Kingdom.

"4. If the nature of war be duly considered, it must needs be acknowledged, that it is incompatible with the ordinary rules of a peaceable Government: Your Majesty would have them commit none, but according to the known Laws of the Land, whereby they conceive your Majesty understands, that it must be by the ordinary process of law; which being granted, it will follow, that no man must be committed by them for supplying your Majesty with arms, powder, ammunition: For by the law of the land, the Subject may carry such goods from London or any other place to Oxford, the soldiers must not be committed if they run from their colours, and refuse any duty in the army, No man shall be committed for not submitting to necessary supplies of money: So that if this be yielded in your Majesty's sentence, they shall be disabled to restrain supplies from their enemies, and to govern or maintain their own soldiers. It cannot be thought reasonable, that under the disguise of a cessation, they should admit that which will necessarily produce the dissolving of the army, and the destruction of the cause.

"It seems not probable; that your Majesty doth intend, that if any be taken with supplies for this army, or mutinying in your own, such persons shall not be committed, but according to the known Laws of the Land, that is, by process of Law: But rather that your Majesty will so interpret this limitation of known laws, that though it lays strait bonds upon both Houses, yet it leaves your Generals as much liberty as before: For it hath been denied by your Majesty, that these known Laws give any power to the two Houses of Parliament to raise arms, and so consequently their General cannot exercise any martial law in those cases; and it is not unlike; but that it will be affirmed, that the Generals constituted by your Majesty's commission, have that power by the same known Laws; so that this article; under the specious shew of Liberty and Law, would altogether disable them to defend their Liberties and Laws, and would produce to your Majesty an absolute victory and submission, under pretence of a cessation and treaty.

"5. Being, by necessity inevitable on their part, enforced to a defensive war in this unhappy breach between your Majesty and them, and that they are therein warranted both by the laws of God and man, it must needs follow, that by the same laws they are enabled to raise means to support that war; and therefore, till it shall please God to incline your Majesty to afford them such a Peace as may secure them, they cannot relinquish the power of laying taxes upon those who ought to join with them in that defence, and the necessary ways of levying those taxes upon them, in case of refusal, for otherwise their army must needs be dissolved. But if your Majesty shall consent to disband the armies, the cause of the war being taken away, the consequences will likewise be removed, and the Subject restored to the benefit of those Laws which the necessity of arms hath in such cases suspended.

"6. They deny any pretence of consenting to those alterations and additions offered by your Majesty; only in the preamble they say, they have considered of those articles, with such alterations and additions; unto which articles they profess they were ready to agree, not as they were accompanied with those alterations and additions, but in such manner as they expressed. As for the clause left out in the third article, it implied a freedom of passage and communication of quarters, which is contrary to the nature of the cessation, whereby matters should be preserved in the state they are, and neither party have liberty so much to advantage himself, as it is evident your Majesty might do, if your forces in the north and west might join with those at Oxford, and bring those supplies of treasure or arms thither, which were brought out of Holland; or at least it should be so indifferent, as to give a proportionable advantage to the other side, which this doth not. For the forces under the power of both Houses are so different.

posed, that they have an easy passage from one to the other: But your Majesty's forces are levered the one from the other, by many large counties, strong passes, and competent armies; and if they had admitted this clause, they had bereaved themselves of one of the greatest advantages, and freed your Majesty's party of one of the greatest inconveniences which your Majesty or they have in this war.

"For the reasons already alledged, they cannot agree to the alterations and enlargements of the cessation proposed, or to transfer any such power to the committees of treating, debating, and agreeing upon those articles in any other manner than the Houses have directed. But that a fair and speedy passage may be opened to a secure and happy peace, they have enabled their committees to treat and debate upon the two propositions concerning his Majesty's own revenue, the delivery of his towns, castles, magazines, and ships, and the disbanding of the armies; which being agreed upon, a present peace and security will follow, and the treaty upon the other proposition be facilitated, without fear of interruption, by the confusion of war, or exasperation of either party by the bloody effects thereof."

The King failed not to reply to this paper. But as his answer was very long, I shall content my self with inserting the most material part of each article.

1. Concerning the freedom of Trade :

His Majesty denies that he has any private benefit by it, and assures, that the good of the people is the only advantage he has in view. He slightly passes over the objection, that the cessation of arms not being to last but twenty days, the freedom of commerce could not be, for so short a space, of any great benefit to the Nation.

His Majesty affirms, that no complaint concerning the robbing of carriers by his soldiers has been made to him, which he has not received to the relief and reparation of the sufferers.

He owns, he is resolved not to grant his protection to such persons abroad, who assist or consent to actions of disloyalty to him at home.

2. Concerning the Ships :

He says, as the setting out of the present Fleet is pretended to be for the defence of his Dominions, it is most necessary for his Majesty to know both the designs, and to approve of the commanders. He cannot see how a cessation at Sea should leave the Kingdom naked to foreign forces; and is willing to concur in the resistance of all such, of what kind soever, and expects, that during the cessation, the conveying of all forces from one part to another by sea, for the assistance of the Earl of Essex, be restrained, which both Houses seem now to consent to, though it be not at all expressed in their former articles.

3. Concerning the Power of the Committee :

His Majesty had, and hath great reason to desire, that the Committee may have liberty to debate and conclude any differences and expressions in the articles, in order to prevent loss of time. Of this there is a clear evidence, in the consent which his Majesty now understands to be given by both Houses, that no forces shall, during the cessation, be sent by sea, for the relief of any places held by them; which clause might in much less time have been agreed here, if there had been that liberty. And much time must still be lost, as the Committee have not power to explain the meaning of both Houses concerning communication of quarters.

4. Concerning Imprisonments :

It was no part of his Majesty's intention, that his article against imprisonment of his Subjects, otherwise than according to the known laws of the land, should extend to the destruction of the military discipline of either army. This is an instance of the necessity of enabling some persons to conclude upon these articles, since a limitation of half a dozen words would have saved most of this fourth reason.

5. Concerning Taxes :

His Majesty insists very much, upon the two Houses not having a legal power to impose taxes without his consent. And adds, he is very well pleased to find, they have need of force and rapine to raise them. He says, he has reason to insist, that no such violence be used towards his Subjects, for not submitting to illegal impositions, being willing to be obliged from the like course, and to rely wholly upon the justice of his cause, and the affection of his people.

6. Concerning communication of Quarters :

The King's answer upon this article was very general and obscure. He says, it highly concerns him, that this and every other clause be so clear, that no after-differences may may arise upon any disputable point, since they, whose industry and malice could persuade any of his people, that in the business of Brentford, he had broken a cessation before any was made or offered, would have a much easier work to lay the breach of a made cessation to his charge, if the ground of breach would bear the least dispute. He agrees, that in a cessation the advantages should be equal, but from this principle draws the inference, That therefore Sir Ralph Hopton, and the Earl of Newcastle, ought to have the same liberty to come to him, as the Earl of Stamford, and the Lord Fainfax, had to come to the Earl of Essex. (1.)

REMARK (1.) This advantage not accruing to both Houses by the cessation of arms, since they had it before, the King could not pretend to the same by virtue of the cessation.

He concluded his answer with saying, "Notwithstanding all this, his Majesty, to shew his abundant desire of Peace, is contented to admit a cessation upon the matter of their own articles, so that his Majesty may not be understood to consent to any imposing upon his Subjects, or imprisoning them, to force them to contribute; so that there may not be a liberty for any rapine, plundering, or seizing upon his Subjects by the Parliament's soldiers, for not submitting to such illegal impositions; for otherwise both Houses may, during the cessation, impose new taxes, not only to the nineteenth part, but if they please, to the half, or all their estates; and their army would then be at leisure to be employed as collectors, as well of the old as the new impositions, and vast sums would and might by this means be raised, to their own extraordinary advantage, and great disadvantage of his Majesty, who can neither obtain his own consent to take the like courses, nor, in case he could, is he so quartered as to have within the power of his army, any such city as London, or so many and rich Counties as they have to retire to on such an account."

Both Houses having examined the King's answer, sent their Committee new instructions, wherein they said,

His Majesty's expressions in his answer were so doubtful, that they did not think good to consume any more time in debates upon the cessation, and the rather, as the remainder of the whole time for the treaty was but seven days, and if the cessation were presently agreed, it would not yield any considerable advantage to the Kingdom. Wherefore they should desire his Majesty, to give a speedy and positive answer to their first proposition concerning the disbanding, that so the people might not have the shadow, but the substance of peace."

These instructions being communicated to the King, he returned an answer, wherein he endeavoured to show, it was not his fault that a cessation of arms was not concluded. He pressed again, that whatever was thought doubtful in the articles might be expounded, whatever was excepted at might be debated, a cessation concluded, and power given to the Committee to that end.

These are all the transactions concerning the suspension of arms proposed by the King, and by which, probably, he had hoped to reap great advantages, had the two Houses been less upon their guard. As the conferences on the peace were not to commence till the 25th of March, whatever was done before that day concerning the cessation, is to be considered, rather as a preparative, than as part of the conferences, though the negotiation concerning the suspension was continued till the 7th of April.

I must now speak of the essential part of the treaty, relating to the terms offered on both sides for a peace. As it was agreed to begin with the discussion of the two first respective propositions, his Majesty's first was immediately considered. The proposition was, That his revenue, magazines, towns, ships, and forts, should be restored. I shall relate the principal things urged upon each of these heads.

Concerning the Revenue.

March the 26th, the Commissioners presented to the King a memorial containing,

"That the two Houses of Parliament had not made use of his Majesty's own revenue, but in a very small proportion, which for a good part had been employed in the maintenance of his Majesty's children, according to the allowance established by himself: That they would satisfy what should remain due to his Majesty, of those sums received out of his own revenue; and would leave the same to his Majesty for the time to come. But they likewise proposed, That he would restore what had been taken for his use, upon any of the bills assigned to other purposes, by several acts of Parliament, or out of the provision made for the war of Charles."

The King's Answer.

"That he was well contented to allow whatsoever had been employed in the maintenance of his children, and to receive the arrears due to himself, and to be sure of his own for the future."

"That he was willing to restore all moneys taken for his use by any authority from him, upon any bills assigned to other purposes, being assured he had received very little or nothing that way."

"But he expected satisfaction for all those several sums received and diverted to other purposes, by orders of one or both Houses, which ought to have been paid upon the act of pacification with Scotland, or employed for the discharge of the debts of the Kingdom, and by other acts of Parliament for the relief of his Protestant Subjects of Ireland."

The next day, the Commissioners desired to know of his Majesty, if he would not account his own revenue to be sure for the future, if both Houses of Parliament did leave it in the same way as it was before the troubles begun.

The King answered, "That by those words (of being sure of his own for the future) he meant that no restraints or interruption should be made by one or both Houses, in and upon his Majesty's revenue, but that it should be left in the same way it was before the troubles begun."

It is easy to see there were no difficulties upon this article capable of preventing a peace.

Concerning the Magazines.

The Parliament's Commissioners offered in writing, "That all the arms and ammunition taken out of his Majesty's magazines, should be delivered into his stores, and whatsoever should be wanting, they would in convenient time supply in kind. But they likewise proposed, That the persons to whose charge those publick magazines should be committed, being nominated by his Majesty, might be such as the two Houses of Parliament could confide in. And that he would restore all such arms and ammunition as had been taken for his use from the several Counties, Cities, and Towns."

The King's Answer.

"The magazines shall be committed to, and continued in the custody of, the sworn Officers, to whose places the same belong. And if any the said Officers shall forfeit that trust by any misdemeanours, his Majesty will by no means defend them from the justice of the Law. His Majesty will restore again, and recompense out of his own stores, such arms and ammunition as have been taken for his use out of the several Counties, Cities, and Towns. He expects, that the arms and ammunition which have been taken from the several Counties and Cities, for the use of the armies under the command of the Earl of Essex, be likewise restored to them."

Without entering into a more particular discussion of this article, it suffices to say, that the whole difficulty lay in both Houses referring to themselves the power of approving such as should be intrusted with the custody of the magazines, and in the King's pretending, that the legal oath of such persons was a sufficient security. And this rendered the conclusion of it impracticable.

Concerning the Restitution of the Towns and Forts.

The same difficulty occurred upon this article. The two Houses offered to restore the Towns and Forts, but pretended, that they should be delivered into the hands of such persons as both Houses should confide in, which the King would not agree to. As the commissioners urged the necessity of giving satisfaction to the people, with respect to their fears and jealousies, the King answered, That he rather expected, their reasons should have had some foundation in the Law of the Land, than that they should only have insisted upon fears and jealousies, of which as he did not know the grounds, so was he ignorant of the cure.

Concerning the Ships.

It was the same with this as with the two foregoing articles. Both Houses required, that the Lord High Admiral and all commanders of ships should take a particular oath, to use their utmost power to preserve the true Protestant Religion, and the peace of the Kingdom, against all foreign forces and all other forces raised without his Majesty's authority and consent of the two Houses of Parliament. But the King would not consent to it, alledging, the oaths which all those officers were by Law already obliged to take, were very sufficient. Only he said, if any thing should be made appear to him necessary to be added, when there should be a full and peaceable convention of other propositions.

1643. Parliament, he would readily consent to an Act for such addition.

If it is considered, what was the occasion of the war, it will easily be perceived, that the execution and not the injunctions of the Laws was the question. Wherefore the King, in pretending that every thing should be settled by the Laws, did not meddle in the least with the question to be decided in his dispute with the Parliament.

Rushworth, V. p. 206. The King's first proposition having been thus debated in vain, they proceeded to the first of the Parliament's, which contained two articles; namely, that both armies should be disbanded, and his Majesty return to his Parliament.

The King's answer to the first was, "That he was willing all armies should be disbanded, and conceived the best way to it to be a speedy conclusion of the treaty, and for that purpose he desired, that the time given to the Committee of both Houses to treat might be enlarged."

As to the second, "He would repair to his Parliament, as soon as he could possibly do it with his honour and safety."

As the King's answer was too general and doubtful, the Commissioners in writing desired to know, "If by the words (a speedy conclusion of the treaty) he intended a conclusion of the treaty on his first proposition, and their proposition for disbanding the armies, or a conclusion of the treaty on all the propositions of both parts."

The King answered, "That by a speedy conclusion of the treaty, he intended such a conclusion of the treaty, as there might be a clear evidence to himself and his Subjects of a future peace, and no ground left for the continuance and growth of the present bloody distinctions; which, he doubted not, might be obtained, if both Houses should consent, that the treaty might proceed without further interruption or limitation of days."

This answer being no less ambiguous than the former, the Commissioners insisted upon an explication of what they had already desired; as also that he would be pleased to let them know, what he intended should be a clear evidence to him and his Subjects of a future peace.

The King answered, "That if the conclusion of the treaty on his first proposition, and the proposition of both Houses, should be so full and perfectly made, that the Law of the Land might have a full, free, and uninterrupted course, for the defence and preservation of the rights of his Majesty, both Houses, and his Subjects, there would be thence a clear evidence of a future peace: And this would be such a conclusion as he intended. He never meant, that both armies should remain undischarged until all the propositions of both sides were fully concluded. But he was very sorry, that in that point of the proposition of both Houses, viz. his return to the Parliament, they had yet no manner of power or instructions so much as to treat with him."

The King used such general expressions, that it was easy to see, he sought only to prolong the conferences, or to make some advantage of the Commissioners answers. In all appearance, he would also have found a fresh occasion of delay, in the debate of that part of the proposition concerning his return to the Parliament.

April the 10th, the commissioners presented another Paper to his Majesty, wherein they said, "That by new instructions they were commanded to insist upon the disbanding of the two armies, and that both Houses conceived his answer to be in effect a denial, unless they departed from all those cautions and limitations contained in their reply to his first proposition: That if they had not inferred their desire of his Majesty's return in their Committee's instructions, it was because they conceived the disbanding the armies would facilitate his resolution therein."

During the course of this negotiation, the King had frequent conferences in private with the Commissioners. Whitelock relates in his Memorials, that in one of these conferences, the Commissioners (of whom he was one) having been with the King till midnight, and pressed him with their reasons upon a very material point, his Majesty was prevailed with to give a satisfactory answer, which would have much conduced to a happy success of the treaty, and told them, He was fully satisfied, and promised to let them have his answer in writing according to their desire; but because it was then too late to draw it up, he ordered them to wait on him the next morning at such an hour. Accordingly they came, but instead of that answer, which they expected, the King gave them a Paper quite contrary to what was concluded the night before, and very much tending to the breach of the treaty. Whitelock says, he was informed by some of the King's own friends, that after the Commissioners were gone from his Majesty, and his Council also withdrawn, some of his Bed-chamber (and they went higher) hearing from himself what answer he had promised, and doubting it would tend to such an issue as they did not wish, they being rather for the continuance of the war, never left persuading the King, till they prevailed with him to change his former resolutions, and give order for his answer to be drawn directly contrary to what he had promised; it being that Prince's misfortune to prefer always the opinions of others to his own. Which is an observation confirmed also by the Lord Clarendon in his character of King Charles I. (1). Indeed Whitelock does not say, that the King's answer he mentions, was the same with the following message; but in all likelihood it was so, since it was the cause of breaking off the conferences. However this be, on the 12th of April the King sent this message to both Houses, notwithstanding the endeavours of the Commissioners to dissuade him from it.

Substance of the King's Message to both Houses, April 12, 1643.

"As soon as his Majesty is satisfied concerning his own revenue, magazines, ships and ports, to which he desires nothing but that the just, known, legal rights of his Majesty, (devolved to him from his progenitors) and of the persons trusted by him, which have violently been taken from both, be restored unto him, and unto them."

"As soon as all the Members of both Houses shall be restored to the same capacity of sitting and voting in Parliament as they had upon the 1st of January 1641, the same of right belonging unto them by their birth-rights, and the free elections of those that sent them, and having been voted from them, for adhering to his Majesty in these distractions; his Majesty not intending that this should extend either to the Bishops, whose votes have been taken away by Bill; or to such, in whose places upon new writs, new elections have been made."

"As soon as his Majesty and both Houses may be secured from such tumultuous assemblies, as to the great breach of the privileges, and the high dishonour of Parliaments having formerly assembled about both Houses, and awed the Members of the same, and occasioned two several complaints from the House of Lords, and two several desires of that House to the House of Commons, to join in a declaration against them; the complying with which desire might have prevented all these miserable distractions which have ensued. Which security, his Majesty conceives, can be only settled by adjourning the Parliament to some other place, at the least twenty miles from London, the choice of which his Majesty leaves to both Houses."

"His Majesty will then most cheerfully and readily consent, that both armies be immediately disbanded, and give a present meeting to both his Houses of Parliament at the same time and place, at, and to which, the Parliament shall agree to be adjourned."

"His Majesty being confident, that the Law will then recover the due credit and estimation, and that upon a free debate, in a full and peaceable convention of Parliament, such provisions will be made against seditious preachings and printing against his Majesty, and the established laws, which hath been one of the chief causes of the present distractions; and such care will be taken concerning the legal and known rights of his Majesty, and the property and liberty of his Subjects, that whatsoever hath been published or done, in or by colour of any illegal declarations, ordinances, or order of one or both Houses, or any committee of either of them, and particularly the power to raise arms without his Majesty's consent, will be in such manner recalled, disclaimed, and provided against, that no seed will remain for the like to spring out of for the future, to disturb the peace of the Kingdom, and to endanger the very being of it."

There was no need of much penetration, to perceive by this message, that not only the King intended to break off the conferences, but also was not much inclined to peace. It was indeed very needless to enter into treaty, since neither King nor Parliament would recede from their Remarks.

His Majesty's Whitelock,
p. 68.

(1) Whitelock observes farther upon this Treaty, that their instructions were very strict, and tied them up to treat with none but the King himself, who, he says, manifested on this occasion, his great parts and abilities, strength of reason, and quickness of apprehension, with much patience in hearing what was objected against him, wherein he allows all freedom, and would himself sum up the arguments, and give a most clear judgment upon them. He says also concerning the Commissioners, the Earl of Northumberland demeaned himself with much courage and wisdom. Mr. J. corbett sees his part with deep fore-sight and prudence. Sir William Erskine was a Gentleman of good understanding and conversation, and would give his opinion upon a good reason. Sir John Hildland, a Gentleman of excellent parts as well as person, showed a very good judgment and testimony of his abilities. Mr. Whitelock, that he himself was put upon very much labour, being employed in drawing up all the Papers to the King, which were transcribed afterwards by the Secretaries. Whitelock, p. 68, 69.

pretensions. The shortest way would have been to discuss the general question, whether there was just reason to confide in the King, and restore him to his rights; for every one of the propositions offered by both parties necessarily led to that question, so that none could be decided without this being previously determined. If the rest of the propositions had been discussed, the difficulties would have been still greater, since the two parties built upon quite opposite principles. But, in all appearance, the King and the Parliament had foreseen what came to pass, and agreed to this negotiation only to make the People believe they were disposed to a peace. This was equally necessary for them, because in the People consisted the strength of both sides.

As soon as both Houses received this message, they sent their commissioners positive orders to return, and the conferences ceased.

It was not without reason that the King desired a cessation of arms, on the terms by him proposed, though for never so short a space, and that he insisted upon communication of quarters. He found himself at Oxford unprovided of ammunition, and the Queen, who was at York, had brought him a good quantity; but the difficulty was to convey them to Oxford with a strong guard. If therefore the cessation of arms had been concluded with the clause of communication of quarters, nothing would have hindered the King from sending for his ammunition from York, without the Parliament's being able to complain. For though in the first article of the proposed cessation, it was allowed to stop all persons carrying ammunition, it was not said however, that such a conveying was a breach of the suspension. Since therefore by the article of communication of quarters, the King might have drawn as many of his troops as he pleased from York to Oxford, he might likewise, if this article had been granted, have sent for his ammunition with a guard, which the Parliament's forces could not have attacked without breaking the Truce, when the guard should have passed into their quarters.

It evidently appears, the King intended to reap this advantage by the cessation of arms, which, according to him, was to be only for the sake of the people, since from the beginning of April, when the treaty was negotiating at Oxford, he detached Prince Rupert with twelve hundred Horse, and seven or eight hundred Foot, to establish a communication between York and Oxford, by securing certain places, between these two cities. The Prince marched by Birmingham, a town of the Parliament's, garrisoned with a company of Foot (1), and taking it by storm, made the Inhabitants pay a large fine, as a punishment for assisting the garrison to repulse him (2).

After this little conquest, the Prince marched directly to Lichfield, where he entered without difficulty, the town being open in several places. But the Cathedral, with the Cloze, was a sort of fortress, which he was obliged to besiege in form, it being strongly garrisoned. At last, he drained the moats, and sprung two mines, one whereof taking effect, he furiously stormed the place, which was bravely defended by the garrison: but the dread of not being able to stand a second assault, caused them to desire to capitulate. The Prince granted them an honorable capitulation, being very glad to be freed from the trouble of continuing the siege, which had lasted ten days. He intended to push his conquests farther to the north, in order to make a line of communication between York and Oxford: but the King recalled him from Lichfield, wanting him to raise the siege of Reading.

The treaty at Oxford being broken off the 15th of April, the Earl of Essex marched that day from Windsor, and on the next, appeared before Reading. His army consisted of sixteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; and the garrison of three hundred Horse, and three thousand Foot. The King was so possessed with the notion, that the Parliament's soldiers served them unwillingly, and by constraint, that he issued out a Proclamation, offering pardon to such as were in the Earl of Essex's army, a precaution entirely fruitless. At the beginning of the siege, the Governor, Sir Arthur Aston, being wounded in the head, and forced to keep his chamber, the command was devolved to Colonel Richard Fielding, the eldest Colonel in the garrison.

The King no sooner heard of the siege of Reading, but he sent away a detachment of Horse, under the command of Commissary Wilms, who found means to throw into the town five hundred men and some powder. But this supply not appearing sufficient to Colonel Fielding, he demanded to capitulate, and a truce was agreed on, during which the besiegers and the besieged, mutually gave hostages.

At the same time the King coming with his army within a few miles of Reading, detached Ruthen his General, lately made Earl of Forth, who with a thousand Musqueteers, vigorously attacked a post (3), by which the King was necessarily to pass, in order to relieve Reading. The Earl of Forth was in hopes, that whilst he attacked this post, the garrison would fall out upon the besiegers. But as, without knowing it, he had made his attack just as the truce was agreed on, there was no falling from the town. So not being able to force the pass, he retreated to the King.

Mean while, Fielding having negotiated a capitulation with the Earl of Essex, found means, before it was entirely concluded, to go in the night to the King, and tell him, he hoped to have liberty to march away with all their arms and baggage. The King approved of the capitulation, which was signed the next day, and the town surrendered to the besiegers. But by one of the articles, which probably Fielding did not tell the King, and which perhaps was not yet agreed on, the Earl of Essex excepted the deserters, who could not obtain liberty to march out with the rest of the garrison. When the King's troops came out of the town, and were passing through the enemies guards, the soldiers were insulted, and some waggons plundered, contrary to the articles of the capitulation.

The King was very well pleased with saving the garrison of Reading, and indeed that was his principal view in permitting Fielding to capitulate. But when the garrison came to Oxford, several officers complained, that Fielding was too hasty in surrendering a place which could have held out much longer. Nay, some accused him openly of betraying the King. Whereupon he desired to be tried by a council of war, which was granted him. The King, who perhaps had too readily consented to the capitulation, and was incensed at him, when he understood that the place was capable of making a longer defense, could not however find fault with his capitulating, since it was done with his approbation. But his admitting the article whereby the deserters were excepted, was charged to him as a crime, and the King published a Declaration, protesting he had not consented to that exception, being very far from refusing protection to any who should leave the enemy, and betake themselves to his service. Fielding was likewise accused of not paying punctual obedience to the King's orders: but what these orders were I have not been able to find (4). However this be, Fielding was sentenced by the Council of war to lose his head: which sentence, after long intercession, was remitted by the King; but his Regiment was given to another. Probably, he was too hasty to conclude the capitulation, and had not fully declared to the King, the true state of the place. But as he could not be condemned for that, since he had the King's consent to capitulate, other pretences were sought. This sentence occasioned great dissension in the King's army, some endeavouring to vindicate it, whilst others passionately represented it as the most unjust that ever was given in the like case.

The Earl of Clarendon says, the King having received the King, wrong intelligence, that the Earl of Essex, after the taking of Reading, was marching directly to Oxford, resolved to retire into the north to join the Earl of Newcastle. But it was only a false alarm. The Earl of Essex was so little able to besiege Oxford, that he was forced on the contrary to remain above six weeks at Reading, without being able to act, by reason of the sickness which infected his army.

Whilst the treaty for peace was negotiating at Oxford, Sir William Waller continued his conquests along the Severn, where having defeated Lord Herbert of Ragland, Son to the Marquis of Worcester, he became master of Hereford. But in assaulting Worcester he was repulsed, after which he went and joined the Earl of Essex before Reading.

As the war was spread in all parts of the Kingdom, the military actions of this second campaign, cannot, without confusion, be spoken of according to the order of time. And therefore I chuse rather to follow the order of the places, and speak first of what passed in the middle of the Kingdom, where the two principal armies lay. I shall relate next the chief events that happened in the West; and lastly, shall proceed to what passed in the North, and on the borders of the eastern Counties. These last being associated by the Parliament, and well provided with troops, the King had not many opportunities to carry the war thither. As for the southern Counties, nothing considerable was acted there this campaign. After that, I shall resume

This method has also its inconveniences: but I shall endeavour to avoid them in part, by marking the exact time of every event, that the causes and motives as well of the civil as military actions may be more easily known.

The taking of Reading seemed to be a good omen to the Parliament, for the rest of the campaign. But, as I said, the great mortality among the Earl of Essex's soldiers, suffered him not to improve this advantage. After the surrender of Reading, both Houses thought of no less than besieging Oxford, where the King was in great distress for want of warlike stores. In all appearance, the intelligence he had received, that the Earl of Essex was going to march thither, came from some friends at London, who knowing it was the Parliament's design, did not question, it would be put in execution. Mean while, the King received some ammunition in May, and as his enemies were not in condition to make any attempt, he remained quiet at Oxford.

At length, after a six weeks stay at Reading, the Earl of Essex marched towards Oxford, rather out of condescension to the Parliament, than in expectation of making any progress, by reason of the ill state of the army. He advanced however to Thame, within ten miles of Oxford, where he stopped (1). There was in his army a Scotch Colonel named Hurry, who had served in Germany with the Earl of Forth, the King's General, with whom he kept a secret correspondence. As soon as the Earl of Essex approached Oxford, Hurry quitted the Parliament's service, and went over to the King, who received him very graciously. After that, he informed Prince Rupert of the situation of the quarters of the Parliament's army, and persuaded him to make an attempt upon the enemy. So the Prince going from Oxford in the evening with a body of Horse, took a long circuit, and at break of day came to Iffingham, where beating up the quarters of two Regiments, one of Horse, the other of Foot, he cut them in pieces. Then he attacked another quarter with the same success, after which he resolved to retire by a bridge, where he had left a guard. But the Earl of Essex having now taken the alarm, had detached some troops to intercept the Prince, who was to cross Chaldgrave field, and enter a lane, which led to the bridge. The Earl of Essex's Horse not giving the Prince time to reach the bridge, he chose rather to expect them in an open field, than enter the lane with the enemy in his rear. He charged therefore these Horse with such bravery, that he put them to flight, towards a body of Foot, which the Earl of Essex was leading himself. Whilst the Horse were flying, the Prince passed the lane and bridge, and entered Oxford in triumph (2). Upon the first alarm at the head-quarters, Mr. Hamden, Colonel of Foot mounted his horse, and rode as a volunteer in the Regiment ordered to intercept the Prince. He was shot in the shoulder in this action, and within few days died of the wound. He was a person very eminent in his party, both for his courage as an officer in the army, and for his wisdom and capacity as a Member of Parliament. He had given a good proof of his firmness in his famous trial concerning Ship-money.

After this loss, the Earl of Essex, whose army was in a very ill state, thought not proper to remain longer at Thame. He put his troops into quarters of refreshment at St. Albans, Uxbridge, and the neighbouring parts, till they should be recruited and furnished with many things they wanted, which the Parliament did not seem much to regard, whether from inability, or some other reason. From that time, the King's military affairs began to flourish, and the Parliament was extremely embarrassed. The Queen joined the King the 13th of July, and brought him two thousand Foot, a thousand Horse, a hundred waggon laden with ammunition of all sorts, six pieces of cannon, and two mortars. On the other side, Sir William Waller, sent into the West by the Parliament, had the ill fortune to be defeated, and his army was so dispersed, that it was no longer serviceable (3). In this juncture it was that the King resolved to besiege Bristol by Prince Rupert, with whom was joined the Cornish army that had vanquished Sir William Waller.

The 22d of July, Prince Rupert incamped before Bristol, and the same day, with the assistance of some sailors, who had been gained, he seized the ships in King-road, laden with goods of great value, which the Inhabitants of Bristol had thought to secure there.

On the morrow, the Prince holding a Council of War, it was resolved to proceed by assault, and not by approach. The walls must have been very weak; otherwise, it can hardly be conceived, that the besiegers should resolve to storm two days after their arrival, especially as there was a numerous garrison in the place (4). However this be, the next day both armies attacked the city, each at three several places, so that the garrison were forced to divide themselves into six bodies to defend the walls. The Cornish army was repulsed with great slaughter in their three assaults. The two divisions of Prince Rupert's were likewise repulsed: but the third commanded by Colonel Wallington had better success, the Colonel finding means to make a breach in the wall large enough for the Prince to enter with his Horse. But this advantage only put him in possession of the suburbs, beyond which was the city-wall, much stronger than what he had passed. However, he marched up the street to Frome-gate, where he was forced to halt, and where he lost many of his men, who were shot by the Inhabitants from the walls and windows (5).

What the Prince had gained was so inconsiderable, that probably, the siege would still have cost much time, and many lives, if the Governor had not lost his presence of mind, and ordered a parley to be beaten. The Governor was Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, who at the beginning of this Parliament, had made in the House of Commons several fine speeches against the King, but who, in all appearance, was not very skilful in the art of war. The Prince immediately granted the desired capitulation, thinking himself very happy to gain a place of that importance in so short a time. This capitulation was ill observed by the King's soldiers, who stripped those of the garrison, and made themselves more than amends for the breach of the capitulation at Reading, whether it was done with or without the connivance of the Generals. Fiennes was imprisoned for his cowardly surrender of Bristol, and some months after condemned to die by a Council of War. But he was reprieved by the Earl of Essex, and passed the residue of his days beyond-sea.

The taking of Bristol insinuating fresh hopes into the King, he was willing to improve the present opportunity, whilst the Parliament had no army ready to oppose his progress. He resolved therefore to besiege Gloucester, the possession whereof would have been of great consequence to him. By it he would have been master of all the Severn, from Bristol to Shrewsbury, and of the whole country between that River and Wales, where there would have been only Hereford, which, probably would have quickly surrendered. By this means, he would not only have extended his quarters into a very good Country, but also secured a communication from Cornwall to the northern Counties. For as the Parliament had no army in the West, since Waller's defeat, the communication of the Western-Counties with Bristol could not be interrupted. The taking of Gloucester would have opened a communication from Bristol to Shrewsbury, and from thence to the North, by means of Lancashire, which was more for him than for the Parliament. Besides this, the taking of Gloucester would have secured him the possession of Wales, where the Parliament would have had no entrance but by sea. If therefore even some of his friends have blamed him for undertaking this siege, it may be affirmed, the ill success was the best foundation of their opinion. For my part, I believe, he had all the reason in the world to undertake it, at a time when there was no likelihood that the Earl of Essex's army could be ready soon enough to hinder this conquest. The Lord Clarendon pretends to discover a secret which confirmed the King in his resolution. He says, the King having sent a messenger to Colonel Maffy, Governour of Gloucester, to persuade him to deliver the place, Maffy in publick answered in a high style, but in private bid the messenger tell the King, "that if he came himself to besiege the town, he would not hold it against him, for it would not stand with his conscience to fight against the person of the King (6)." But the sequel showed, either that Maffy had altered his mind, or the King had taken a mere compliment for a positive promise, since in the defence of this place Maffy was very far from expressing the least inclination to favour the King.

For those who were ever possessed with the notion, that those who were against him acted contrary to the dictates of the conscience, and readily believed, they only wanted to be made to serve him, wherein he was frequently

Not only so, but clearly how advantageous to the King the taking of Gloucester would have been, than the Parliament's alarm when they heard the first news of his marching to form the siege. Whereas before, the Earl of Essex's army was in decay, all endeavours were used to recruit it, the moment the King's intention was known. Care was taken to complete the Regiments by fresh levies of soldiers, and in Essex with all possible expedition. And to facilitate these levies, the Parliament ordered the shops to be shut up, Gloucester should be relieved, and moreover, the Earl of Essex's army was strengthened with a numerous body of the city trained-bands. These things were done with that diligence, that in fifteen days the Earl of Essex was ready to march to the relief of the besieged.

The King came before Gloucester the 10th of August, [with about eight thousand horse and foot] and immediately ordered the approaches to be begun, which however were not so far advanced as was expected, by reason of the frequent sallies of the besieged. Besides, the King was obliged to go to Oxford, which made him lose some days. The Earl of Essex beginning to march the 26th of August, arrived in few days near Gloucester, and advancing to Presbury Hills, drew up his whole army in view of the city, expecting the King would come and give him battle. But the King not thinking fit to run any hazard, raised the siege, which could not be done without great disorder (1). The Earl of Essex marching into Gloucester, found the besieged reduced to a single barrel of powder, and no better provided with other stores (2). After staying there three days (3), he departed towards London, passing through Tewkesbury in his way. He marched two days before the King knew he was gone, and surprized the town of Cirencester, where lay two regiments (4). After that he crossed North Wilshire, a deep and inclosed country, which obliged him to make very short marches.

As soon as the King had notice of the enemies march and rout, he departed also in order to follow them, sending Prince Rupert before with all his cavalry, consisting of five thousand horse. It is likely, his intention was that the Prince should post himself between London and the Parliament's army, whilst he followed, and put the army between him and his cavalry. Be this as it will, for it is not easy to guess the King's design, Prince Rupert came up with the Earl of Essex, as he was marching over Ashburn-Chace, intending to have reached Newbury that night. There ensued in this place a sharp conflict, Prince Rupert having charged the Earl's rear, who were put into some disorder. The Marquis of La Viewille a Frenchman (5), who served the King as a volunteer, was killed in this action. This conflict obliged the Earl of Essex to quarter at Hungerford. The next day he continued his march towards Newbury, but found that the King had prevented him by two hours and posted himself near the town. Prince Rupert, after the action of the foregoing day, went and joined the King.

The two armies, being too near each other to part without blows, prepared for battle, and the fight begun (6). Prince Rupert, as usual, performed wonders with his horse. He quickly made the Parliament's cavalry give way: but took care not to commit the same fault he had done at Edge-Hill, by pursuing the runaways too far. After he had routed the enemies horse, he charged their infantry, who, though destitute of the assistance of the cavalry, received him with such intrepidity, that he could make no impression on their stand of pikes, but was forced to wheel about. It was fought all the rest of the day with pretty equal success. But in the night the King retired with his army, and left the way open to the Earl of Essex to proceed to Newbury, where he intended to lodge the night before. Next day, the Earl of Essex seeing the coast clear, pursued his march, and passing through Newbury, arrived at Reading as he had before resolved. Prince Rupert, who followed him, seeing him entered into the narrow lanes, attacked his rear, put them in disorder, and took some prisoners: but prevented not the Earl from continuing his march. He remained two days at Reading to refresh his troops, and without leaving a garrison in the place, which was possessed by the King's forces after his departure, returned to his old quarters. The King lost in this battle above twenty officers of note, and among others [Henry Spencer] Earl of Sunderland, [Robert Dormer] Earl of Caenarvon, and [Lucius Carey] Lord Falkland Secretary of State, who would be present at the night, though he had no call, not being a military officer (7).

I have taken the description of this battle from the Lord Clarendon, which by many omissions is rendered obscure. Among others, it does not appear what the King did with his infantry. This gives occasion to presume, that his foot were routed when Prince Rupert charged the Parliament's. For otherwise, it can't be conceived, how these left could have resisted, had they been attacked by the King's infantry and cavalry at once. Neither is it seen in this description, why the King left the field of battle in the night, since it does not appear that he had received any considerable loss. Nevertheless, the Lord Clarendon endeavours to prove, though by weak arguments, that the King gained the victory. I believe it would be very easy to confute his reasons, were there any occasion. I shall content myself with saying in general, that the Earl of Essex's design, at his departure from Gloucester, was to return to his former quarters about London, and that the battle of Newbury hindered him not from executing it, whereas the King's intention was probably to intercept the Earl of Essex's passage, which he could not effect (8).

After the battle, the King retiring to Oxford, and the Earl of Essex to Windsor, neither had much share in the actions of the rest of the campaign. I shall proceed therefore to other parts of the Kingdom, where the war was continued, and particularly in the West, where it was very sharp.

I have already said in speaking of the affairs of those parts, that the Parliament did not think proper to consent to the neutrality entered into by the Counties of Devon and Cornwall. On the contrary, they resolved to carry the war into Cornwall, which had declared for the King. To that end, about the beginning of May, whilst the King's Troops were at Lancelston, few in number, and very short of Provisions, [Henry Grey] Earl of Stamford, the Parliament's General in the West, entered Cornwall with an army of seven thousand men. He posted himself on the top of a hill near Stratton, from whence he sent a party of twelve hundred horse, under the command of Sir George Chudleigh, to Bodmin, a town in the middle of the County, in order to keep it in awe and hinder the militia from joining the King's forces as they had once before done. Sir Ralph Hopton, who commanded for the King at Lancelston, and had but three thousand men, easily saw he should be driven out of the County, unless he found means to avoid it by some notable action. This made him resolve to march to the enemies, though they were much superior in number, and advantageously posted. The Earl of Stamford thought himself so secure from any attack, that though he had frequent notice of the enemies approach he could not believe it. Indeed, it would have been rash in Sir Ralph Hopton, to attack him with so great disadvantage, had there been any other way to save the County for the

(1) Whitekelch has a particular not mentioned by the Lord Clarendon, viz: his Majesty underestimating that Essex advanced apace to the relief of Gloucester, sent a Trumpet to him, with some propositions to be treated on. But Essex, much acquainted with such small designs to hinder his march, returned a speedy answer, That he had no Commission to treat, but to relieve Gloucester, which he was resolved to do, or to lose his life there. And his Soldiers hearing of it, were come with Propositions to treat, cried out for a long time together, with loud acclamations, No Propositions, no Propositions. So their Trumpets were sent back. Whitekelch, p. 72.

(2) Their whole strength of Soldiers, Horse, Foot, and Dragoons, together with the trained Bands, did not at first consist of above fourteen hundred; and, or at the most, fifty barrels of powder was all their store, and a mean and slender artillery. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 287.

(3) And in that time, says the Lord Clarendon, which was as wonderful assay part of the story, caused all necessary provisions to be brought in to them, and these very quarters in which the King's army had been so long situated, and which they conceived to be entirely spent: So soldiers were not for Peppercorn what they had, and to refuse it for them. Tom. II. p. 285.

(4) And took forty loads of Provisions, six Standards, three hundred common Soldiers, and four hundred Horses, the said forces being designed for King to raise an army there for the King, and Sir Nicholas Crispe to command them. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 292. Rapin, by mistake, says Chudleigh, instead of Crispe.

(5) He attended the Queen out of Holland. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 266.

(6) Clarendon does not say, however, whether the fight was at night. Idem, p. 287.

(7) Whitekelch says, that as he went into the night, he said, He was weary of the Time, and foresaw much misery to his Country, and did not see but he should be killed. His death, says Whitekelch, was lamented by all that knew or heard of him; being a Gentleman of great parts, ingenuity and industry, and a passionate promoter of all endeavours of peace betwixt the King and Parliament. He was slain in the 34th year of his Majesty's age.

(8) Whitekelch's account of Newbury fight is briefly this: Essex finding his Soldiers full of mutiny, and resolved to force their way, he led them in part to a hill charged the enemy with his own Regiment and the Lord Robt's Brigade of Horse; the fight began about six o'clock in the morning, the King's army held with very little more till ten or eleven at night. The Parliament's forces beat the enemy from all their advantages, got the hill from them, in which they were posted, pursued them to Newbury, and out of the town again, but the night coming on, they could pursue them no further; so that though the King's forces (especially the Horse) conducted most of the Gentlemen, made a gallant resistance, yet this place not being proper for their fight, they were thus beaten, and in the night marched away, leaving Essex master of the field, while Soldiers had the pillage of the dead bodies. Whitekelch, p. 73.

The battle was not over even a clock in the morning, till seven or eight at night. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 295.

King. However that be, the 15th of May, approaching the hill on which the Earl of Stamford was incamped, he ordered him to be attacked at four several places (1). As the assailants were resolved to conquer or die, they gained, though with great difficulty, the top of the hill, which their enemies were at length forced to relinquish, after sustaining the charge many hours. In this action the Earl of Stamford had only three hundred men killed, but left seventeen hundred in the hands of the enemy. Among these prisoners was Major-General Chudleigh, who being carried to Oxford, turned to the King. The Earl of Stamford, whether to excuse his defeat, or upon some grounds; openly complained, that Chudleigh had betrayed him, and in the heat of the battle turning against him, charged him with the body under his command. The Earl of Clarendon pretends it was a scandal; but I imagine few now are concerned to know the truth (2).

After this battle the Earl of Stamford throwing himself into Exeter, his army being dispersed, and the party of horse sent to Bodmin, thinking proper to retire to Phymouth, Hopton remained master of Cornwall. Shortly after, he was informed by a messenger from Oxford, that the Parliament had resolved to send Sir William Waller into the West, with forces to join the remains of the Earl of Stamford's army and some levies that were to be raised in that Country, and that the King on his part was sending thither the Marquis of Hertford and Prince Maurice with a body of troops, who were now upon their march. This made him think, it would be very proper for his little Cornish army (to it was now called) to join the Marquis's forces. He marched therefore into Devonshire, leaving a party at Salisbury to defend Cornwall from any incursions of Phymouth, and advanced to Taunton, where he expected orders from the Marquis. Presently after, hearing the Marquis of Hertford was come to Exeter, a town in Somersetshire, on the edge of Devonshire, with seventeen hundred horse and one thousand foot, he went and joined him, and the two bodies together formed an army of seven thousand men. Taunton, a large town in Somersetshire, was the first, the Marquis of Hertford resolved to attack. But the garrison saved him the labour, by retiring to Bridgewater, on account of a sedition raised by the inhabitants. On the morrow, the Parliament's troops quitted also Bridgewater, and in few days Dunbar Castle was surrendered to the King (3).

The Marquis of Hertford having said about Taunton some days, heard at last that Sir William Waller was within two days march of him, drawing troops together with the utmost diligence, and expecting more from London and Bristol. Whereupon he resolved to attack him, without giving him time to strengthen his army any more. Whilst he was preparing to execute this design, the Committee of the Militia, who were levying forces (4) in those parts to join them with Waller, perceiving a favorable opportunity, beat up one of the Marquis's quarters, who was now advanced to Somerton, and gave to brisk an alarm to the King's troops, that the Marquis was forced to draw out the whole army. Then the Parliament's forces retired to Wells: but seeing they were pursued, quitted Wells, and posted themselves on the top of Mendip hill, which overlooks the City. The Marquis of Hertford being come to Wells stayed there, the day being fair spent. But Prince Maurice, Sir Ralph Hopton, and the Earl of Carnarvon, taking the enemies retreat for a flight, went out with two Regiments of horse to pursue them, and marched directly to them. Whereupon the Parliament's forces being mostly foot and few in number, retired in order to join a detachment of horse sent by Waller to support them. But the Earl of Carnarvon, who was farthest advanced, gave them not time to retreat in good order. As they were obliged to pass through a lane, he entered after them, and pursued them beyond, till he met with Waller's horse, who stopped his Career, and compelled him to retire in his turn with great precipitation. Prince Maurice coming to his relief, a warm action ensued, wherein the Prince received two cuts in his head, and was beaten off his horse, but was fortunately relieved. Night obliged both parties to retire, the King's to Wells, and the Parliament's to Bath.

Some days after, the Marquis of Hertford, knowing Waller's army daily increased, marched towards Bath to try to draw him to an engagement. But Waller having his reasons to defer it, because he still expected fresh supplies, the Marquis advanced to Maryfield, five miles beyond Bath [towards Oxford]. Whereupon Waller [whose chief business was to hinder him from joining with the King] marched out of Bath, and drew up his army on Langdown, expecting the enemies, who failed not to move towards him. As the Marquis of Hertford was in a Country so disaffected to the King, that only force could procure him any supply or relief, and as besides, he was advanced beyond Bath on purpose to engage them to fight, he was unwilling to lose the opportunity. In this action, which was called the Battle of Langdown, of his two thousand horse the Marquis of Hertford lost above fifteen hundred. But on the other hand, he drove Waller from his post, and compelled him, to give way about demi-culverin shot. Next day, Waller retired to Bath, and the Marquis entirely remained master of the field (5).

But this inconsiderable advantage, gained with the loss of almost all his horse, threw him into a very ill situation. He had been sent into the West to drive Sir William Waller from thence, and yet, after the battle, Waller was between the King's army and the western Counties, where the Marquis could penetrate but by a second battle, which he was not in condition to hazard, as being without horse. This made him resolve to march to the Devizes, leave there his Infantry under the command of Sir Ralph Hopton (6), and break through to Oxford, with the Prince and the remainder of the horse, in expectation of returning from thence with a body of Cavalry strong enough to bring off the foot he should leave at the Devizes, which was but thirty miles from Oxford. This resolution was pursued. But as soon as he had quitted his Infantry at the Devizes, Waller came before the town with his whole army, and invested these troops, who were in a very ill state by reason of the scarcity of provisions. As he was sensible, the besieged could not remain long in such a state, he made them an overture of capitulating with him, which Hopton gladly embraced, in the uncertainty whether any supplies would come from Oxford, or would arrive soon enough. He entered therefore into treaty with Waller: but with intention to prolong it as much as possible, and not yield to the last extremity, as expecting every moment to be relieved from Oxford. Waller was so confident that they were at his mercy, that he had sent the Parliament word, "That their business was done, and by the next post, he would send the number and quality of his Prisoners."

Mean while, the Marquis of Hertford and Prince Maurice being come to Oxford, and having represented to the King the distress of his troops at the Devizes, his Majesty immediately sent the Lord Wilmut with fifteen hundred Horse, who came within two miles of the Devizes before the capitulation between Hopton and Waller was signed.

Waller was no sooner informed of the enemies approach, but he drew up [without drum or trumpet] his whole army on Roundway Down, over which the King's troops were necessarily to pass in order to join those in the town. Wilmut, finding he could not execute his design without fighting, drew up within musket-shot of Waller's army. But perhaps he would have thought of it more than once, before he attacked with fifteen hundred Horse an army so superior in number, had not Waller begun the fight, by charging the enemy with a regiment of cuirassiers lately sent from London, and which till now had been deemed invincible (7). This regiment was vigorously repulsed, and retreating in disorder, infused such a Terror into Waller's troops, that they made but a faint resistance. Mean while Hopton seeing from the town the disorder of the enemies, came out with his Foot, and bravely second-

(1) The four divisions of the little army were led on, the first by the Lord Moban and Sir Ralph Hopton; the second by Sir Juba Berkeley and Sir Bevil Grenville; the third by Sir Nicholas Slanning and Colonel Trevanion; the fourth by Colonel Balfour and Colonel William Gresham. In memory of this battle, Sir Ralph Hopton was afterwards created Lord Hopton of Sironet. As for the twelve hundred Horse sent to Bath, under the command of Sir George Chudleigh, Father to the Major-General, upon the news of the defeat, Sir George, with as many as he could keep together, got into Lyminster. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 228.

(2) Rushworth says, that by Letters afterwards interpreted to his Father Sir George, it appeared to have been a design to have, whereupon his Father, to prevent any suspicion on himself, furnished his Commission: And shortly after, published a sort of Decree on, which is to be seen in Rushworth, Tom. 2. p. 228.

(3) By Mr. Luttrell, the owner, who thereupon was made Governor of it by the Marquis. Sir Juba Berkeley was made Governor of Taunton, and Lord Windham of Bridgewater. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 213.

(4) These forces consisted not only of new raised men, but also the remains of those Horse and Dragoons that escaped out of Cornwall, after the battle of Sironet, and the Soldiers that fled from Taunton, &c. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 213.

(5) In this battle, as was before observed, fell Sir Bevil Grenville. This was the first time the King's Horse had turned from an enemy, and yet, it seems, by a Regiment of Cuirassiers commanded by Sir Arthur Hagger, which were so completely armed, that they were called the Armour of St. Leger. John after the battle, Sir Ralph Hopton was in easily hurt by the accidental blowing up of some powder. Idem, p. 220.

(6) Who was now still younger, and could hear and speak, though he could not see or stir; with him were left the Earl of Marlborough, General of the Artillery, and the Lord Moban. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 221.

(7) This was the Regiment of Devizes before-mentioned, which, according to Rushworth, rally led on by Sir Arthur Hagger, leaving the Envoy, charged the King's forces very discommoding early, and so were speedily routed. Whitelock says, Waller's Horse, upon a panic fear, fled, and left the Foot to the mercy of the enemy. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 285. Whitelock, p. 70.

1643. ing Wilmot, who for his part did not give the enemies time to recover themselves, they quickly put the whole army to rout, killed five or six thousand men, and took nine hundred prisoners. Waller, after his defeat, escaped to Bristol. He complained very much of the Earl of Essex, who, lying then at Thame, had suffered Wilmot to pass without sending a party after him, or giving the alarm to Oxford, which would have caused Wilmot to be recalled. The Earl of Essex on the other hand, who was no friend to Waller, could not forbear saying some reproachful things on his defeat. This bred such enmity betwixt them, that it might have been very prejudicial to their party, had not the Parliament taken care to reconcile them.

Id. p. 226. After to complete a victory, the Lord Wilmot returned in triumph to Oxford, and the Marquis of Hertford, taking the command of the army, appeared before the city of Bath, the gates whereof were opened at the first summons. Presently after, the King, having resolved to besiege Bristol, was here recalled, and ordered the Cornish army to join Prince Rupert at the siege. As soon as he was master of Bristol, he resolved to send an army into the West, under the command of Prince Maurice, and to keep the Marquis of Hertford near his person. To that end, he gave orders to Robert Dormer Earl of Carnarvan, who was to serve under Prince Maurice, to advance towards the West with a party of horse, whilst the Prince should follow with the infantry, of which the Cornish army made the best part. The Earl of Carnarvan marched first into Dorsetshire, which declared for the Parliament, and took Weymouth, Dorchester and Portland-Castle. Here Prince Maurice came and joined his cavalry. When he was at the head of the army, he suffered his troops to use such licence, and so ill observed the articles made upon the surrender of the towns, that the Earl of Carnarvan, out of indignation [being a person full of honour and justice upon all contracts] quitted his command in this army, and returned to the King before Gloucester. Mean while Prince Maurice, after staying some time in Dorsetshire, entered Devonshire, and laid siege to Exeter, which was surrendered by capitulation by the Earl of Stamford.

After the taking of Exeter, the Prince applied himself chiefly to increase the number of his forces by fresh levies, whilst the Parliament had no army in that Country able to withstand him. In a short space, he assembled seven thousand foot, with horse in proportion, besides three thousand men commanded by Colonel John Digby before Plymouth, the blockade of which place he had formed, till the Prince should come and besiege it. There had lately been discovered at Plymouth a plot framed by Sir Alexander Carew, Knight of the Shire for Cornwall, and Governour of the fort and island of St. Nicholas, on which depended the security of the town, to deliver the island and fort to the King. Carew was apprehended and sent to London, where some time after he was condemned to die by a Court-martial (1).

When Prince Maurice had completed his levies, instead of going to Plymouth, he laid siege to Dartmouth, which employed him more than a month. During that time, the inhabitants of Plymouth, whom the discovery of Carew's plot had thrown into a great consternation, recovered themselves, and resolved upon an obstinate defence. This resolution was confirmed by a supply of five hundred men sent by the Parliament by sea, with a Scottish Governour an experienced warrior. So, Prince Maurice, when he came before the place, found the conquest of it much more difficult than he had expected. He continued however the siege, notwithstanding the winter, which was now begun. Here I shall leave the affairs of the West, till I have farther occasion to speak of them, and proceed to the recital of what passed in the North during this campaign.

Since the Earl of Newcastle's arrival at York, with his army levied in the North, the Lord Fairfax had been obliged to keep at some distance from that city, to avoid being attacked by an army much more numerous than his own. All the northern parts from York to the borders of Scotland were for the King. The southern part of Yorkshire was for the Parliament, and the war was waging in the middle parts of the country to the right and left. But as yet he was transacted, besides the taking of small towns, which served only to enlarge the quarters of one or other army.

In May 1643, the Earl of Newcastle took two or three of these places. In the same month, the Lord Fairfax having detached fifteen hundred men, under the command of his Son Sir Thomas Fairfax, ordered Wakefield to be attacked, where lay three thousand men of the King's party. This assault was made about four in the morning, with such vigour and conduct, that the King's troops were driven from the town, and many taken and slain. Amongst the prisoners was General Goring the commander (2).

Presently after, the Earl of Newcastle had his revenge. Having taken Hawley house (3), he marched from thence towards Bradford, and in the way, threw himself into Hull, where Sir John Habham had been lately apprehended by order of Parliament, and the Lord Fairfax was made Governor of that important place.

In June, Gainsborough, a town in Lincolnshire, was taken by the Lord Willoughby [of Parham], commander for the Parliament in those parts, who there made Robert Pierpoint Earl of Kingston prisoner. But being informed that the Earl of Newcastle was preparing to recover Gainsborough, he sent his prisoner in a pinnace to Hull. The Earl was unfortunately shot by some of his own party, who would have stopped the pinnace. Mean while, the Earl of Newcastle began indeed his march to besiege Gainsborough, and at his approach, detached a party of horse to invest the town. Oliver Cromwell arriving at the same time, with design to supply the town with provisions, defeated this detachment, pursuing them even in sight of their main body, which he did not think to be so near. As he was not in condition to face this army, he retreated in good order, and after throwing supplies into the town, retired at a greater distance. Shortly after, the Earl of Newcastle retook Gainsborough, and possessed himself of Lincoln, where he put a strong garrison; after which, he besieged Hull, whilst the King was before Gloucester.

The Lord Fairfax, assisted by Sir John Meldrum a Scottishman, defended the town of Hull with great bravery and conduct for five weeks, though he was vigorously attacked. At last, October the 11th, the besieged made a grand sally, and after a very obstinate fight, which was several times renewed, drove the besiegers from their trenches, and seized their cannon. This obliged the Earl of Newcastle, now created Marquis, to raise the siege.

The same day this famous sally was made at Hull, a gross body of horse, part of the Earl of Newcastle's army, commanded by the Lord Widdington, were routed at Horn castle, by [Edward Montague] Earl of Manchester, who had with him Sir Thomas Fairfax, and Cromwell.

The rest of the military actions during the winter, after this campaign, having a necessary connexion with the affairs of Scotland and Ireland, I am indispensably obliged to speak of what passed in these two Kingdoms in the course of this year. I shall begin with Scotland.

The Parliament of England, when they replied to the Scots proposition of uniting the two national Churches, made their answer, which was no less ambiguous than the demand, a toothing, which they might use or not, as occasion required. It is certain, there was a strict correspondence between some of the leading-members, and the Scots. These Members easily foresaw, that to establish Presbyterianism in England, they should in the end want the Scots, who, on their part, were ready to assist them when a favorable opportunity should offer. Since the King, in his last journey to Scotland, had been forced to grant the Scots whatever they desired, the leaders of the contrary party had taken such just measures, that all the offices of the Kingdom were in the hands of their friends, whilst those that were suspected of inclining to the King, were removed from all sorts of employments. By this means, the friends of the Parliament of England were in a capacity to second them at a proper time, in establishing the Presbyterian Government in the Church of England. It was not solely out of zeal for Religion, but also out of policy, that the directors of the Scottish affairs, wished the English would receive that form of Government. They believed, they could never promise themselves a perfect tranquillity, if it should happen to be in the King's power to be revenged of them, and that he would be incessantly prompted thereto, if the Bishops were restored in England. Whether this belief was well-grounded, or only a prejudice, it is certain they looked upon the restoration of Episcopacy in England, as the first step to their ruin. For this reason, they always continued a very strict correspondence with both Houses, by means of their Commissioners residing in London, in order to act in concert with them, for lessening the King's power, and destroying Episcopacy. This plainly appeared in the course of this year 1643.

The affairs of the Parliament not being in a situation to afford a prospect of any great advantages upon the King's campaign, the Scots began to prepare to assist them, in case there should be occasion. To that purpose, about the beginning of May, it was moved by some of the leading 1643. men, that there might be a joint meeting of the Council, the Conservators of the Peace, and the Commissioners for public Burthens. In the hands of all these was lodged the authority of the Kingdom, when there was no Parliament. This motion was readily complied with, all the public offices and posts being, as I said, filled with men of that party. In this assembly it was proposed, that, considering the danger the Kingdom was in, by reason of armies levying in the north of England, Scotland should be put in a posture of defence. As this could not be done without a Parliament, or a convention of Estates, it was urged, that there was an absolute necessity of immediately summoning such a convention. The Marquis of Hamilton, and several others, strongly opposed it, alledging, that for them to appoint a convention without the King's order, was an encroachment upon the Royal Prerogative in the highest degree: That his Majesty had promised to call a Parliament in the year 1644, and therefore to hold a convention of Estates before that time, without his privity, was directly contrary to the Laws of the land. But their arguments were in vain. It was carried by the majority, that the Lord-Chancellor should summon a convention of Estates, against the 22d of June. They make a distinction in Scotland between a convention of Estates, and a Parliament. The convention of Estates is a Court consisting of all the Members of Parliament; but as they are called, and sit without the state, or formalities used in Parliament, so their power extends only to raise money or forces, but not to make or repeal Laws.

The King having notice of what was projecting in Scotland, immediately sent thither the Earls of Roxborough, Kinnoul, and Lanerick, with instructions concerning what they were to do for his service. These three Lords arrived at Edinburgh the 15th of May, and brought the Marquis of Hamilton a Patent, creating him a Duke. Besides this, they presented to the Council a Declaration from the King, wherein he endeavoured to display the justice of his cause against the Parliament of England. He vindicated his innocence with regard to all the aspersions cast upon him, particularly concerning Religion, and represented very pathetically, the wrongs and injustices done him. As we have seen more than once what the King alledged in his vindication, I think it unnecessary to insert this Declaration. I shall only observe, that he concluded with saying, "God to deal with us, and our posterity, as we shall" "inviolably observe the Laws and Statutes of that our native Kingdom, and the Protestant Religion, the Laws of the Land, the just Privileges and Freedom of Parliament."

Shortly after, the King hearing that a convention of Estates was summoned without his order or privity, easily perceived, this step was not taken without an intention to support it. He chose therefore to permit them to assemble, but with express order to limit their consultations to the best ways and means of supplying the Scottish army in Ireland, and to relieving public burthens by pressing a speedy payment of the brotherly assistance due from England. But the convention was by no means inclined to be thus restrained. When the Estates met, the first thing in debate was the limitation in the King's letter of license. The Duke of Hamilton, with the King's other friends (1), voted it no Convention but as regulated by his Majesty's Letter; but all the rest voted it a free Convention (2).

The King pretended afterwards, the Duke of Hamilton and his brother the Earl of Lanerick had not served him with sincerity, and if they had pleased, they might have hindered the convention from meeting. Some time after, these two Lords repairing to Oxford, he ordered them to be apprehended, but the Earl of Lanerick found means to escape, and his brother the Duke was sent down to be imprisoned in the Castle of St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall. The Earl of Clarendon in his History supports, to the utmost of his power, the King's suspicions of these two brothers, whilst, on the other hand, there is, in the Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, a large vindication upon this article.

The convention of Estates met the 22d of June, and the General-Assembly of the Kirk, the 2d of August. 'Tis observable, it was in June that an ordinance of the Parliament of England, was published for calling an Assembly of Divines and others, to be consulted by both Houses, for settling the Government and Liturgy of the Church of England, and that this Assembly held their first sitting the first of July, a few days after the meeting of the convention of Estates in Scotland. The sequel shewed with what design this Assembly was appointed.

The precaution taken by the Scots was not ineffectual. They seem to have foreseen what happened soon after. For in the interval between the proposing a convention of Estates, and the time of their meeting, the Earl of Essex's army was seized with sickness after the taking of Reading; the city of Bristol fell into the King's hands; and Sir William Waller's forces were routed at Roundway-down. If the King's successes had not received a check, by the raising of the Siege of Gloucester, and the battle of Newbury, it is very visible, the Parliament's affairs were in a very ill situation about the end of July and the beginning of August, that is, at the time the convention of Estates, and the general Assembly met in Scotland. Accordingly, both Houses failed not to improve the precaution taken by the Scots, and which, in all appearance, had been suggested to them. As they saw, their affairs were declining, they applied, without farther consideration, to the convention of Scotland for assistance, and sent commissioners, with full powers to treat. These commissioners, who came to Edinburgh whilst the King was approaching Gloucester, found the Estates of Scotland as well disposed as they could wish (3).

Both Houses had foreseen, that the Estates of Scotland would demand, in return for their assistance, a positive engagement to establish in the Church of England a Presbyterian Government, like that in the Kirk of Scotland. It is scarce to be doubted, that some of the Directors of the Parliament's affairs had made such a private agreement with them, though it cannot be proved by any public Acts. Nay, very likely, the Earl of Essex's army had been suffered to decay, on purpose to reduce things to such a state, that the assistance of the Scots should be absolutely necessary. At least, it is hard to discover any other reason, that could have induced the Parliament to suffer that army to remain unserviceable, from the taking of Reading to the siege of Gloucester. It appeared that this proceeded not entirely from inability, since, when the danger grew more imminent, means were found to enable the Earl of Essex to relieve Gloucester. Now it was precisely whilst the Earl of Essex's army was thus neglected, that the Parliament resolved to desire the assistance of Scotland. Be this as it will, both Houses sent, with their commissioners, two Declarations, one directed to the convention, the other, to the general Assembly. The first was, only to desire the speedy assistance of the Estates, and to inform them, that their commissioners had instructions to treat with them, not only concerning the satisfaction to be made for the desired aid, but also about settling the accounts between the two Kingdoms. In the second, both Houses acknowledged the great zeal and love, manifested by the general Assembly of the Churches of Scotland, in their endeavours for the preservation of the true Protestant Religion, from the attempts of the Popish and Prelatical party, to the necessary reformation of Church Government in England, and the more near union of both Churches. And therefore they exhorted the Assembly to send into England some of their body, for the furtherance of that work in conjunction with the Assembly of Divines now sitting at Westminster. They declared also, that besides their instructions in the civil matters of both Kingdoms, the commissioners had received directions to resort to and consult with the general Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, in every thing relating to the reformation of the Church of England; and to that end, Mr. Marshall and Mr. Nye, Ministers of God's word, were appointed to assist the commissioners with their advice.

With these Declarations the commissioners found no difficulty in their negotiation. On the contrary, the general Assembly addressed to the Estates a Declaration, containing the reasons which ought to induce them to assist the Parliament of England. The reasons were to this effect:

1. The controversy now in England being betwixt the Lord Jesus and Anti-christ with his followers, if we would not come under the curse of Merax, we should come out, and help the Lord against the mighty.
2. There was an Act passed by the convention of Estates, Anno 1585, wherein the Estates found it necessary to enter in a League and Christian Confederation, with all Protestant Princes and Estates, against the bloody League at Trent. Conformed to which there followed a League betwixt the two Crowns of Scotland and England, subscribed at Berwick 1586, against whatsoever foreign and intestine Powers of Papists should arrive or rise. And therefore the cause being the same, as well as the parties, and the danger, we are bound to perform now, what we promised then.

1643. bid the taking of the Covenant, but it produced no great effect. On the contrary, the Committee of Estates did, by their printed Act of the 22d of October, ordain it to be sworn and subscribed by all the Subjects, under pain of having their goods and rents confiscated. After that, they summoned all the Lords of the Council to come and sign it before them. The Duke of Hamilton, and some others, refusing to subscribe it, the Committee, by another Act, [of the 17th of November,] ordered all their Lands to be seized, and their persons to be apprehended, with permission to kill such as resisted. Notwithstanding all this, the King, at the Duke's coming to Oxford, caused him, as I said, to be arrested.

After both Kingdoms had agreed upon the Covenant, the Estates of Scotland appointed Commissioners to treat with the English, concerning the aid desired. The substance of the Treaty, signed November the 29th, is as follows:

Treaty between England and Scotland. Id. p. 484.

" 1. That the Covenant be sworn and subscribed by both Kingdoms.

" 2. That an army shall be forthwith levied in Scotland, consisting of eighteen thousand foot effective, and two thousand horse, and one thousand Dragoons effective, with a suitable train of artillery, to be ready at some general rendezvous near the borders of England, to march into England with all convenient speed, the said foot and horse to be well and completely armed, and provided with victuals and pay for forty days.

" 3. That the army be commanded by a General appointed by the Estates of Scotland, and subject to such resolutions and directions as shall be agreed and concluded on mutually between the two Kingdoms, or by Committees appointed by them in that behalf.

" 4. That the charge of levying, arming, and bringing the said forces together, as also the hiring the train of artillery, be computed and set down according to the same rates, as if the Kingdom of Scotland were to raise the said army for themselves; all which for the present is to be done by the Kingdom of Scotland upon account, and the account to be delivered to the Commissioners of the Kingdom of England, and when the peace of the two Kingdoms is settled, the same to be repaid or satisfied to the Kingdom of Scotland.

" 5. That this army be likewise paid, as if the Kingdom of Scotland were to employ the same for their own occasion; and towards the defraying thereof, shall be monthly allowed and paid the sum of 30000*l.* Sterling by the Parliament of England, out of the estates and revenues of the Papists, Prelates, Malignants, and their adherents, or otherwise; and in case the said 30000*l.* monthly, or any part thereof, be not paid at the time when it shall become due, the Kingdom of England shall give the publick faith for the paying of the remainder unpaid with all possible speed, allowing the rate of 8*l.* per Cent. for the time of the performance thereof; and in case that notwithstanding the said monthly sum of 30000*l.* paid as aforesaid, the States and Kingdom of Scotland shall have just cause to demand farther satisfaction of their brethren of England, when the peace of both Kingdoms is settled, for the pains, hazard, and charges they have undergone in the same, they shall by way of brotherly assistance have due recompence made to them by the Kingdom of England, and that out of such lands and estates of the Papists, Prelates, Malignants, and their adherents; and for the assurance thereof the publick faith of the Kingdom of England shall be given them.

" 6. And to the end the said army may be enabled and prepared to march, the Kingdom of England is to pay in ready money to their brethren of Scotland the sum of 100,000*l.* Sterling at Leith or Edinburgh, by way of advance beforehand, which is to be discounted back again to the Kingdom of England by the Kingdom of Scotland, upon the first monthly allowance which shall grow due to the Scottish army, from the time they shall make their first entrance into the Kingdom of England.

" 7. That the publick faith of the Kingdom of Scotland will be given, to be jointly made use of with the publick faith of the Kingdom of England, for the present taking up 200,000*l.* Sterling in the Kingdom of England, or elsewhere, for the speedy procuring of the said 100,000*l.* Sterling as aforesaid, as also a considerable sum for the satisfying in good proportion the arrears of the Scottish army in Ireland.

" 8. That no cessation, nor any pacification or agreement of peace whatsoever, shall be made without the mutual advice and consent of both Kingdoms.

" 9. That the publick faith of the Kingdom of Scotland shall be given to their brethren of England, that neither their entrance into, nor their continuance in the Kingdom of England, shall be made use of to any other ends than are expressed in the Covenant, and in the articles of this treaty: and that all matters of difference that shall happen to arise between the Subjects of the two Nations, shall be resolved and determined by the mutual advice and consent of both Kingdoms, or by such committees as for this purpose shall be by them appointed.

" 10. That the Kingdom of England do oblige themselves to aid and assist the Kingdom of Scotland, in the same or like cases of straits and extremities.

" 11. That during the time that the Scottish army shall be employed, as aforesaid, for the defence of the Kingdom of Scotland, there shall be fitted out, as men of war, eight ships, whereof six shall be of burthen betwixt one hundred and twenty and two hundred tun, the other between three and four hundred tun; all which shall be maintained at the charge of the Kingdom of England, to be employed for the defence of the coast of Scotland, under such commanders as the Earl of Warwick for the time of his being Admiral shall nominate, with the approbation of the committees of both Kingdoms; which commanders shall receive from the said Earl general instructions, that they do from time to time observe the directions of the committees of both Kingdoms."

Though this treaty was not signed till the 29th of November, the Estates of Scotland were so secure, there would be no objections to the terms, that the troops of the most distant Counties were now marching to the general rendezvous, whilst the treaty was in hand. The very day the Covenant was sent to England, namely, the 18th of August, a Proclamation was published in the King's name according to the usual stile, commanding all the Subjects of Scotland, from sixteen to sixty years old, to provide themselves with ammunition, arms, and forty days provisions, and to be ready to march for the defence of the Kingdom. The King could not bear, that an order should be published in his name to his Subjects of Scotland, to arm themselves against himself. He writ a vehement letter to the Council, commanding them expressly to call in the Proclamation, but it was to no purpose. The King seems not to have known, that in Scotland as well as in England, in all state-affairs, the King is never considered as separated from the People, and that it is the usual practice to publish all publick orders in the King's name, though they are prejudicial to his private interests. History furnishes us with numberless instances, and the King had found, by too frequent experience for some time in England, that in making war upon him, it was pretended to be for his honour and true interest. He himself pretended, that he waged war with both Houses in defence of the liberties of Parliament. This is an effect of the constitution of the Government, whereby the King as the head, and the People as the body, are deemed inseparable. If they happen to be divided, it is not strange, that each pretends to act for the good of the whole, since this pretension is made the sole cause of their division.

Upon this foundation it was, that the Estates of Scotland published two Manifesto's, wherein, supposing the King to have been, and still to be, guided by pernicious counsels, they pretended not only, that they might justly assist the two Houses against him, but were bound in conscience to make war upon him. They maintained, they had no other view, than to rescue him from the dangers he willingly exposed himself to, and to labour for his happiness and glory. After all, this maxim is not wholly peculiar to England and Scotland. It has been followed in other States during civil wars. All that can be said, is, that many times the welfare of the King and State, is only a cloke to ambition, revenge, and other criminal passions. But it is not impossible, that what is frequently a pretence only, may sometimes be a very solid reason. It is the part of the wife and unbiaised, who seek only the truth, to distinguish the real motives which engage Subjects to take arms against their Sovereigns, in States where an absolute and unlimited power cannot with reason be ascribed to the Prince, as in England and Scotland.

The King made a long answer to these Manifesto's, but it was upon quite contrary suppositions. He pretended, both Houses of Parliament had forced him to take arms in his own defence: That his consent to the Acts of the Parliament of Scotland, was more than sufficient to secure their Religion and Liberties: That his Subjects of Scotland could not, without being guilty of treason, make war upon him on any pretence whatsoever, and other like suppositions, which the Scots did not grant, as he did not those made by them in support of their pretended right. There is one, among others, which frequently occurs in the authors who have writ on this subject, and which is admitted, or rejected, according as they lean to either party. And this obliges me just to mention it, in order to arm the reader against the prejudices of both.

Ruffworth.
IV. p. 371.

In the treaty of peace concluded at London 1643, there was this clause: That the Kingdom of Scotland shall not denounce nor make war against the Kingdoms of England, or Ireland, without consent of the Parliament of Scotland; nor, on the other hand, the Kingdom of England make war against Scotland, without consent of the Parliament of England. And in case any of the Subjects of any of the Kingdoms shall rise in arms, or make war against any other of the Kingdoms and Subjects thereof, without consent of the Parliament of that Kingdom whereof they are Subjects, or upon which they do depend, that they shall be held as traitors to the States whereof they are Subjects. And that both the Kingdoms, in the cases aforesaid, be bound to concur in the suppressing of those that shall happen to rise in arms, or make war without consent of their own Parliament.

The King supposing, that the Scots, in aiding the Parliament against him, intended to make war upon England, inferred from this clause, that they were guilty of treason. This inference was founded not only upon the supposition above mentioned, but also upon the convention of estates not being a true Parliament, and moreover upon his having given them license to meet, but with such limitations as had not been observed. The Scots supped on the contrary, that, far from intending to make war against England, their design was to aid and defend that Kingdom against the Popish and Prelatical party, and rescue the King out of their hands. Thus, what the King called invading England, the opposite party called assisting it. This must be always remembered when we read the history of those days.

Ruffworth,
V. p. 498.

The Scotch army entered England January 15, 1643-4. But it is not yet time to relate what they did there. It will be necessary first to speak of what passed concerning Ireland, and of some other important occurrences of the year 1643.

Affairs of Ireland.

As to Ireland, the success of the first campaign had been so equal on both sides, that neither could boast of having gained any great advantage. The point was to continue the war, each rightly judging, peace would be always very remote, so long as things remained in a state of equality. And therefore the King and the Parliament thought of strengthening themselves against the ensuing campaign. The treaty of Oxford not succeeding, as was easy to foresee, the King thought of means to employ at home the English troops that served in Ireland, and to that purpose, of making a truce with the rebels. As this notable project could not but be odious to the English, and render suspicious all the King's professions with respect to the Irish rebellion, he saw himself obliged to use more caution, to procure an excuse to conclude this cessation. This he did by engaging the Lords-Justices of Ireland, and the Council of Dublin to countenance his project. But as I may be accused of ascribing to the King motives he never had, I think it incumbent on me to allege here the unquestionable testimony of the Lord Clarendon. The reader will find it in Vol. II. p. 318. Fol. Edit.

The King was not all this while without a due sense of the dangers that threatened him, in the growth and improvement of the power and strength of the enemy, and how impossible it would be for him, without some more extraordinary assistance, to resist that torrent, which he foresaw by the next spring would be ready to overwhelm him, if he made not provision accordingly. And finding by degrees, that it was not in his power to compose the disturbances of England, or to prevent those of Scotland, and abhorring the thought of introducing a foreign Nation to subdue his own Subjects, he began to think of expedients which might allay the distempers in Ireland; that so, having one of his Kingdoms in peace, he might apply the power of that towards the procuring it in his other dominions. He was not ignorant, how tender an argument that business of Ireland was, and how prepared men were to pervert whatsoever he said, or did in it; and therefore he resolved to proceed with that caution, that whatsoever was done in it, should be by the council of that State, who were understood to be most skillful in those affairs.

Hence it is evident, that the King's design in making a truce with the Irish rebels, was to employ the English forces which served in that Kingdom, to subdue the Parliament, and that, to avoid the reproaches which might be cast on him for it, he resolved to manage, that it should appear to be done by the Council of Ireland, that is, by the Lords-Justices, and the rest of the Council. In the passage I have quoted, the Lord Clarendon insinuates, that the King came not to this resolution till about the end of the year 1643, that is, when he was sure the Scots were to send an army into England. For, after relating what had passed during the campaign of 1643, the Parliament's negotiations in Scotland, the Covenant of both Kingdoms, the resolution taken in Scotland to aid the two Houses, the calling of the Oxford Parliament; which was not done till December the same year; he comes at last to speak of the King's resolution, to make use of the English troops that were in Ireland. The King, (says he,) was not all this while without a due sense of the dangers that threatened him, and how impossible it would be for him to resist that torrent, which he foresaw by the next spring would be ready to overwhelm him. He began therefore to think of expedients which might allay the distempers of Ireland. It is however certain, the King resolved to make a truce in Ireland long before the Parliament's negotiation with Scotland, and before the Scots resolution to levy an army. And what invincibly proves that the King was determined, before the engagement of the Scots, is, that the Irish truce was signed the 15th of September 1643, after a long negotiation. Thus, the Lord Clarendon's insinuation, that the King did resolve to employ the English forces of Ireland, only to secure himself against the torrent that was ready to overwhelm him, being very ill-grounded, confirms what will be seen hereafter, that he was not induced by necessity to make a truce with the Irish rebels, but by the hopes of subduing the Parliament with these additional forces.

To have a pretence to conclude this truce, the King believed, the best way was to persuade the publick, it would be extremely advantageous, or rather was absolutely necessary, to the English in Ireland; and their only refuge, to preserve what they still possessed in that Country. He had complained several times, that the Parliament neglected the Irish war, and would have had a numerous army sent thither. But, as I said before, the Parliament suspecting, the King's aim was only to weaken them by that diversion, were contented with sending from time to time a few supplies to continue the war, besides the Scotch troops which made a great diversion in the north. These supplies, tho' inconsiderable, had however produced this good effect, that the rebels, instead of making greater progress, had on the contrary lost much ground, after several defeats. They were however still much superior to the English, and tho' the English and Scotch forces were able to curb them a little, they were not strong enough to hope to reduce them to obedience. Nay, it was to be feared, they would in the end be overpowered with numbers, especially as the Parliament, engaged in a war with the King, could not send a powerful aid into Ireland, for fear of leaving England unprotected. This was the pretence used by the King to conclude a truce with the rebels.

In the situation of affairs, since war had been declared between the King and the Parliament, the Lords-Justices who governed Ireland were greatly embarrassed. They had been commissioned by the King, and consequently from him they were to receive their orders. But on the other hand, the Parliament having taken upon them to pay the charges of the Irish war, they could not openly declare for the King, without forfeiting the assistance of the Parliament, the King not being in condition to supply them. A perfect neutrality was not possible, because the King's and the Parliament's interests being opposite, they could not implicitly obey the one, without being suspected by the other. They chose therefore to try to content both, as far as was possible, and the rather, as the King and the Parliament expressed an equal desire to end the Irish war. But they could not remain long in this situation. Such was their case at last, that it was not possible for them to please both. The Parliament having sent [in October 1642]

a committee to Dublin to assist the Council, and settle with the Lords-Justices, what related to the continuance of the war (1), these Commissioners were at first received with respect, but in February 1643, by the King's express order, were sent back to England. The King was well pleased, the Parliament should supply what was necessary for continuing the war, but unwilling they should have any share in the government of Ireland, or their Commissioners a place in the Council of State. Shortly after, he removed some of the Lords-Justices and Counsellors (2). Probably he was then forming the project of a truce with the rebels, and wanted for that purpose, that the Lords-Justices, and all the Counsellors should be disposed to act only by his orders. Besides, on this supposition, the Parliament's commissioners could not but be a great impediment, had they continued to assist at the Council of State. From that time also, the instances of the Lords-Justices to the King and Parliament for aid, became more pressing and frequent. They represented the state of the English in Ireland, as entirely desperate, without a speedy supply of men, money, and ammunition. They said, the officers were very importunate for leave to return to England. In a word, they 1643. omitted nothing, that was apt to create a belief, there was no remedy. On the other hand, some officers of the English army presented a Remonstrance to the Lords-Justices, April the 4th, 1643, declaring, they were reduced to despair for want of money to subsist, and that it ought not to be thought strange, if in their case they should have recourse to the first and primary law of nature, which God hath endowed men withal, namely, the law of self-preservation. If to these so earnest complaints be added, what the Lord Clarendon says, that the King resolved so to proceed, that every thing should appear to be done by the Council of Ireland, the sending back of the Parliament's commissioners, and the changes made among the Lords-Justices, and members of the Council, one can scarce help suspecting these complaints to be all begged, on purpose to serve for pretence to the cessation. This suspicion seems the more probable, as at that time the affairs of the English in Ireland were upon a very good foot, and as the Marquis of Ormond had just gained, at Rosk, a signal victory over the rebels. Accordingly the Lords-Justices, as well as the officers, took care not to make the progress of the rebels the ground of their complaints, but only the want of money, provisions, and ammunition.

However this be, the Remonstrance of the officers being sent to the King, he took occasion from thence to send to the Marquis of Ormond a Commission, empowering him to treat with the rebels, and agree with them upon a cessation of arms [for one year.] He gave notice of it to the Lords-Justices, in a letter of April the 23d, 1643, commanding them to assist the Marquis in the execution of his Commission, to the utmost of their power. The date of this Commission is remarkable, for it evidently shows, that the Scots resolution to assist the Parliament, which was not taken till the following August, was not the cause of the Irish truce.

May the third, the King renewed his orders to the Marquis of Ormond concerning the truce. But before the Marquis had received these fresh orders, the Lords-Justices had writ to the King, the 11th of the same month, a very expressive letter, representing the miserable condition of Ireland, in such terms as showed, that every one was reduced to despair for want of money, and provisions, tho' till then the English forces had been crowned with success against the rebels (1).

The King, who meant to take an advantage from this letter, to demonstrate to the publick, the necessity of the cessation he intended to conclude, sent it to both Houses (2), who immediately took this affair into consideration. A Committee was appointed, with orders to think of ways to raise money for Ireland. Upon the report of the Committee, the Parliament resolved to raise money by voluntary contributions, and offered very advantageous terms to such as should advance the sums required (3). But notwithstanding this, the King, July the 2d, dispatched fresh orders to the Lords-Justices, and the Marquis of Ormond, to conclude a truce for one year, which they were already endeavouring. From the 20th of June, the general Council of the Irish, assembled at Kilkenny, had granted a Commission to treat (4).

September the 7th, the King repeated his orders to the Marquis of Ormond, to conclude the truce as soon as possible. At the same time, he ordered him to send into England, all the English forces that could be spared after the conclusion of the truce. His reason was, and he could justly say it then, that an army was preparing in Scotland to invade England. But there was no mention of that article in the foregoing orders.

At length, the cessation was signed the 15th of September, on the condition that both parties should remain in possession of what they held. The King founded the necessity of it, first, upon a Remonstrance presented to him December the first 1642, by four Colonels, as well in their own, as in the names of many other officers, who served in the army of Ireland, wherein they told him, it was impossible for them to subsist any longer, if means were not found to supply their pressing wants. Secondly, upon the repeated letters sent from the Lords-Justices to the King and the Parliament, since January 1642-3, wherein they said, the army was going to perish in few days, for want of assistance. Thirdly, upon the aforementioned Remonstrance of the officers of the 4th of April, wherein they pretended a few hours delay to assist them, would be too long (5). Nevertheless this army, which was reduced to extremity the first of December 1642, found means to subsist till the 15th of September 1643, though the Lords-Justices complained, they had received no supplies since November. This is a clear evidence, that all these complaints were very much aggravated by the private direction of the King, who meant to use them for pretence to the truce. This is what the Parliament represented in a Declaration published on account of the Irish cessation, before they had notice of its being concluded: They complained very strongly, that they were never acquainted by the States of Ireland, with the treaty of a cessation, much less was their advice demanded, notwithstanding, that by act of Parliament, and by his Majesty's commission under the Great Seal, both Houses were to advise, order, and dispose of all things concerning the government and defence of that Kingdom. They said, that to accomplish more easily this dishonourable cessation, those of the State in Dublin, who were so honest and religious as to disavow it, were first discountenanced, and at last put out of their places, and restrained to prison, as Sir William Parsons one of the Lords-Justices, Sir John Temple master of the Rolls, Sir Adam Loftus Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, and Sir Robert Meredith, one also of the Council-table. That it was made only with a view to discourage those who had subscribed to advance money upon the Parliament's proposals, in order to render impossible the maintenance of the army in Ireland, and to employ it in England, to the destruction of the Parliament. For these and many other reasons, which I omit to avoid tediousness, both Houses declared the intended cessation void, promising to indemnify those who should refuse to submit to it (6).

Mean while, the King who was assured of the concurrence of the Lords-Justices, the Council of State, and the Marquis of Ormond General of the army, so ordered it, that after the conclusion of the truce all the English troops that could be spared were sent to him. These forces landed at Mossyn in Gloucestershire, and their first attempt was upon Harrowden Castle, which was surrendered to them the 4th of December. Then they took some other small places in Gloucestershire (7); after which the Lord Byron (8), who commanded for the King in those parts, besieged Nantwich, January the 15th 1643-4. Three days after, making a sudden and violent storm upon five several places of the town at once, he was every where repulsed with the loss of many of his men. At last, the 21st of the same month, the Lord Fairfax, who advanced to relieve the town, entirely routed the Irish army, consisting of three thousand foot, (who were almost all slain or taken prisoners,) and of eighteen hundred horse, most of whom escaped by flight but were so dispersed that they could be of no farther service to the King. Colonel George Monk was taken in this action, and sent prisoner to the Tower of London, where he remained some time, till at last he took arms against the Parliament (9). Thus the King received no advantage by these troops, any, they rather did him great prejudice, in that, by all his proceedings to procure them, he confirmed the mistrust entertained by many people, of his being concerned in the Irish Rebellion.

Not to interrupt the thread of the military actions, and of what passed in Scotland and Ireland, I have been forced to pass over several important events of this year 1643, of which it will be necessary to speak, tho' without any connection, as they are of a different nature. The Reader will easily, by observing the dates, perceive their relation to the general affairs. I shall begin with certain projects framed at London, to compel the Parliament to make peace, whilst the armies were in the field.

The King was ever strongly possessed with the Notion, that fear alone held most of the people attached to the Parliament, and that if he procured them a good opportunity to hold up their heads, he should oblige both Houses to make a speedy peace, without demanding the Securities, which made the principal obstacle. This was the favorite 1643. scheme, as well as of his Ministers, his Council, his friends and adherents in London and elsewhere; and this was the spring of several projects to force the Parliament to a peace. It would indeed be very strange, that so many able men should be of this opinion, without any manner of foundation. But on the other hand, one knows not what to think, when it is considered, that of so many projects, built upon this supposition, not one succeeded, which seems to argue that the majority of the people were not for the King. However this be, it is certain, the King had many friends in London, and in the Parliament itself, who served him artfully, by pretending to dread that the war would be destructive to the Parliament; and thereby they endeavoured to infuse a real terror into the people, and incline them by degrees to wifh and sue for peace. These men incessantly plotted to sow discord between the Parliament and the people. As it was necessary for them to hold private correspondence with the Court, in order to act according to directions, his Majesty sent frequent messengers to London, sometimes secretly, sometimes openly, under colour of bringing messages to the Parliament, in order to convey his instructions to his friends, and be exactly informed of what passed in both Houses and the City. With this view in December 1642, he published for the fake, as was pretended, of the Inhabitants of London, a Proclamation for the free and safe passage of all goods, wares and merchandizes to the City. But the Commons suspecting some hidden mystery under this condescension, passed the next month two orders, the one, That no carriers or waggoners should be permitted to go to Oxford or elsewhere, without special licence from the Parliament: The other, that any agent or servant to any person that was in arms against the Parliament, who should presume to come to Westminster, or reside about London, should be forthwith apprehended as a spy. The 10th of April following, these orders were renewed, and even extended to all persons that should come from the King's quarters to London without a safe conduct, and the same was printed and published.

In all appearance, the King, who had so many correspondents in London, was not ignorant of this order. Nevertheless, on pretence it was not signified to him in form, he sent a message to the Parliament, with an offer of peace in general terms, without demanding a safe-conduct for the bearer. But the Commons, refusing to stop the course of these artifices, which served to carry on the King's private correspondence in London, ordered the messenger to be sent to prison, for coming without a safe-conduct. Three days after, to show the people, the King vainly amused them with hopes of a peace, they impeached the Queen of High-Treason, and sent up the impeachment to the Lords by Mr. Pym. The King, full of indignation at this extraordinary proceeding, published a Proclamation, to forbid obedience to the orders of both Houses, declaring, he acknowledged them no longer for Houses of Parliament.

Affairs were in this situation, when both Houses discovered a conspiracy formed in London, ever under colour of procuring peace refused by the Parliament. I shall give the particulars of this conspiracy, as they were communicated to the Lords by Mr. Pym, at a conference between the two Houses. He told them,

"I. That the conspiracy was formed of a mixture and conjunction of persons of several qualities, some whereof were of both Houses of Parliament, others of the City, and others belonging to the Court, who in their respective places and employments were to form and perfect the work, raised out of the ashes of the late petition of London for peace.

"II. The chief actors were Mr. Waller, a Member of the House of Commons, who pretended, and gave out to the rest, that many others of that House, and of the Lords, were privy to and concerned therein; Mr. Tompkins, a Gentleman living in Holbourn, Brother-in-law to the said Mr. Waller, and a servant to the Queen, as being Secretary to the Commissioners for her Majesty's revenue; Mr. Challoner an eminent Citizen; one Mr. Blinkard, Mr. Alexander Hampden, who brought the last message from the King; Mr. Hassel, one of his Majesty's messengers, &c.

"III. The method was, for several persons in the City to dispose of themselves into a committee, to hold intelligence with both armies, the Court, and the Parliament, to take a general survey of the affections of all the Inhabitants within the weekly bills of mortality, which was to be done under these three ranks, right men, (or of the King's party) averse men, (or the well-affected to the Parliament) and moderate men, (or neutrals;); to consider of arms, ammunition, and all provisions of war, to appoint out of themselves select persons to treat with Mr. Waller and Mr. Tompkins in relation to the City, Court, and Parliament; as also with Sir Nicholas Crisp, Sir George Binion, Captain Royden, and others at Oxford.

"IV. Mr. Waller's part, was to engage a considerable part of the Lords and Commons, and to be a means of conveying counsels, resolutions and intelligence between them and the said City-Committee. Mr. Tompkins was not only an assistant to Mr. Waller therein, but an instrument to convey by Hassel and others their proceedings to the Court, principally to the Lord Falkland, and to receive thence directions, powers, and commands.

"V. For preventing discovery, protestations of secrecy were taken, as they were Christians not to disclose it, and no man in the City was to endeavour the engaging above two, whereby no one man could impeach many.

"VI. From the Court, Mr. Heron and Mr. Alexander Hampden, and others employed upon messages from the King to the Parliament, were to convey directions, encouragements, and advice to those in London, and authority was to be given under the Great-Seal, and warrants under the King's hand, for settling a Council of war, naming of Generals and other officers, execution of martial Law, raising of money, and providing arms; and to facilitate the whole, part of the King's forces to be in readiness to assist the party here, as there should be occasion.

"VII. The particulars of the design itself were, to seize the King's children, to secure several Members of Parliament, particularly the Lord Say, the Lord Whar-ton, Mr. Pym, Sir Philip Stapleton, Colonel Hampden, and Colonel Strade, as also the Lord-Mayor and Committee of the Militia, under pretence of bringing them to a legal trial; to seize upon the out-works, forts, magazines, gates, and other places of importance in the City and the Tower, and let in the King's forces, and in the mean time to resist and obstruct all payments, imposed by authority of the two Houses for support of their armies.

"VIII. For their authority they had the following commission brought up by the Lady Aubigny, (who was under custody) the said commission being found hid underground in Mr. Tompkins's cellar.

"IX. In pursuance of this commission, they had often consulted of a General, and treated with Sir Hugh Pellar, prisoner in the Compter (once a Member of the House of Commons, but expelled, being accused of having an hand in the design to bring up the northern army against the Parliament,) about it. And a Declaration was ready drawn, setting forth, the cause of their taking up of arms to be in pursuance of their late protestation, to maintain the true Reformed Protestant Religion against all Papists and Sectaries, to oppose illegal assessments, &c. which was to be distributed to their friends, and on the night of their rising set upon the posts round about London. Concerning which time of their rising they had also consulted, (of which precise notice was to be sent to Oxford, as to the day and hour) and some moved to have it done on Wednesday the last of May (being the fast day, and the very next day after the first intimation was given towards a discovery) but it had been put off, and not fully concluded, it being said, it should be left to the Lords to determine, whom Waller pretended should side with them. Mr. Hassel, lay close at Beaconsfield, and had word sent, the great ship was come in the Downs, by which he was to understand, that the design was near ripe; and he acquainted the Lord Falkland at Oxford therewith, and received answer, that they should hasten it with all speed, and when they were ready, three thousand of the King's forces were to advance from Oxford within fifteen miles of London, to be ready upon notice to fall into the works, and assist; and white ribbons or tape was agreed to be worn by all concerned in this action to distinguish them."

The Lord Clarendon, who is very large upon this conspiracy, denies neither the plot itself, nor the King's commission, brought to London by the Lady Aubigny (1), but urges, that the Parliament confounded in one single plot, two different projects, the first formed by Waller, Tompkins, and Challoner, who were at London, and the other by Sir Nicholas Crisp, who being Recorder of London (2), had been imprisoned, and making his escape, had retired to Oxford. Very well; but whether there were two plots or one, it is no less apparent, that the King's design was to compel the Parliament to a peace, and that his frequent Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 195. Ludlow says, she brought the Commission made up in the Hair of her Head. T. 1. p. 82.

Since the miscarriage of Waller's conspiracy, the King had a train of successes, which revived the courage of his friends at London, who began to be dismayed. The Lord Fairfax was defeated at Atherton in Yorkshire. The Queen was come to his Majesty with a considerable supply. Waller was entirely routed at Roundway-Down; and the King, now master of Bristol, was preparing to besiege Gloicester.

New Plot.

Aug. 2.

Thus crowned with success, he thought it a favorable opportunity to force the Parliament to a peace, and all his London friends began to use their endeavours. Whether this project came from the Court, or the King had only approved of it, he believed it requisite to prepare the minds of the people by a public Declaration, to this effect:

"As the grievances and losses of no particular persons could be compared to the damage he himself sustained; so a peace could not be so welcome to any man as to him. God Almighty knew, with what unwillingness, and anguish of soul, he submitted to the necessity of taking up defensive arms. And the world knew, with what justice and bounty he had repaired his Subjects for all the pressures they had born, by such excellent laws, as would for ever have prevented the like; and with what earnestness he desired to add any thing, for the establishment of the Religion, Laws, and Liberty of the Kingdom; all which had been evidently invaded by those who had sacrificed the public good to their own ends. He well remembered the Protestation made by him, at the head of his army, to defend and maintain the true reformed Protestant Religion, and if it should please God to bless his arms with success, he would maintain the just privileges and freedom of Parliament, and govern by the known Laws of the land, for whose defence that army was only raised. And there could not be a more seasonable time to renew that Protestation than now, when God had vouchsafed him so many victories, which would hinder him from falling under the scandalous imputation, that his messages of peace proceeded from the weakness of his power, not love of his people. He declared therefore to all the world, in the presence of God, that he was so far from intending any alteration of the Religion established, in which he was born and bred, and would resolutely die, or from the least thought of invading the liberty and property of the Subject, or violating the just privileges of Parliament; that the preservation of the established Religion, the Laws, the Liberties of the people, and the just privileges of Parliament, should be equally his care, as the maintenance of his own rights. Whether those that were enemies to the established ecclesiastical Government, who persecuted the learned, orthodox Ministers, and put into their places, ignorant, seditious, and schismatical preachers, who vilified the book of Common-Prayer, and profaned God's worship, were like to advance Religion: Whether those who, without the least shadow of law, imposed exorbitant taxes upon their fellow Subjects, imprisoned, tormented, and murdered them, were like to preserve the liberty and property of the Subject: And whether those who had invaded the just rights of the Crown, denied the King his negative voice, and terrified the members of both Houses, were like to vindicate the privileges of Parliament, all the world might judge." In short, after several invectives against the two Houses, he concluded with saying: Whoever have been misled, by those whose hearts from the beginning have designed all this mischief, and shall redeem their past crimes, by their present service and loyalty, in the apprehending or opposing such who shall continue to bear arms against us, and shall use their utmost endeavours to reduce those men to their due obedience, and to restore the Kingdom to its wonted peace, shall have cause to magnify our mercy, and to repent the trespasses committed against so just and gracious a Sovereign (2).

It is not difficult to perceive, that by this Declaration, and especially by the latter part of it, the King's aim was to excite and authorize an insurrection in London against both Houses, and what happened presently after puts it entirely out of doubt. This Declaration was therefore a preparative for the execution of a plot, to compel the Parliament to a peace. Undoubtedly, the King was really desirous of a peace. But it must be always remembered, what peace it was he so earnestly wished. It was a peace that should re-invest him with all his prerogatives, after which, he promised to govern according to the known Laws of the land. But in this promise lay the whole difficulty of the peace, the Parliament pretending it could not be relied on, and the King offering no other security than his word, tacitly supposing it to be a crime to doubt his sincerity.

This Declaration was no sooner published than the King's friends began their usual artifices in London. They affected an extraordinary terror, caused by the prosperous success of the King's arms, and insinuated, that the consequences should be prevented by a peace. But as the example of Tompkins and Challoner had effectually terrified the King's most devoted friends, not one dared openly to expose himself to the same danger. It was therefore resolved among them, that the House of Lords should first break the ice, and propose a peace to the Commons, which should be seconded by the King's friends in London. The Upper-House consisted but of few Peers, some of whom were either openly or privately for the King. Others were his enemies, and some were ready to follow the stream which waysoever it carried them. These last were the men the King's party strove to gain by various means, in order to be superior in the House of Lords, some by promises, others by threats, and some again by way of persuasion, intimating to them the absolute necessity of a peace. In short, they secured a majority of voices in the Upper-House: not that all they prevailed with, absolutely promised to be devoted to the King: (that was not the point;) but only to agree that a peace should be proposed by their House, which could not be considered but as a very innocent thing. The managers of this contrivance took care, not to propose a peace without terms such as the King desired. That alone had been sufficient to make them lose some of those they had gained. They had only to engage the Commons to enter into negotiation, after which, they hoped the superiority the King then had, supported with the endeavours of his party, would be capable to remove, in his favour, the difficulties that might occur in the principal articles. This resolution being taken, the Lords first and desired a conference with the Commons, where they declared, that they had resolved to send propositions of peace to the King, and hoped the Commons would concur with them. The propositions were:

"1. That both armies might be presently disbanded, and his Majesty be entreated to return to his Parliament, upon such security as should give him satisfaction.

"2. That Religion might be settled with the advice of a synod of Divines, in such a manner as his Majesty, with the consent of both Houses of Parliament, should appoint.

"3. That the militia, both by sea and land, might be settled by a Bill; and the militia, forts and ships of the Kingdom, put into such hands as the King should appoint, with the approbation of both Houses of Parliament: and his Majesty's revenue to be absolutely and wholly restored unto him; only deducting such part, as had been of necessity expended for the maintenance of his children, and not otherwise.

"4. That all the members of both Houses, who had been expelled only for absenting themselves, or mere compliance with his Majesty, and no other matter of fact against them, might be restored to their places.

"5. That all Delinquents, from before the tenth day of January 1641, should be delivered up to the justice of Parliament, and a general pardon for all others on both sides.

"6. And lastly, that there might be an act of oblivion for all by-gone deeds, and acts of Hostility."

Probably, those who had caused these propositions to be passed in the House of Peers, did not themselves believe, a peace could be made upon these foundations. The difficulties which occurred in the three first propositions, had been very often debated, both before and since the beginning of the war, without the possibility of coming to any conclusion. It was therefore unlikely, that the King, in his prosperity, would grant what he had denied when his affairs were not in so good a situation. But, as I said, the intention of the managers of this contrivance

(1) Tompkins was hanged at the end of Fetter-lane in Mellourn, and Challoner over against the Royal-Exchange, July 5. Rassworth, Tom. 5. p. 326.

(2) May says, that none but them two were executed. B. 3. p. 45.

(3) Adding, "We desire all our good Subjects, who have really wished us well, now God has done such wonderful things for us, vigorously to endeavour to put an end to all these miseries, by bringing in men, money, plate, horses, or arms, to our aid, that so we being now waiting to our selves, may with confidence expect the continuance of God's favour, to restore us all to that blessed harmony of affairs, which may establish a firm peace."

1643. was only to procure a negotiation, persuaded as they were, that by their interest and cabals, or by an insurrection of the People, they should cause these points to be decided in favour of the King. For that reason, the principal proposition, namely, the third concerning the Militia, which the Parliament had always fully explained, was expressed in a very general and ambiguous manner, in these terms, That the Militia might be settled by a Bill.

The Commons in a Bill, 86. against the Propositions. The Commons perfectly saw what was the aim of the authors of these propositions, and were terrified at it. The House was apprehensive, that they were but too powerfully supported, otherwise, it was not likely they should have taken such a step, at a time when a Committee was already gone to desire assistance of the Scots. Wherefore, after a long debate, it was resolved, by a majority of votes, that the propositions should be sent to the King. It is extremely probable, this resolution was taken only to amuse the King's friends, and to gain time, in order to break their measures the more easily. For, the next day the Lord-Mayor of London, attended with a crowd of People, came to the House of Commons, of which he was a Member, and delivered, from the Common-Council, a Petition, wherein the House was intreated to persist in their former resolutions, and reject the propositions of the Peers. The Lord-Mayor affirmed also, that the People of London were ready to exert their utmost for the vigorous prosecution of the war. Whereupon, the House took courage again, and reversed the resolution of the foregoing days. Thus, the King's friends were in their turn greatly embarrassed, and under a necessity of taking new measures. The expedient they devised was to cause the women to rise, in hopes that such an insurrection might breed a greater, and occasion some revolution.

The Petition of the City of London against the Propositions. On the 9th, a Petition for peace was presented to the Commons by two or three thousand women, [with white Silk Ribbons in their hats.] The conditions proposed by them were exactly the same as the King had always offered. A general answer being sent to them, they were not satisfied, and their number by noon increasing to five thousand, they came to the door of the House, crying Peace, Peace; give us those Traitors that are against Peace, that we may tear them to pieces; give us that Dog Pym. Part of the trained-bands (that usually stood centinel there) rising upon them with powder only, to fright them away, they laughed at it, and finding a heap of Bricksbatts in the yard, threw them at the centinels, and drove them away. At last, some troops were forced to be sent for, who, after using fair means in vain, drew their swords, and cut them over their hands and faces. A Ballad-singer was killed upon the spot (1), and another woman lost her nose, whereof it was said the afterwards died. At length, they were dispersed. The Lord Clarendon, (who says many were killed and wounded,) affirms, they were the wives of substantial citizens; which is hardly credible (2). Thus ended the grand project of forcing the Parliament to a peace, a project wherein means was found to engage several Lords, and many Commons, under colour that a Peace was necessary to the State. Nothing could be truer, but care was taken not to discover to them, that on pretence of labouring for the publick, the King's advantage alone was really sought.

Bill. The Earl of Essex was one of those who were most desirous of peace, but not in the same manner as the King's friends. These were for a peace, and used their utmost endeavours to procure it: but it was such a peace as the King offered, that is, a peace founded only upon his word. The Earl of Essex did not think it impracticable, in concluding a Peace, to find necessary securities for the nation's Liberties: as appears in his Letter of the 9th of July to the Speaker, wherein, after the description of Chalgrave-Field: he says, "If it were thought fit to send to his Majesty to have peace, with the settling of Religion, the Laws and Liberties of the Subject, and to bring unto just trial those chief delinquents that have brought all this mischief to both Kingdoms; and (as my Lord of Bristol spake once in Parliament) how we may be secured to have these things performed hereafter; or else, if his Majesty shall please to abscond himself, there may be a day set down to give a patient to all these unhappy distractions by a battle, which, when and where they shall chuse, that may be thought any way indifferent, I shall be ready to perform that duty I owe you; and the propositions to be agreed upon between his Majesty and the Parliament, may be sent to such an indifferent place, that both armies may be drawn near the one to the other; that if peace be not concluded, it may be ended by the sword." It is evident, this is not the language of a man proposing a peace to gratify the King, and solely with intent to procure a negotiation from which the King might reap some advantage; but of one that heartily wished for such a peace, as might put a happy period to the distractions of the Kingdom: or if that could not be by means of a peace, to end them at least by a battle. He was, doubtless, of opinion, that the nation would run less hazard by venturing a decision by arms, than by the continuation of the war. Nothing better demonstrates the uprightness of his intentions. But there were few in those days of the same disposition. The King passionately wished for peace; but it was on condition he should be no loser by it, that he should be restored to all his Rights, and his word relied on for the future. As to Religion, all he would yield, was, that the Presbyterians should not be compelled by Penal Laws to conform to the Church of England. Hitherto he had advanced nothing that might make them hope for a publick Toleration of their Religion. The Parliament for their part wished likewise for peace, provided by this peace the King was restrained from returning to his former courses, that is, was so humbled that he should be able to do nothing without the consent of both Houses, and enjoy only the empty name of a King, with the external badges of royalty. As to Religion, there were very many, as well members as others, who preferred the continuation of the war, let what would be the event, to seeing the Bishops restored to their power. This must be always remembered, when either of the two parties is heard to speak of peace. The like disposition to the Earl of Essex's was doubtless the cause that some were dazzled with the bare sound of peace, and the limitations inserted in the propositions to be sent to the King at the time of the late plot. But it may be affirmed, that the chief authors of the artifice were far from having the nation's welfare in view, and thought only of serving the King. I don't question, but some others were persuaded to consent to the Propositions by reason of the end proposed by the Presbyterian party, and now publicly known, perceiving, that the advantages the Parliament might gain upon the King in the continuation of the war, would only serve to ruin the Church of England with the greater ease.

The Earl of Essex's integrity made him experience what usually happens to honest men in civil dissensions, where the moderate pass for indifferent, and coldly affected to their party. The King, who was informed of this Lord's moderation, imagined, he desired a peace only, because he was displeased with the Parliament, and convinced of the injustice of the cause he had espoused. In this belief, he unsuccessfully used all means to gain him. On the other hand, the most violent of his party grew jealous of the Earl of Essex, perceiving he was no proper instrument for their designs. Wherefore they no longer confided in him, or at least, feigned not to trust him, in order to have, by his removal, another General, more compliant and manageable. They cast their eyes on Edward Montague, Earl of Manchester, known formerly by the name of the Lord Kimbolton, and began with advancing him to the command of the forces of the eastern associated Counties, to which Lincolnshire was lately added, to go and oppose the Earl of Newcastle; and an ordinance was passed, to raise new levies [by pressing] to reinforce this army.

If the Earl of Essex had joined with the Parliament only out of passion, humour, or interest, the mortifications he met with, would have been apt to make him turn to the King, to be revenged of the two Houses. But that was not his character. Tho' he had complained several times of the disregard shewn him, in leaving his army without recruits and cloaths, and tho' several Lords of the King's party took this occasion to try to persuade him to change sides, he ever remained firm to his principles. How strong soever their solicitations might be, he never gave the least reason to believe, he was capable of betraying the Parliament, who had trusted him with the command of their forces. Both Houses being informed of the instances made to their General, assured him of their esteem and acknowledgment for his great services, and promised to recruit and cloath his army, before those of Sir William Waller, and the Earl of Manchester, which was accordingly done. This satisfaction was more than sufficient, to make him forget all the occasions of complaint before given him. A famous Historian has been pleased to ascribe the Earl of Essex's constant attachment to the Parliament, to his not having steadiness enough to engage in so hazardous an enterprise, as that of forcing the Parliament to a peace. I am persuaded, this was owing to the King's, and all his party's prepossession, that there was not a single man for the Parliament, that was fatished of the justice of his cause. This prejudice was never relinquished.

The project of those who had undertaken to gain the Earl of Essex, was, that as soon as he should give the word, the Lords and Commons who were in the secret, should retire to the army, and under the security thereof, protest against the violence that was offered, the breach of their privileges, by the Common-Council's taking notice of their debates, and over-ruling their conclusions, by hindering the sending the propositions to the King. They did not doubt, but by their example, great numbers would take the same course, by which means they hoped to be strong enough to constrain the Parliament to make peace. And in case the Parliament should remain obstinate, their design was to enter upon a separate treaty with the King, as men undeceived, who having been seduced by the Parliament, were at length sensible of the injustice of their cause. They imagined, the whole Kingdom would do the same, and the Parliament be entirely forsaken. For the King and his party always fancied, that among the Parliament's adherents, not one was so, through persuasion, honour, and conscience, but through seduction, fear, and ignorance. This caused them to take so many wrong steps, to compel the Parliament to a peace by the People's means, steps that proved extremely prejudicial to the King. That with regard to the Earl of Essex, was no less so than the rest.

The Lords and Commons who were concerned in this stratagem, as well as in Waller's plot, fearing the Earl of Essex might discover them, thought proper to avoid being called to an account, by retiring to the King. Of this number were the Earl of Portland (1), and the Lord Conway, who had been imprisoned for Waller's affair, and afterwards released, the Lord Lovelace, who had only staid with the Parliament by the King's leave, the Earls of Clare, Bedford (2) and Holland. The Earl of Northumberland (3), dissatisfied with his not having in the Parliament the same credit as formerly, feigning an indisposition, obtained the Parliament's leave to retire for his health to his house at Petersham in Suffex. [As this place was liable to be infected from some of the King's quarters,] it was generally believed, he had assurances of not being molested. The flight of all these Peers turned greatly to the King's disadvantage, as it deprived him of so many friends in the Parliament, who were always ready to serve him, and wont to direct his adherents in London. Moreover, by the absence of these Lords, the King's enemies were more at their ease, and found fewer obstacles to their designs, than before. For shortly after, the Earl of Essex's army was enabled to relieve Glocester, and the Parliament approved of the Covenant made with Scotland, in which doubtless they would have been opposed by those that were lately withdrawn. I must now proceed to other matters.

I just mentioned, that Sir John Hotham, Governor of Hull, was apprehended by order of Parliament: It is now time to speak of the cause of his disgrace. The King had been so incensed with him, that there was little probability of his ever pardoning the indignity he had received from him, or of Hotham's delivering himself into his hands. And yet, the desire of becoming master of Hull in the one, and the thirst of revenge in the other, made them forget all that was past. Hotham, as he could not bear that, after the service he had done the Parliament in keeping Hull for them, without dreading to expose himself to the King's indignation, the Lord Fairfax should be made commander in chief of all the forces in the North, an honour, which doubtless he thought himself more worthy of, resolved to be revenged for this pretended injustice, by delivering the place to the King (4). The precise time of his applying himself to the Earl of Newcastle is not known; but it is certain, he writ several letters to him, which were communicated to the Queen while she was in the North. He had drawn his Son, Captain Hotham, into the plot, and it was agreed between them, to deliver Hull to the Queen, when on her march with her troops to the King. Mean while, young Hotham having given some occasion to suspect him, was seized by Sir John Meldrum, and sent Prisoner to Nottingham Castle. Hotham found means to escape, and going to Lincoln, writ from thence to the Parliament, complaining of the injury done him, and affirming, he was ready to answer whatever should be laid to his charge. But as the Queen was now upon her march, and it was time to execute the design, he returned to Hull, to contrive the means with his Father. The Queen thought herself so secure of having Hull very soon in her power, that she said in her letter of the 27th of June to the King, "She stayed at Newark but for one thing, to have Hull and Lincoln, for which she hoped he would pardon two days stop." At the same time that the order was sent to seize young Hotham, the Mayor of Hull was told to have an eye upon the Father, examine his conduct, and take care to preserve the town. The Son's return to Hull after his escape from Nottingham, the suspicion he already lay under, and the notice received from [Mr. Meyer] Captain of a man of war then in the road, that Hull was going, that night or the next, to be delivered to the King, made [Sir Matthew Baynton] the Mayor, though Brother-in-law to the Governor, resolve to prevent it. That very night, whilst the Hothams were in bed, June 28. all the townsmen, officers, and soldiers of known affection to the Parliament, were assembled without noise, and all the ports of the town seized, without one drop of blood, or so much as a musket discharged. Mean while, I know not for what reason, they had neglected to secure the two Hothams (4), who found means to get out of the town: but at their coming to Bevelley, they were both seized and brought to London, where, after a long imprisonment, they were condemned and executed (5).

There were two things which did the King great injury, with regard to the people, and from which he omitted no opportunity to justify himself, knowing how detrimental such prejudices might be to him. The first was, that he countenanced Popery; the second, that he had excited the Irish Rebellion, or at least connived at it. These two articles both Houses made no scruple to insinuate, and even to maintain openly in their Papers. Not that they had positive proof of what they advanced; but they drew from his actions, and divers past events, inferences, to some of which it must be owned, the King answered but weakly, or in generals, or, according to his custom, by ambiguous expressions, capable of a double meaning.

As to the first charge, he took occasion to make the following protestation, just as he was going to receive the Sacrament, from the hands of the Lord Archbishop Usher.

My Lord,

I, Essey many resolved Protestants, who may declare to the Protestation of the King, the resolution I do now make. I have, to the utmost of my power, prepared my soul to become a worthy receiver; Religion as I do receive comfort by the blessed Sacrament, as I do. I do intend the establishment of the true reformed Protestant Religion, as it stood in its beauty, in the happy days of Queen V. p. 346. Elizabeth, without any connivance at Popery. I bless God, that in the midst of these public distractions, I have still liberty to communicate; and may this Sacrament be my damnation, if my heart do not join with my lips in this Protestation.

Charles I. was undoubtedly very zealous for the Protestant Religion, as professed in the Church of England. But it is no less certain, he never scrupled to favour the Papists, whether out of complaisance to the Queen, or from a belief, that the strict observance of the penal Laws made against them, was not necessary to the welfare of the Protestant Religion. It is therefore very difficult to explain what he meant by these words, without any connivance at Popery. It cannot be thought, that his intention was to swear, he would never grant the Papists any toleration, since at this very time he was negotiating the Irish cessation, whereby toleration was granted to the Catholics of Ireland; and it will hereafter appear, that in treating of a peace with the rebels, he scrupled not to grant them that article. Much less still may we venture to affirm, that by the word Connivance, he understood all manner of concession for the Papists. This sense would be repugnant to his principles and usual practice. It seems therefore most reasonable to think, that he made a distinction between Popery and Papists, and that when he promised to establish Religion in its beauty, his meaning was, that he would suffer no popish Tenets to be mixt with the Doctrines of the Church of England. But if this was his meaning, it was not to the purpose, since this was not properly the thing he was charged with. As he was very artful in chusing expressions, to which it was difficult to give a fixt and determinate sense, it is certain, his most solemn Protestations produced not the intended effect.

As to the second charge relating to the Irish Rebellion, I do not think I can give a clearer knowledge of the matter, than by inserting the substance of a Declaration published on this occasion by both Houses, the 25th of July 1643. They shewed:

"That in the second year of his Majesty's reign, a declaration was formed in Ireland, to bring in a public toleration of the popish Religion in that Kingdom, and to suspend all proceedings against Papists, for a sum of money to be paid to his Majesty. That the then Bishops of Ireland made a Protestation against it, setting forth, how

(1) Jerom Wiston. Son to the Lord Treasurer Wiston. was created Earl of Portland 1643.

(2) Rapin, by mistake, says Durset. The name of the Earl of Bedford was John, and Henry Rich.

(3) Wendell only, as the Historical says, was more, and courteous, p. 76.

(4) The Son was seized, but the Father, upon a short notice, was doing, got out at Bevelley Gate, there having been no orders to stop him.

Rushworth, Tom. V. p. 276.

(5) The Son was beheaded on Tower-hill, January 1. and the Father January 2. 1644, both denying they were intended to deliver up Hull. Idem. p. 749.

"grievous

1643. " grievous a sin it was to consent to such a toleration, and of what dangerous consequence it might be. And the " Houfe of Commons in a Remonstrance made in the " third year of his Majesty's reign, informed, that even " then the popish Religion was professed in every part of " that Kingdom, and that Monasteries and Nunneries " were then newly erected, and replenished with men and " women of several orders, befeching his Majesty, that " some speedy course might be taken for redress therein ; " yet in the beginning of the fourth year of his Majesty's " reign, all this was granted and confirmed by his Ma- " jesty, in consideration of one hundred and twenty thou- " sand pounds, to be levied in three years upon the King- " dom in general, as well upon the Protestants, as upon " the Papists.

" That many potent and notorious Papists had been " created Peers by his Majesty,

" That when, by direction of the Lord Chancellor " Loftus, and the Earl of Cork, then Lords-Justices, pro- " ceedings were begun against the Papists upon the Statute " of 2 Elizabeth, for not coming to Church, and the " Judges in their circuits gave that Statute in charge, and " indictments were framed thereupon, directions were sent " from England, to suspend and stay all proceedings upon " that Statute, when by taking the penalty imposed by that " Statute, being nine-pence, for absenting from Church, " Sundays and Holidays, the poor Protestants there might " have been eased of many heavy payments and taxes, " which were after imposed upon them.

" That the late Earl of Strafford being the King's Lieu- " tenant there, did by his great favourite Sir George Rat- " cliff, one of his Majesty's Privy-Council of that King- " dom, hold correspondence with the popish Clergy, and " particularly with Paul Harris, a known Priest, who had " both publick and private access to Sir George Ratcliff at " all times, as well by night as by day.

" That in March 1639, the Earl of Strafford carried " with him into Ireland, Sir Toby Matthews, a notorious, " pernicious, English Jesuited Priest, (banished at the be- " ginning of this Parliament upon the importunity of both " Houses) lodged this Priest over-against the Castle of Dub- " lin, the house where the Earl did himself reside, and " from whence this Priest daily rode to the publick Maf- " houses in Dublin, and negotiated the engaging of the " Papists of Ireland, in the war against Scotland.

" When the late Lord Chancellor Loftus, and the Earl " of Cork, were Lords-Justices, they endeavoured to sup- " press the Maf-houses in Dublin, and to convert them to " pious uses ; one, which was in the street called the Back- " lane, they disposed of to the University of Dublin, who " placed a Rector and Scholars in it, and maintained a " weekly Lecture there : But after the Earl of Strafford " came to the government, the Lecture was put down, " the scholars displaced, and the house became a Maf- " house, as formerly it had been.

" That divers monasteries and nunneries were newly " erected, immediately before the rebellion broke forth in " divers parts of that Kingdom : That at the Naas, where " the Earl of Strafford had his chief seat and resort, " Convents of Friars, namely, Augustines, Franciscans, " Dominicans, were not only permitted, but also an house " built there by the said Earl, for another purpose, (as he " pretended) soon after the building was converted to a " Friery, by the connivance of the said Earl.

" That the popish Irish army was kept on foot there " for a long time after the beginning of this Parliament ; " to the great furtherance of this Rebellion, by teaching " those barbarous villains the knowledge of arms, under " the notion of fighting against Scotland, but now made " use of to extirpate both English and Scots from the King- " dom of Ireland.

" And that Lead might not be wanting to the compleat- " ing of this intended Rebellion, the Silver-mines of that " Kingdom, which afforded great store of lead, and there- " fore fit only to be in the hands of Protestants of known " integrity, were farmed out by his Majesty to most per- " nicious Papists, namely, Sir George Hamilton, Sir Basil " Brook, and the like ; and upon the discovery of the plot " for the surprizing of the city and castle of Dublin, divers " barrels of musket-bullet were found (upon search) in the " house of the said Sir George Hamilton in Dublin.

" That the Earl of Strafford had, by a violent endea- " vour, entitled his Majesty by office to the whole Coun- " ties of Roscommon, Mayo, Sligo, Gallway, and Clare, " and to a great part of the Counties of Linrick and Tip- " perary ; by which means a door was opened, not only " to increase his Majesty's revenue, but therewith to settle " a plantation of Protestants ; and yet when the Lords-Justi- " fices and Council of Ireland, did by their letters exceed- " ingly importune his Majesty, that he would not part " with those Counties ; and that the plantation of English " Protestants might proceed as was formerly intended ;

1643. " his Majesty, notwithstanding, did, in the Queen's pre- " sence, by a clandestine agreement, give away, at the " Papists request, those five whole Counties, for a rent of " 2000 l. or thereabouts.

" That Archdeacon Maxwell testifies in his examinations " taken in Ireland, that he heard Tirlagh Oge O Neale, " Brother to Sir Phelim O Neale, the Arch-rebel of Ul- " ster, confess, that the Rebellion was communicated by " the Popish Irish Committee to the Papists in England, " who promised their assistance. And Mac Mahon, who " was to join with the Lord Mac-guire for the surprizing " the Castle of Dublin, being taken and examined, at the " rack confessed, that the original of that rebellion was " brought to them out of England, by the Irish Commit- " tee employed to his Majesty for redress of grievances.

" That the Earl of Castle-haven, a Peer of England, " and a notorious rebel in Ireland, Mr. Porter who declar- " ed himself a Papist in Ireland, Sir Basil Brooke, the " Popish Treasurer for the monies raised by the Queen's " solicitation for the war against the Scots ; Mr. Andrew " Brown a Lawyer of Lincoln's-Inn, heretofore expelled " thence for being a known Papist, with divers other dan- " gerous English Papists, went out of England into Ireland, " the summer before the rebellion broke forth, and were " very active there.

" That the rebels in all parts of Ireland professed, that " the cause of their rising was to preserve his Majesty and " the Queen, from being oppressed by the Puritan Parlia- " ment, and that it was by their consent, for they had " good warrant in black and white for what they did. " They called the English army, Parliament-rogues, and " traitors to the Queen ; and told them at the beginning " of the Rebellion, that e're long they should see England " as much in blood as Ireland then was. That they had " their party in England and Scotland, which should keep " both Kingdoms so busy at home, that they should not " send any aid against them, with a multitude of such like " expressions from the Irish of the best quality ; as may " appear by the examinations of Colonel Audley Merwin, " William Stewart, Esq; Henry Stewart, Gent. herewith " printed, and by divers other proofs.

" In the same month of October, wherein the rebellion " of Ireland brake forth, the Lord Dillon of Castletough " (now in arms against the Parliament and Kingdom of " England) went out of Scotland from his Majesty into " Ireland, bringing his Majesty's letters, obtained by me- " diation of the Queen, to be presently sworn a Privy- " Counsellor of Ireland ; who when he had taken the oath " of a Privy-Counsellor, presents to the Lords Justices and " Council, from many of the Inhabitants of the County " of Longford, a letter in the nature of a Remonstrance, " full of unreasonable demands : As namely, to have free- " dom of Religion, a repeal of all laws made to the con- " trary, and the like.

" In December after the Rebellion, the same Lord Dil- " lon, together with his brother-in-law, the now Lord " Taaffe, a notorious Papist, repaired into England, bring- " ing with them several papers and instructions from many " Lords and Gentlemen of the Pale, all now in rebellion, " to negotiate for them to his Majesty, and as they fol- " licite with his Majesty here on the behalf of the rebels, so " do they sollicite the rebels from hence in the name of " his Majesty, to persist in their rebellion, as appears by " the testimony of Mr. Tephson, a Member of the House " of Commons lately delivered at a conference before both " Houses in these words, viz.

At my late being at Oxford, finding my Lord Dillon and the Lord Taaffe in favour at Court, I acquainted the Lord Faulkland, his Majesty's Secretary, that there were two Lords about the King, who, to his Majesty's great dishonour, and the great discouragement of his good Subjects, did make use of his Majesty's name to encourage the rebels : To make this appear, I informed, that I had seen two Letters sent by the Lord Dillon and the Lord Taaffe to the Lord of Muskerie, the chief man in rebellion in Munster, and one of the Irish Committee sent into England, intimating, that though it did not stand with the convenience of his Majesty's affairs to give him publick countenance, yet that his Majesty was well pleased with what he did, and would in time give him thanks for it ; (or near to that purpose.) That these Letters were seen by the Lord Inchiquine, the chief commander of the English forces in Munster, and by his Secretary, who had kept copies of them ; and that I was ready to justify as much. Whereupon the Lord Faulkland was pleased to say, that they deserved to be hanged. But though I stayed there at Oxford about a week after this discovery made, I never was called to any farther account, nor any prejudice done to these two Lords, but they had the same freedom in Court as before, for ought I could observe or hear to the contrary.

" That since this discovery made to the Lord Faul- " land, the same Lord Taaffe, one Roche, and William " Brent 1643. "Brent a Lawyer, active Papist, with letters from his Majesty, went from Oxford to Dublin: And upon Thursday before Michaelmas 1643, in the evening, taking with them one Colonel Barry, a profest Papist, and pretending for Connaught, stopt away to Kilkenny, where the Tuesday following was a general assembly of all the chief rebels. When they had done their errand, Barry was left Lieger at Kilkenny among the rebels; the Lord Taaffe returned to Dublin, and upon Friday the 9th of June 1643, the Lord Taaffe, with divers of the Privy-Council of Ireland, that favoured the rebels, met at the Marquis of Ormond's house, where the propositions which the Lord Taaffe brought from the rebels were debated. The Lord Taaffe is since gone into Connaught, Brent is come back to Oxford to give an account of this employment.

"By this every man may conftrue, what was meant by his Majesty's not consenting that the Parliament should send a Committee into Ireland the last year, to endeavour the carrying on the war against the rebels, upon pretence that the Earl of Leinster was presently to go over thither, who is yet remaining at Oxford. That when that Committee had prevailed with the Lords Justices and Council, and with many of the prime commanders, and other officers of the army in Leinster, to subscribe by way of adventure for land in Ireland, to be settled by a new Bill, very considerable sums which were to be deducted out of their respective entertainments; then to render this endeavour fruitless, one Captain Yarmer did confidently affirm, that those which had or should subscribe, were enemies to the King, a thing so incredible, that few could believe it, till the same man went to Oxford; and upon his return to Dublin, assured the Lord Marquis of Ormond and the officers, that he had discoursed with his Majesty about this way of subscription, and that his Majesty did not approve of the same: Whereupon those who had subscribed did withdraw their hands, and the rest were wholly discouraged.

"That, about this time, a Commission was sent over to meet with the rebels, and to hear what they could say, or propound for themselves; which Commission was directed to the Lord Marquis of Ormond, and to some other commissioners; among whom Thomas Bourke, that had an hand in contriving this rebellion, was one, and who brought the said commission in Ireland, and confidently delivered the same at the Council-table, to the amazement of all the Council then present, that were not acquainted with the plot.

"That the Lords and Commons, to whose direction the war was committed, thought it expedient to send into Ireland a Committee for that purpose, consisting of members of the House of Commons, but authorized from both Houses; who carried with them above twenty thousand pounds in ready money, besides great store of powder, match, and other ammunition: But when those who favoured the rebels, saw, that during the abode of the Committee there, parties were continually sent forth to destroy the enemy; and that the Committee engaged their own particular credits, to take up monies for the relief and setting forth of the army; a letter was sent from his Majesty, and brought over by the Marquis of Ormond's own Secretary, wherein his Majesty did require the Lords Justices and Council, not to admit the Committee any more at their debates. And it is observable, that this Letter was only signed with his Majesty's hand, without any Secretary's hand to avow the same.

"The Commons cannot conceive what is meant, that the Justices and Council are strictly charged in that letter, upon their allegiance, not to suffer the Committee to sow sedition among his Majesty's good Subjects; unless to stir up and incite the English soldiers in the pay of the Parliament, to proceed vigorously against the Irish rebels, be conftrue as the sowing of sedition among his Majesty's good Subjects.

"That, according to the testimony of Sir William Brewster, Knight of the Shire for the County of Chester, there landed, in June 1643, many Irish rebels in Werral in Cheeshire, some whereof acknowledged, that they had washed their hands in the blood of several English and Scotch in Ireland, and now hoped to wash their hands in the blood of Englishmen in England: The Country where these rebels first arrived, did all rise with their best weapons, and apprehended several of them; but they were rescued out of their hands by a troop of Horse, which came from the commissioners of Array, who also seized about twenty eight of the honest countrymen prisoners.

"And that the Councils now predominant at Oxford, and the supreme Council of rebels at Kilkenny, are concurring and aiding one another, as well by sea as by land, is apparent by that which follows. The Commissioners authorized to command the King's forces in the West, by an authority derived unto them under the Great Seal of England, do grant commissions or letters of mart, for the apprehending and taking, for his Majesty's service, all ships and vessels belonging to the cities and towns that have declared for the Parliament; and on the other side, the rebels of Ireland grant the like commissions. And as the ships in his Majesty's service do gratify the rebels of Ireland, in seizing the ships that bring provision for the relief of the English army in Ireland; so the rebels of Ireland do in like manner gratify his Majesty, by commanding the ships set forth by them to examine all English ships at sea, whether they be for the King or Parliament; and if they be for the King, to let them go; but if for the Parliament, to take and pillage them. All which is proved by depositions herewith annexed.

"The Earl of Antrim, a notorious rebel, was taken by the Scots army in Ulster, and imprisoned there, upon suspicion of High-treason: To avoid his trial, he broke prison, and fled into the North-parts of England, and hath been with the Queen at York a long time; from whence he was sent to the rebels of Ulster, with secret instructions, and had ammunition assigned him by the Queen's directions: And what care was taken of his ammunition appears by a letter here annexed, dated at York the 8th of May 1643, written by Sergeant Major Rosse, at the desire of Mr. Jermyn.

"Since this care taken of the ammunition of the Earl of Antrim, the Earl of Antrim is taken the second time by General Major Monroe, as he was returning from the Queen, to the rebels of Ulster, with divers letters, instructions, and papers: And by the confession and deposition of the Earl of Antrim's own servant, who was taken with his master, and since condemned and executed, it is evident, that there was, and doubtless yet is, a design on foot to reconcile the English and Irish in Ireland; and that by their joint power having expelled the Scots, the Irish forces there might be sent against the Parliament of England. The Earl of Antrim, the Lord of Aboyne, and the Earl of Niddisdale, were three principal agents employed in this plot. This clearly appears, in that the Lord of Aboyne, in a letter taken in the Earl of Antrim's pockets, writes in these words:

My Lord,
Being certainly informed by Niddisdale's servant, That there is a new order since we parted, for stopping of the ammunition, I have taken occasion to intreat your Lordship by this bearer, that I may know the particulars of it. I must confess it surpriseth me, that any distance should alter so reasonable a conclusion: And certainly, I shall never desist to be made the instrument of frustrating the hopes of those parts, which should have been enabled by this supply: I am persuaded, there is scarce another mean to make our fidelity useful for her Majesty's service.

"And that it might appear to the rebels of Ireland, that the Earl of Antrim was accounted his Majesty's good Subject, and had his Majesty's approbation for what he was to act there, he was furnished with a pass from the Earl of Newcastle.

The Pass is here inserted at length in the Declaration. The rest of the article tends to shew by the Earl of Antrim's confession, and that of Stuart one of his servants, that the Earl was employed by the Queen to make peace with the rebels.

"The House of Commons, among a numerous company of proofs of this kind, concluded with the testimony of John Dod, late Minister at Amesbury in the County of Wiltshire, who was examined at the bar of the House of Commons, and testified,

That after he had suffered many miseries in this Rebellion of Ireland, he repaired into this Kingdom, and some occasions carrying him to Oxford, he staid there seven weeks, and came out of Oxford the 13th of June 1643. That during his stay there, he saw a great number of Irish rebels, whom he very well knew to have had a hand in the most barbarous actions of that Rebellion; as the dashing of small infants in pieces, the ripping up of women with child, and the like, among whom was one Thomas Brady, who, at Turbot in Ireland, within seven miles where the said Dod lived; as thirty six old men, women, and children, not able to flee, were passing over a bridge, caused them all to be thrown into the water, where they were all drowned; that this Brady is now at Oxford in great favour, and Sergeant-Major to Colonel Percy's Regiment: That he saw there three Franciscan Friars, namely; — and three Jesuits, namely; — who were all very earnest for the cause, and daily encouraging the soldiers to fight against the Round-heads, and for that purpose have lysed themselves in the Lord Dillon's troop, and are called Cornets: That there are daily and publick meetings at Moss, in almost every street there; and verily believes it his confidence, that for one Sermon preached, there are four Masses said now at Oxford: That he saw Sir John Dungan there, a man accused of High-treason in Ireland, for being in the Rebellion, and fled into England, who hath a commission for a troop of Horse: The Lord Barnewall of Trimblestown, and his son, who hath a commission for a troop of Horse, and is now gone into Wales to raise them: A son of the Lord Newterfield, who hath gotten a command likewise: That as near as he can possibly compute, there was then at Oxford above three thousand rebels; and that most of the King's Life-guard are Irish.

The two Houses concluded in the following manner: "Upon the whole matter, no man can think, that this Rebellion in Ireland, so barbarous and bloody, that one hundred and fifty four thousand Protestants, men, women, and children, English and Scotch, were massacred in that Kingdom, between the 23d of October, when the rebellion broke forth, and the 1st of March following, by the computation of the Priests themselves that were present, and were directed by some chief rebels of Ireland to take this computation, lest they should be reported to be more bloody than in truth there was cause: No man can believe, that this horrid and unparalleled rebellion should be the undertaking of the rebels alone, being set on foot when a Parliament was sitting in England, that could not dissolve without its own consent, when all nations professing the Romish Religion, were at peace with England, and so engaged at home, that the rebels, in reason, could not expect any considerable assistance from them, nor could think themselves able to encounter England or Scotland either, much less both together: So that to imagine the Nobility, Gentry, and in a manner the whole Kingdom of Ireland, should thus desperately engage their lives and estates in so rash an enterprise, without being encouraged, incited, nay, commanded from England, with assurance both of connivance and assistance too, were to deny them to be reasonable creatures.

"And therefore the House of Commons, abundantly satisfied in their own confidences and judgments of the truth thereof, cannot but declare to the world, that by all these concurring circumstances, and convincing proofs, they are persuaded, that this unheard-of, and monstrous rebellion of Ireland, was projected, incited, and assisted by those Councils now only prevalent with his Majesty: That the Queen, with her Romish Priests, the Papists of all his Majesty's three Kingdoms, have been principal actors and sticklers herein: That, now those bloody rebels have in a manner rooted out the Protestant Religion in Ireland, there is a design to pardon them, and to bring them into England to do the like: That no earthly power is likely, in human reason, to withstand this damnable plot, but the power of the Parliament in England, which is now declared by a late Proclamation, to be no free Parliament, to be null, and of none effect; and all possible endeavour used, by strength and stratagem, to destroy the same. So that the House of Commons do conceive it impossible, that so many of those which would be thought the honest and moderate English Protestants, should any longer be blinded and led on, to join with German, French, Walloon, English, Scotch, and Irish Papists; and thereby to surrender up at once the Protestant Religion, the Parliament, Liberties, and Laws of England, into the hands of Papists and strangers; that so this renowned Kingdom may be no more a Nation."

As the charge against the King of exciting the Irish rebellion, or at least of conniving at it, made a great noise in those days, and as all the Histories are full of it, I thought it necessary to show the grounds or pretences of it, by giving the substance of this Declaration. For it is not likely, the Parliament should have omitted any thing capable of proving their assertion, though it be true, that the King afterwards took certain steps which could have very much swelled this Manifesto. I should be glad, according to my usual method, to give here the King's particular answer to these articles. But I have not been able to find any, or so much as to know, whether he ever returned an answer. Indeed he used his utmost endeavours to clear himself from this accusation; but it was only by Generals and Protections, without replying to any particular article, no not even in his Eikon Basilike, where he undertakes to vindicate his whole conduct.

I cannot therefore but observe, concerning this Declaration, that there are some articles which seem very much aggravated: and others, from whence may be drawn consequences not so odious as those here insinuated. But then it cannot be denied, that there are some, to which it were to be withed, for the King's honour, he had returned distinct and particular answers.

It appears by this Manifesto, that the Parliament had little regard for the King. But besides the animosity and revenge which might enter into the design of blackening his reputation, it is certain, policy had no small share in it. The King, in all his publick Papers, represented himself as being perfectly innocent of all that was laid to his charge, and as having undertaken the war only for the defence of the Laws and Liberties of the Nation. He described the two Houses as a company of robbers, who for their own private ends, had put the Kingdom in a flame, refused the obedience due to him, and, without any cause, trampled upon all the known laws of the land. The gratifying the passion of revenge was not the King's sole motive; there was another much more dangerous to the Parliament. And that was, to draw the people of London to his side, by means of these Papers (which his friends took care to disperse in the city) and thereby to force both Houses to conclude such a peace as he desired, that is, a peace which should restore him to all his rights. If therefore the two Houses, out of respect to the King, had neglected to defend themselves, their silence might have been very prejudicial to them, since people are apt to believe, if an accusation be not answered, it is because there is no good answer to be given. It was therefore the Parliament's business to try, as far as possible, to enlighten the people, whom the King, as they pretended, had a mind to impose upon by general Protections, which they laboured to show his actions did not answer. This was the great end of this Declaration, wherein they endeavoured to demonstrate the King's insincerity, in that, whilst he called heaven and earth to witness, that he had no other intention than to maintain the Protestant Religion, without conniving at Popery, he was labouring to make a peace with the Irish rebels; a peace, which in the conjuncture of affairs could not be concluded, but by granting things inconsistent with the safety of the Protestant Religion.

On the other hand, as the King by his papers and emissaries in London, was continually endeavouring to convince the publick of the greatness and sincerity of his zeal for Religion, for the Laws and the Liberties of the people, without ever mentioning what passed the fifteen first years of his Reign, the two Houses were concerned to renew the remembrance of those times, lest the occasion of their fears and jealousies should in the end be forgot. And therefore they did two things very proper to produce this effect. The first was, to order King James's book for tolerating Sports on Sundays, which Charles I. had caused to be published again in the Churches, to be burnt by the common hangman. This book being almost forgot, could not produce any great effects at the time I am speaking of. But in all appearance, both Houses meant thereby to insinuate to the people, what was to be expected from the King's great zeal for Religion, in case he came to be restored to his former power. The second was, to proceed to judgment against Judge Berkley, whom the Lords condemned in the exorbitant fine of twenty thousand pounds, and to stand committed to the Tower till he should be tried upon the other articles alledged against him. For this sentence concerned only that part of his charge relating to his extrajudicial opinions in the case of Ship-Money. Berkley was one of the King's most zealous instruments to establish an arbitrary power. Nevertheless, he had now lain three years in prison, without being thought of. But this year the Parliament believed it proper to bring him to judgment, as well to revive the memory of a time, the King was endeavouring to bury in oblivion, as to reap the benefit of his fine (1). This last motive makes the Lord Clarendon say, that the Parliament in appropriating the fine to themselves, which by the Laws was due to the King alone, were [thought by many to be] guilty of a greater crime than that for which Berkley was sentenced. This supposes, that even when the King and Parliament were making war upon one another, the Parliament should do the King justice, and send him the money arising from fines and confiscations. But the two Houses were so far from allowing this maxim, that, on the contrary, the same month they passed an ordinance for seizing the King's, Queen's, and Prince's revenues, for the publick use (2), that is, to be employed in the war against the King. Four days after, the King on his part published a Proclamation, forbidding all tenants or debtors to pay any rents or debts to such persons as were in open rebellion against him. But these orders, as I have said, well from the King as the Parliament, were executed only in places where they were supported with power.

1643. very cold reception at Oxford (1), thought fit once more to change sides, and return to London. The Earl of Holland did the way. He was at first put under confinement, but five days after, had leave to live upon his own estate, without any employ. Probably, he had expected a better reception, since after his return he published a Declaration (2) as serious to the King, wherein he said, that he returning to Oxford, in hopes by his credit to procure a peace, he had been labouring it to the utmost of his power, but (added he) without success, the King and his Council being entirely averse to all accommodation, because every thing at Court was managed by the Papists (3). The Earl of Northumberland, who was retired to Petwarth, being informed how ill the Earl of Holland was received at Oxford, thought it proper to return to the Parliament, where he was received with respect, both Houses being willing to suppose, he had never intended to leave them, though many suspected he had withdrawn to his own estate, on purpose to see what reception the other Lords would meet with at Oxford. The Earls of Bedford and Clare took also the same course, and came off with being debared for a time from sitting in Parliament (3).

One of the principal transactions of this year 1643, was the resolution of both Houses to make a new Great-Seal. It had been proposed by the Commons in July; but, whether through scruple, as some pretended, or because the King's secret party were yet very numerous in the House of Peers, the Lords refused their consent, or rather delayed their answer. But in the November following, their scruples vanished. The Commons represented to them in a conference, the mischiefs occasioned by the conveying away, and through the want, of the Great-Seal (4).

I. It was secretly and unlawfully carried away by the Lord-Keeper Littleton, who ought not to have departed without leave of both Houses. Nor would have been suffered to do so, if his intentions had been discovered.

II. It hath been since taken away from him, and put into the hands of ill-affected persons, so as the Lord-Keeper being sent to by the Parliament for the sealing some writs, answered, He could not seal the same, because he had not the Seal in his keeping.

III. That those who have had the managing thereof, have employed it to the hurt and destruction of the Kingdom; as by making new Sheriffs, to be as so many commanders of forces against the Parliament; by issuing out illegal commissions of Array; by sending forth Proclamations against both Houses of Parliament, proclaiming them traitors.

And through the want of the Great-Seal. 1. The Terms have been adjourned, the course of justice obstructed. 2. No Original Writs can be sued for without going to Oxford, which none that holds with the Parliament can do, without peril of life or liberty. 3. Proclamations in Parliament cannot issue out for bringing in delinquents impeached of High-Treason, or other crimes, under pain of forfeiting their estates. 4. No Writs of Error can be brought in Parliament to reverse erroneous judgments, nor writs of election issued out for choosing new Members upon death or removal of any, whereby the number of Members is continually lessening. 5. Every other Court of Justice has a peculiar seal, and the Parliament, the supreme Court, has no other seal but the Great-Seal, and so now no seal at all. 6. The Great-Seal is the Clavis Regni, and therefore ought to be resident with the Parliament (the representative of the whole Kingdom,) whilst it continues sitting; the King, as well as the Kingdom being always legally present in it during its session.

The next day the Lords declared their consent to the making a new Great-Seal. Accordingly a Great-Seal was made exactly like that in the King's hands (5), and by an ordinance of both Houses, it was declared, that all Letters Patents, and Grants which had passed under the Great-Seal since the 22d of May 1642 (6), were void and of no effect. That the new Great-Seal should be of like force, power and validity as any Great-Seal of England had ever been, and be put into the custody of the persons hereby ordained commissioners for that purpose, who should have the same power and authority as any Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper had used to have. On the last of November, the new Great-Seal was carried by the Speaker of the Commons, attended with the whole House, to the Lords, and delivered to the Lord Grey of Werk their Speaker, who in the presence of both Houses gave it to the Commissioners (7). The first thing sealed with it, was a Patent to the Earl of Warwick, of Lord High-Admiral of England, the Earl of Northumberland not being in that favour with both Houses as formerly.

The King and his friends made a great noise upon this encroachment of the Parliament, and urged the Statute of the 27th of Edward III, by which the counterfeiting the Great-Seal, is in express terms declared to be High-Treason. But it is easy to perceive, this Statute concerns only private persons, and not both Houses of Parliament, and that it was not possible, when the Statute was made, to foresee the King and the Parliament would be one day divided. Besides, it cannot be said, that private persons have any right to dispose of the Great-Seal. But it is not the same with both Houses of Parliament, who are the representatives of the nation. For the Great-Seal is not the King's Seal in particular, but the Kingdom's, and the Kingdom is a body composed of the King, who is the head, and the People who are the members. If the King has the disposal of the Great-Seal, it is only as he is the most noble of the members of this body, considered as being united with, and not as being separated from, the other members (8). If therefore such a separation happens, as was at the time I am speaking of, it is hard to conceive, by what title the King or People, separately, may claim the disposal of the Great-Seal, which is the seal of their joint, not separate, authority. In short, I doubt, that they who most strenuously affirm, that in such a separation, the King ought to have the sole disposal of the Great-Seal, are willing to admit all the consequences flowing from that principle. The Great-Seal stamps an inviolable authority upon all the Acts to which it is applied. If therefore in case of an open war between King and Parliament, the King could, by means of the Great-Seal, communicate such an authority to all his particular Acts, where would be the bounds of his power, which by the constitution of the Government, is limited by the Laws? He would need only to declare by Proclamation under the Great-Seal, as Charles had really done, that, according to the Laws, the members of Parliament are traitors and rebels, and then the point would be decided by the sole possession of the Great-Seal, and the King might assume an unlimited power by this authority. But how would the case be, if the Parliament was in possession of the Great-Seal, and by the like Proclamation should declare the King traitor and rebel; would the application of the Seal give such an Act an inviolable authority?

It will doubtless be said, that the Great-Seal gives an inviolable authority to such Acts only as are agreeable to the Laws, and that the Laws expressly declare those who take arms against the King, guilty of High-Treason. But it is manifest, the Laws, as they neither could, nor ought to foresee an actual separation between the King and the People represented in Parliament, have considered the King only as the head, inseparably united with the body, and not as the head divided from the other members. Else it might be said, the Laws have ascribed to the King an unlimited power, which is directly contrary to the constitution of the English Government. Certainly the Laws have considered the King but as head of the State, and the crime of taking arms against him relates, not more to his person in particular, than to the reft of the State. The Parliament therefore seems to have had no left right to make a new Great-Seal, than the King would have had, if the Common-Seal had been in

About this time, Count Harcourt, a Prince of the House of Lorraine, was sent from France into England. He came directly to London, where he was received with great ceremony, as ambassador extraordinary, though he had not presented his credentials to the Parliament. But it was supposed, he was not without them, and intended to address himself first to the King. After some days stay in London, without any application to both Houses, he went to Oxford, where he had several conferences with the King. After that, he writ to the Earl of Northumberland, that having propoed to his Majesty, from the King of France, and the Queen-Regent, the making of a peace with his Subjects, he found him wholly inclined to enter into negotiation, and that if both Houses would inform him, wherein consisted the differences between the King and them, he would gladly use his interest to adjust them. Both Houses thought it very strange, that this Prince should offer his mediation without producing his credentials. They told him therefore by the Earl of Northumberland, that they received with all due respect, the offers of the King and Queen-Regent of France, and that as soon as he should show, he was authorized for such a mediation, they would not fail to appoint a committee to treat with him. But he had no credentials for the two Houses, the Queen-Regent not judging proper to own them for Parliament, since the King of England refused them that title. So, this pretended mediation was not only fruitless, but was also a clear indication, that the French Court had sent this embassy only as an outward testimony of their concerning themselves in the King's affairs, though, in all appearance, they did not much desire to see an end put to the troubles of the Kingdom (1).

Sir Edward Deering, who had made himself so famous at the beginning of this Parliament, by his zeal for his Country, and by several noble speeches upon Grievances was grown extremely averse to the Proceedings of both Houses, since he found, the aim of some of the leading-men was to establish Presbyterianism in the Church of England. For that cause, after the war was begun, he forsook the Parliament, and turned to the King. But, in all appearance, he was no better pleased with the Court than he had been with the Parliament, since he followed at last the example of the Lords above-mentioned. He came to London in February 1643-4, and presenting a Petition to the House of Commons, whereof he was member, he obtained leave to spend the residue of his days at his House [near Canterbury] where he died within a few months (2).

Pym's death Rutherford,
 p. 376.
 Clarendon,
 II. p. 353.

Mr. Pym, one of the Pillars of the Parliament, and a chief Director of the affairs of the House, died December the 8th, 1643. The King's adherents speak of him as of a very wicked man, and those on the side of the Parliament represent him as the greatest patriot then in England. Opinions so opposite about the same person are not uncommon. It is not strange, that from opposite principles should be drawn contrary consequences. Thus much is certain, Mr. Pym's death was a very great loss to the Parliament, he being one of the most able members of the House (3).

The Commons, as was said, imprisoned in May this year, 1643, a person sent by the King with the offer of peace, and shortly after, he was discovered to be one of those employed by the King, to keep a correspondence in London. The King could not be ignorant, the Commons had twice declared, they would treat as spies such as should come from the King's quarters to London, without a safe-conduct. Besides that he had good correspondents in London and the Parliament, he had no occasion to be informed of these particular resolutions, to know, it is not allowable for men, without a safe-conduct, to come into the enemies quarters, since it is a maxim received, wherever a war is declared. But there was something in the prelate case still more particular. For, upon the Houle arresting this messenger, his Majesty, by advice of his Council, had deemed it inconsistent with his honour to hold any farther correspondence with the Parliament. Moreover, the 18thth. p. 367.

 of Osaber, both Houles had published an ordinance, declaring, any person coming to London from the King's quarters, shall be looked upon as a spy. And yet twelve days after, on the 30th of Osaber, the King sent privately to London Daniel Kniveton, a State messenger, with three proclamations, one against taking of the solemn League and Covenant; another, against the observation of the monthly Fast, enjoined by the Parliament; a third, for removing the Seals of the Green-wax Offices belonging to the Exchequer, King's-Bench, and Common-Pleas, to Oxford. This man was taken up, and committed to prison. Nevertheless, the 19th of November following, Carpenter, another messenger, was privately sent by the King with an order to the Judges to adjourn the term to Oxford (4). Carpenter was also apprehended, and they were both tried and condemned to die. Kniveton was the less excusable, as he had before been taken and detained at Windsor for the same reason, and discharged by the General. All the defence he made was, that being the King's (sworn) messenger, he was obliged to obey him; that besides, not taking London for a garrison, he thought he might have come without drum, trumpet or palls. But this defence not being capable of saving his life, he was executed.
 Carpenter, though under the same condemnation, was relieved and committed to Bridewell (5). The Lord Clarendon speaks of the sentence passed upon these men as of a great injustice, for two reasons; that they were obliged to obey the King, being his messengers; and that the Parliament had not caused their ordinance to be notified to the King. I doubt, all will not be induced by these reasons to condemn the proceedings of both Houles. The King at least seems not to have blamed them, since he did not use reprisals, neither does it appear that he ever com-planned of it in form.

Rushworth,

 Clarendon,
 II. p. 314+.

In proportion as the war was continued, the animosity between the King and the Parliament was inflamed, who no longer regarded each other. The King refused to own the two Houses for Parliament, and they omitted nothing, as appears in their Declaration concerning the Irish rebellion, to blacken the King's reputation. These proceedings were not confined to England, where they might be in some measure necessary, because the point was to gain the People, but care was taken also to convey Papers abroad, tending to vindicate one of the parties, and blacken the other. Both Houses being informed, or it may be, supposing, that the King had emissaries abroad, who were using their utmost endeavours to represent the civil Wars in England as a horrible rebellion against the Sovereign, ordered the assembly of Divines then sitting at Westminster (6), to write letters to the Churches of Zealand, Holland, France, Switzerland, to warn them against the artifices of the King's agents, by giving them a clear relation of the affairs of England. They charged them to insist chiefly upon the King's employing Irish rebels and other Papists, to be governors, commanders and soldiers; to lay before them the proofs of the intention of the King's counsellors to introduce Popery, and hinder the reformation designed by the Parliament: Lastly, to inform them of the disadvantageous opinion of the King's party concerning the Protestant Churches abroad, because not governed by Bishops. The assembly failed not to send to these Churches a circular letter, which was properly a Manifesto for the Parliament against the King, with copies of the solemn League and Covenant, and of the Declaration of England and Scotland on that subject.

Some time after, the King on his part published a The King's Manifesto, addressed to all the Protestant Churches, to Manifesto

2 The King's Manifesto touching Religion.

1643, efface the impressions which the Parliament's circular letter might have caused. This Manifesto, which was very short, contained only a Protestation that he had never intended to consent to the public exercise of the Catholic Religion in his Dominions, but was firmly resolved to adhere, to his last breath, to the Church of England, wherein he was born, baptized and educated; and to the Liturgy of that Church, approved by so many Convocations and Parliaments, by all the Protestant Churches and the Synod of Dort.

The King troubled down a vast money.

Mean while, the King was very much perplexed how to maintain the war the ensuing campaign, knowing the Parliament were preparing to exert themselves powerfully. He had been openly charged, before this Parliament, with arbitrarily exacting money of his Subjects, without consent of Parliament. He had himself owned, he had exceeded his power, since he had not only redressed that Grievance, but also protested several times, he had redressed it freely and willingly. Since the war was begun, he had never ceased to accuse both Houses of the same arbitrary actions, which he himself had been so often upbraided with, in that they imposed taxes upon the Subjects without their consent, which was directly contrary to the known Laws whereon he perpetually insisted. By demonstrating that both Houses violated the Laws, he pretended to gain the People to his side. Mean while, money was necessarily to be raised, not only to maintain the forces already on foot, but also to levy others, in order to relist the Scots, who were upon the point of entering England. If, for the maintenance of these forces, he had imposed taxes by his sole authority, he could not have reproached both Houses for the same thing, and perhaps would have disabused his own party by acting against the Laws. Money, however, was to be found at any rate, otherwise he would not be able to continue the war. Hitherto he had used several ways to raise money, without giving any advantage against him, whether by selling or mortgaging the Crown-lands, or by the voluntary contributions of his well-wishers. But the means he had already used were too uncertain to be safely relied on. He sought therefore and found an expedient to free himself from this freight. He assembled at Oxford all the members that, according to him, had been driven from the Parliament; pretending, these members were the true Parliament, and the more, as he had publicly declared, he no longer looked upon both Houses at Westminster as such. He did not expect this new Parliament would increase the number of his friends; but he could reasonably hope it would grant him an aid of money, and that being authorized by such an Act, he might openly and by way of authority levy what money was necessary. This happened accordingly, and was properly the King's aim in calling this Parliament, which met at Oxford the 22d of January 1643-4 (1).

As it was not proper the King should immediately discover his sole end in calling this extraordinary Parliament, he only told them in his first Speech, that he had assembled them to receive their advice, and consult with them how to appease the troubles of the Kingdom.

The first step taken by this Parliament, was to try to convince the publick of their intention to labour for peace. I have already explained the constant ambiguity of the word Peace, and the different senses given it by the two parties, and therefore think it needless to repeat it. There is no question, the King heartily wished for a peace, but it was on condition it should be made after his manners, and in his sense of the word, else he was very averse to it.

To be convinced of what I advance, a man needs only consider what the Lord Clarendon says, speaking of the motion made in the Council to summon the Oxford Parliament, which the King scrupled a little. The King was at first in some apprehension, says that illustrious Historian, that such a confus of persons together of the Parliament, who would look to enjoy the privileges of it in their debates, might, instead of doing him service, do many things contrary to it, and exceedingly apprehended, that they would immediately enter upon some treaty of peace, which would have no effect; yet whilst it was in suspense, would hinder his preparation for war, and though no body more desired peace, yet he had no mind that a multitude should be consulted upon the conditions of it: imagining, that things of the greatest importance, as the giving up persons, and other particulars of honour, would not seem to them of moment enough to continue a war in the Kingdom. Hence appears what sort of peace was desired by the King. It was not such a peace as the Oxford Parliament might think reasonable, but a peace whereby he should not be obliged to make any concessions.

But his Council quickly freed him from these apprehensions, by the same method used on the like occasion in the beginning of the war. It was intimated to him, that there was no probability, the two Houses at Westminster would ever treat with the Members that should meet at Oxford, because they would not look upon them under any notion, but as private persons, and deserters of the Parliament. Whereupon the King's scruples vanished. As the Oxford Parliament was entirely directed by the King, and as his Majesty agreed to the proposing a peace to those at Westminster, it may easily be guessed, that in so doing, his intention was not to conclude it, unless both Houses at Westminster would have submitted to his Terms. But the two Houses at Oxford had another view in this proceeding. Namely, to lay a snare for the Parliament at Westminster, and engage them, if possible, to treat with them, which would have been owning them for Parliament. However, they expected to reap some advantage from their refusal.

To this end, a letter was sent to the Earl of Essex, signed by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, forty three Lords, and a hundred and eighteen Members of the House of Commons. In this letter it was said. "That his Majesty having summoned them to attend him at Oxford, they were assembled in obedience to his commands: That his Majesty was pleased to invite them in the Proclamation of summons, by graciously saying, His Subjects should see how willing he was, as far as in him lay, to restore the peace of the Kingdom: That this invitation had not only been made good to them, but seconded by such unquestionable demonstrations of his Majesty's deep sense of the miseries and calamities of his poor Subjects in this unnatural war, and of his most entire and passionate affections to redeem them from that sad and deplorable condition, by all ways possible consistent with his honour, or the future safety of the Kingdom: That as it were impious to question the sincerity of them, so it were great want of duty and faithfulness in us, (his Majesty having vouchsafed to declare that he did call us, to be witnesses of his actions and privy to his intentions) should we not satisfy and witness to all the world the assurance we have of the piety and sincerity of both." Adding---That being satisfied of this truth, they had yet hopes to be the happy instruments of their Country's redemption from the miseries of war, and restitution to the Blessings of peace; and were desirous to believe, that his Lordship, howsoever engaged, would co-operate with them in the blessed work, by truly repienting to, and industriously promoting with, those by whom he was trusted (2), their most earnest desire, That some persons be appointed on either part, to treat of such a peace as may yet redeem their Country from the brink of destruction."

The Earl of Essex returned this short answer, "That the letter he had received, not being addressed to the two Houses of Parliament, nor any acknowledgment of them being therein, he could not communicate it to them: That the maintenance of the Parliament of England and the privileges thereof, was That for which himself and his whole party were resolved to spend their blood, as being the foundation whereon all the laws and liberties of the Nation were built (3).

Though the Earl of Essex, said he could not communicate the letter to the Parliament, it was known however that his answer had been concerted with a Committee of both Houses, called the Committee of State. Wherefore the King, knowing thereby the intention of both Houses, believed he should run no great hazard by sending them a message, in a letter to the Earl of Essex, directed to the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster. This message contained the usual offers to treat of a peace, and appoint Commissioners, if they would do the like on their part. The King added, he took this step by the advice of the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Oxford. Both Houses easily perceived, the King was laying a snare for them, by putting them under a necessity, either of accepting his offer, in which case they should indirectly own the Lords and Commons assembled at Oxford 1643-4. for a Parliament, or of rejecting it, and for furnishing him with a reason to upbraid them for refusing to labour for a peace. But they little regarded this artifice, and for answer declared, they would never own the Members who had deserted both Houses for a Parliament, "And here," upon, added they, we think our selves bound to let your Majesty know, that seeing the continuance of this Parliament is settled by a law, (which, as other laws of your Kingdoms, your Majesty hath sworn to maintain, as we are sworn to our allegiance to your Majesty, these obligations being reciprocal) we must in duty, and accordingly are resolved, with our lives and fortunes to defend and preserve the just rights and full power of this Parliament; and do beseech your Majesty to be assured, that your Majesty's royal and hearty concurrence with us herein, will be the most effectual and ready means of procuring a firm and lasting peace in all your Majesty's Dominions, and of begetting a perfect understanding between your Majesty and your People, without which your Majesty's most earnest Professions, and our most real Intentions concerning the same must necessarily be frustrated.

I have before shewn, with what thoughts the King proposed a peace to both Houses at Westminster, namely, that this general offer would not be accepted, as was easy to foresee. Upon this refusal it was that both Houses at Oxford exulted, as if the bare proposal of a peace had been a clear and evident demonstration of their sincere desire to make a reasonable peace. They published upon this occasion a long Declaration, so like those published by the King on the same occasion, that it was not difficult to perceive it flowed from the same fountain. They published also, some time after, another pretending to show, that the members assembled at Oxford had been forced from the Parliament by the threats and outrages of the leading-men. In this declaration were repeated all the outrages and artifices used by the chief of the Party, to intimidate such as would not conform to their sentiments, and this, it was pretended, was the sole reason of their being obliged to retire. This was really the King's scheme, but it may be said to be ill grounded. For the members who had deserted the Parliament, had not, for the most part, absented themselves, till long after these pretended outrages, some by the King's own express order, others for fear of being punished for endeavouring to raise commotions against the Parliament. But care was taken not to mention this in the Declaration. After all, supposing some had withdrawn themselves purely out of fear, it is certain, their number came far short of those who retired with the sole view of serving the King. However, they were all confounded in the same class, as having been expressly driven from the Parliament.

Some time after, both Houses at Westminster published also a Manifesto, wherein they pretended to show, that under the specious colour of proposing peace, a snare was laid to engage them tacitly to own that they were not the Parliament, but that the true Parliament was assembled at Oxford. They drew their proofs from several letters written from Oxford to the Earl of Essex, from the expressions in the King's late message, but especially from an intercepted letter from the Lord Digby, where he said: "A point which his Majesty may not suffer them to gain, without subverting the grounds and maxims of all his late proceedings against them, and that which he now goes upon by the advice of all his Nobility here, as you will perceive by this inclosed Proclamation (1), upon the effects whereof all the eyes of the Kingdom are fixed. God send them to be as good actuated, as they are in speculation, for I am confident, that in reason it carries probability of the surest and readiest way to a re-establishment of his Majesty in his just Rights and Powers, of any course that hath been yet attempted."

The day before the two Houses at Oxford writ to the Earl of Essex, to propose a peace, they voted, That the Scots having entered the Kingdom in an hostile manner, had thereby denounced war against England, and that all the English who should assist them, should be deemed as traitors and enemies to the State.

March the 12th, the same Houses at Oxford voted, "That the Lords and Commons now remaining at West- minster, are guilty of High-treason, [for raising of forces under the command of the Earl of Essex] for "contesting, and being assisting to the present coming in of the Scots into England, and for counterfeiting the "Great-Seal." But as votes did no hurt to the Parliament at Westminster, so neither were they of much advantage to the King. He found a more real benefit from them, with regard to the affair for which the Oxford Parliament was summoned, I mean, the aid of money he expected for the support of the war.

This Parliament was however greatly embarrassed, how to give the King an effectual assistance, for that was the principal affair. If, as the only and true Parliament, they had laid a general tax, the King would have run the hazard of meeting great opposition in levying the money, all the inhabitants of the Counties on his side, not being satisfied that such a Parliament had a lawful authority. In that case, he would have been obliged to use force to compel those that should refuse to pay, which did not suit with his present circumstances. Another method was therefore taken, which, doubtless, was suggested by the Court. This was, to advise the King to borrow one hundred thousand pounds, of the richest men of his party. To that purpose, the Commons went into their respective Counties, to take the number of those who were reckoned monied-men, and make a list, wherein were set down the quality and ability of each. The Commons being returned to Oxford, with their lists, the taxes were proportioned; after which, the King writ circular letters to every particular person, to borrow of one, a hundred pounds, of another, two hundred, promising to repay the same as soon as he was able, and not forgetting to say in these letters, that this loan, was by advice of his Parliament (2). Thus, though this Parliament did not think themselves sufficiently authorized to impose a general tax, the particular persons who were rated, were no less obliged to furnish what was laid on them, since these loans were made with the advice of both Houses. The King would have found less advantage in a general tax, for it was much easier to raise a hundred thousand pounds upon particular rich men, than upon the whole Nation. Now the point was to procure the King, certainly and speedily, the money he wanted. Accordingly it was seen shortly after, that this was the sole motive of chusing that method; for the Oxford Parliament hearing, that both Houses at Westminster had laid a duty upon wine, beer, ale, and other commodities, which they called an Excise, a word before unheard of in England (3), made no scruple to injoin the like in the Counties where the King's authority was acknowledged.

From that time, nothing remarkable passed in this Parliament, which fitting till the 16th of April, was prorogued to October, and never met again. It served only to procure the King money, for which it was solely designed, and to exhibit a spectacle never before seen in England, namely, two Parliaments at once, holding their sessions at the same time.

Three days before the opening of this Parliament, the Scotch army entered England, notwithstanding the season, which it seemed should have hindered their march (4). The Marquis of Newcastle who commanded in the North for the King, hearing that the bad weather prevented not this army's advancing towards the borders, began to march also with his troops, and came to Newcastle the 2d of February (5). The Scotch army approaching the town, the Feb. 3. General ordered it to be summoned; but the summons had no effect. He staid in those parts all the rest of February, waiting for his artillery, which was coming by sea. The 28th of the said month, he passed the Tyne at some distance from Newcastle (6), having left on the North-side of the town, six Regiments of Foot, and some Horse, to keep the garrison in awe. The Marquis being too weak to venture a battle, contented himself with harrassing the Scots by frequent skirmishes, in order to retard their march; but at last he thought proper to retire to Durham, where the Scotch General followed him, though with great inconvenience, as he wanted forage for his Horse.

When the Marquis of Newcastle marched out of York The Lord to oppose the Scots, he left the command of the city with a good body of troops to Colonel John Bellasis (7). As soon as the Lord Fairfax was informed, that the Marquis had necessaries had been sent into the city (1). But that same day, coming to York with a guard of two hundred Horse, he conferred with the Marquis of Newcastle, or rather signified to him, that he intended to fight, according to his Majesty's express order. As the Prince was extremely haughty, he made not the least compliment to the Marquis, upon the authority he assumed, in resolving to give battle, contrary to the Marquis's opinion, who maintained, it was by no means requisite in the present juncture, and the rather, as he expected five thousand men, who were coming from the North to his assistance. Moreover, the Prince made no scruple to command, without saying any thing to the Marquis, the forces in York to be ready to join him next morning in order to engage. And yet, these forces had been levied by the Marquis, and ever commanded with great reputation. Besides, the Marquis's birth and merit seemed to require a greater regard from the Prince. Perhaps it never came into the Marquis's thoughts to desire a fight of the King's express order, or else he believed it to be an affront to the Prince, to show the least doubt of such an order. However this be, he told him, he was ready to obey his Highness in all things, who might dispose of his troops as he pleased, and for his own part, would be contented to charge in the battle as volunteer. His dissatisfaction was further increased, when having asked the Prince, what service he would be pleased to command him, the Prince answered him, he would begin no action upon the enemy till early the next morning, and desired him to repose himself till then. Thus, the Prince had the sole management of the intended battle, without consulting the Marquis any more. Though he had ordered his forces in York to come and join his army, it does not appear that he had assigned any command or post, to the Marquis of Newcastle, perhaps, because he said, he would be in the battle as a volunteer. It cannot be denied, this behaviour was very severe to a Lord, who had always shewn for the King, a zeal and affection not to be surpassed, nor perhaps equalled.

In the night, the three Parliament-Generals having considered, that the place was relieved, and thinking, Prince Rupert had no farther design than to lay in provisions, resolved to march to Tadcaster, Guiseley, and Selby, as well to preserve the Essex-Riding, as to hinder the furnishing of York with provisions from thence. Accordingly they began their march early in the morning, the Scots leading the van. But about nine o'clock they had intelligence, that the Prince was approaching with his army, and indeed he was advanced with five thousand Horse, near their rear. Whereupon they were obliged to draw up speedily, and call back their van, which made all possible haste to re-join them. Fortunately for them, the Foot which the Prince had drawn out of York, could not come up with his army till noon, and this gave the Scots time to re-join the rest of their army, which they had left in the morning. The armies were both drawn up about two in the afternoon. But there was between them a deep and large ditch, which neither cared to pass, for fear of giving the enemy too great an advantage. For this reason, they stood looking upon one another above two hours, each expecting the other to begin the charge.

Prince Rupert himself headed the Left-wing (2), consisting of five thousand Horse. The Right-wing was commanded by Sir Charles Lucas, with Colonel Hurry, and the main body by General Goring. It does not appear, that the Marquis of Newcastle had any command in this action. The Parliament's right-wing opposite to Prince Rupert, was led by Sir Thomas Fairfax, the left by the Earl of Manchester, assisted by his Lieutenant General Oliver Cromwell. In the main battalia towards the right was the Lord Fairfax, and General Leven towards the left. At last, between six and seven in the evening, the Parliament-Generals gave the signal, and marched to the enemies. I shall not undertake to describe this battle, because in all the accounts I have seen, I meet with so little order and clearness, that I cannot expect to give a satisfactory idea of it, to such of my Readers as understand these matters. I shall content my self with relating one remarkable circumstance, besides the success in general. The left-wing of the King's army, commanded by Prince Rupert, was entirely routed by the Parliament's right-wing, whilst the King's right-wing had the same advantage over the left of the Parliament. The two victorious wings, after chasing their enemies, returned to the field of battle, and, I know not by what accident, met face to face, so that each stood on the same ground that the enemy possessed at the beginning of the battle. Here the fight was renewed, and maintained on both sides with great warmth and vigour, till at last night approaching, the King's Horse were put to flight, and pursued as long as day would permit. It was probably at this time that the Prince's Foot were also routed. I say, probably, because in the description of this battle, it does not appear what the Foot did. But this is not the only time that we are left in the dark, when we read in Histories the descriptions of battles. They are generally made by persons who have not the least tincture of the art of war, and who by dwelling upon some frivolous circumstances, pass over those that might give the intelligent Reader clear ideas. It suffices therefore to say, that the Prince's army was pursued within a mile of York, where they retired in the night. The Countrymen who were commanded to bury the dead, gave out that they interred four thousand one hundred and fifty bodies. It was reported that three thousand of the Prince's men were killed. But the Conquerors affirmed, they lost not above three hundred (3).

Though Prince Rupert had always been victorious where he had commanded in chief, it is not very surprising that he should once be defeated; this is a misfortune incident to the greatest Generals. But his resolution to retire next day with his army, must needs appear very strange. His Horse had not suffered much, because they had taken to flight betimes, at least those of the left-wing, commanded by himself, and his foot were also in good condition, the greatest storm having fallen on the Marquis of Newcastle's. He might therefore have defended York, and waited the King's orders upon this fatal accident. So, this extraordinary resolution can scarce be imputed but to an excessive shame and indignation, which hindered him from considering how prejudicial it would be to the King his Uncle's affairs. He sent the Marquis of Newcastle notice of his design, just as the Marquis was sending him word, that he was instantly going to quit the Kingdom. They both put their resolutions in practice. The Marquis repaired that very day to Scarborough, and embarked for Hamburgh (4), and the Prince left York, and marched towards Chester with the remains of his army. It is easy to guess why the Marquis of Newcastle quitted the King's service, after having been so unworthily treated by Prince Rupert. He believed doubtless, he could not with honour resume his former command, having been deemed incapable to serve the King on so important an occasion. Nay, very probably, he imagined, the Prince would not have behaved to him in so haughty and rude a manner, if he had not thought he should be avowed. Nevertheless, the Prince could afterwards produce in his vindication only the King's letter above mentioned, which he understood in a sense the King himself had never thought of (5). It may therefore be affirmed, that his committing so many errors one after another, was entirely owing to his excessive haughtiness.

The Parliament Generals improved their victory, and the dissolution of their enemies. They returned to their posts below York, which was left to the discretion of Sir Thomas Glanville the Governor, who seeing himself unable long to resist, surrendered this important place upon honorable terms. They were no sooner in possession of York, but the three armies separated. The Lord Fairfax with his forces remained at York as Governour. The Earl of Manchester marched towards Lincoln, not to be remote without necessity, from the associated Counties, whose troops he commanded. The Earl of Leven with the Scotch army marched northward to join the Earl of Calander, who was advancing with a strong reinforcement from Scotland. When these forces were joined, he laid siege to

(1) Ludlow observes, That if the Prince could have been contented with relieving York, and retired, as he might have done, without fighting, the reputation he had gained, would have caused his army to increase like the rolling of a Snow ball. Tom. 1. p. 123.

(2) Rushworth says, the Prince led the right Wing, and Sir Charles Lucas the left: And that the Earl of Manchester and Cromwell commanded the left of the Enemy. The King's main consisted of 11 thousand Foot, 1, nine thousand Horse, and about twenty five pieces of Ordnance. The Parliament's army consisted of 15,000 Foot, 1, 10,000 Horse, and about twenty five pieces of Ordnance. The Earl of Manchester, the Lord Fairfax, and the Lord Leven were among the Prisoners. There were about a hundred Scotch taken, and fifteen hundred Scots, twenty five pieces of Ordnance, a hundred and thirty barrels of powder, several thousands of Arms, and about a hundred Colours. Whitelock, p. 94. Others say, there were about four thousand taken Prisoners, and as many slain on the King's party; the Palatinate, and a red Cross in the middle; a yellow Cross, in the middle a Lion Couchant, and behind him a Maltese, seeming to clutch at him, with these words inscribed: Quisquis cadit sub his signis, perit. On the 8th of July they arrived at Hamar. The Marquis came no more to England, till after the Restoration of Charles II. Idem. p. 637.

1644 Newcastle, which surrendered at discretion about the end of October (1). Thus the Battle of Marston moor lost the King all the north, which hitherto had given the Parliament forces a powerful diversion. But this was not all the mischief the King had to fear. There was danger of the three victorious armies joining in the heart of the Kingdom those of the Earl of Essex and Sir William Waller, and of their taking at once all the places which were still in his power. This was the more to be feared, as when he heard of the defeat of his army at Marston moor, he was himself marching to the relief of the West, where the Earl of Essex then was with an army, which the King's forces in those parts were not able to withstand. This is what I must now explain, and withal speak of what passed at Oxford, whilst the northern armies were in action.

The Parliament seem by their extraordinary preparations in the beginning of the year 1644, to have intended to put a speedy conclusion to the war. Besides the armies of the Lord Fairfax and Scotland, and that of the Earl of Manchester, which was paid by the eastern Counties, a new regulation was made the latter end of March, for the maintenance of seven thousand five hundred foot, and three thousand horse, to be commanded by the Earl of Essex. At the same time, by another ordinance, the four southern associated Counties, namely, Kent, Suffex, Surrey, and Hampshire were to maintain an army of three thousand six hundred foot, twelve hundred horse, and five hundred Dragons, under the command of Sir William Waller. These were not new armies, they subsisted before the regulation; but the point was to recruit them, complete the number fixed by the Parliament, and settle the necessary weekly payment of their subsistence money (2).

Though Sir William Waller was worsted at the battle of Round-way-Down, the two Houses, far from losing their esteem for him, resolved to send him into the West, with an army capable of withstanding Prince Maurice, who found no farther opposition in those parts. The King having notice of this design, resolved to endeavour not only to hinder Waller's march into the West, but also to break the association of the four southern Counties, where he had many friends, and even hoped to procure an association of these Counties in his favour. To that purpose, he gave the Lord Hopton (3), an army consisting of troops drawn out of several garrisons, and of two Regiments of foot lately arrived to Bristol from Ireland (4). As soon as these forces were assembled, the Lord Hopton posted himself at Winchester, where Sir John Berkley brought him two regiments newly raised by him in Devonshire, and the King sent him a detachment of a thousand men commanded by Sir Jacob Ashley. All these forces together made an army of four thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse (5), with which he resolved to march into Suffex. Waller, who was then quartered about Farnham, assembled his troops and faced the enemy: but after some slight skirmishes, he retired into Farnham Castle, from whence he took a journey to London, to represent to the Parliament his want of supplies, without which it would not be possible to perform what had been enjoined him.

Immediately after Waller's departure for London, the Lord Hopton marched with part of his army to attack Arundel Castle, which was surrendered upon terms. But hearing a few days after, that Waller was returned to Farnham with a strong reinforcement, he rejoined the rest of his army.

Waller's journey to London answered his expectation. Besides a brigade of Londiners under Major-General Brown, he procured an order of Parliament to the Earl of Essex, to send him from his army a thousand horse under the command of Sir William Balfour. He was no sooner returned to Farnham with these supplies, but he marched all night, and at break of day beat up one of the Lord Hopton's quarters at Alton, and carried away prisoners Colonel Bolton's regiment of foot (6); a troop or two of horse, which were in the same quarters, having betimes taken to flight. Then he marched directly to Arundel Castle, and made the garrison prisoners. Here the learned Mr. Chillingworth was taken, and died within few days.

The King hearing of the supplies given to Waller, sent a reinforcement to the Lord Hopton. The Earl of Forth, the King's General (7), would go himself, but refused the command which the Lord Hopton offered to resign to him.

The Lord Hopton having then an army of about a thousand men, resolved to give Waller battle, and begun his march with that intent, at the very time Waller was advancing towards him with the same resolution. The two armies met between Farnham and Winchester on Cheriton-Down near Alresford, where the battle was fought the 29th of March. The Lord Hopton was defeated and forced to retire to Reading, and afterwards to Oxford (8). Waller marched to Winchester, and became master of the city, but did not think proper to besiege the Castle, [which was his own inheritance] because he had elsewhere more important affairs, as will be seen presently. The Lord Clarendon pretends, the loss sustained by Waller at Alresford hindered him from improving his advantage, and marching into the West, as he had resolved. But it may be affirmed, this was not the thing that prevented his taking the western rout. It was rather owing to the Parliament's resolutions, by whom he was recalled to London, after having dismissed the auxiliary regiments of that City, and Kent, which were also come to join with him.

Both Houses perceiving, that by the King's late loss at Alresford, his army was discouraged and considerably lessened; that moreover, they had sufficient forces in the North to have nothing to fear from the Marquis of Newcastle, who was shut up in York, resolved to besiege Oxford, where the King was with his army. So, having relinquished, or suspended, the design of sending Waller into the West, they laboured with all possible diligence, to put the two armies of Essex and Waller upon the foot settled by their ordinance, that they might act together against Oxford.

The King had ever imagined, that Waller's design was to march towards the western parts. For which reason he had assembled his forces at Marlborough, and afterwards posted himself at Newbury, where he had remained some time, till he could better discover the designs of his enemies. But having at length found, the Parliament had altered their measures, he came to Reading, and caused the fortifications to be demolished, in order to strengthen his army with the garrison, consisting of two thousand five hundred men. He also ordered Prince Rupert to come and join him: but afterwards permitted him to relieve Latham House, where the Countess of Derby was besieged. With the Reading garrison, his army was increased to eight thousand five hundred foot, and four thousand horse. But being still ignorant of the designs of his enemies, he thought proper to retire to Oxford with his whole army.

Mean while, the Parliament, who had for some time found means to take their resolutions with more secrecy than formerly, perceiving the two armies of Essex and Waller ready to march, sent to each a supply of four thousand two hundred of the trained-bands of London. So, the Earl of Essex's army consisted of twelve thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and Waller's of seven thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse and Dragons. These two Generals had orders to march separately, and besiege Oxford, if the King remained there; but if he went from thence, the Earl of Essex was ordered to follow him with his army, and Waller to march into the West, according to the first project. They departed from London, the 14th and 15th of May, to put themselves at the head of their respective armies, and immediately marched towards Oxford.

The King had posted almost all his Infantry at Abington, in order to stop the enemies, and have time to consider what measures he should take, in case they really intended to besiege Oxford, which he still questioned. As Abington could not be easily defended but on the East-side, and he was unwilling to run any unnecessary hazard, he had ordered General Wilmot to make a vigorous defence, if attacked on that side, but if on the west from Wantage and Farrington, to relinquish the place. But whether the order was not clear and full, or for some other reason, Wilmot, at the enemies approach, [on the East-side] immediately retired to Oxford, and the Earl of Essex instantly entered Abington. The King perceiving the siege of Oxford was resolved, had but one way to hinder it, which was to defend the passes of the Rivers Isis and Cherwell, which run on the West and East-sides of the City, and to that end he quartered his horse near the Isis, and his foot towards the Cherwell. Whereupon the King drew all his into Oxford and to the North of the City, with thought at the same time of providing for the safety of his person, not judging it proper to suffer himself to be shut up. There was no time to lose, for the King's troops were hardly retired, when the Earl of Essex passed the Oxford at Gosworth bridge with his army. So the King giving orders to his Horse, and a small body of Foot, to wait for him at such a place, left Oxford the 3d of June about nine o'clock at night, and safely passed between the two Parliament armies (2). He was out of all danger of pursuit before the news of his retreat reached the enemies, and came at length [on June 6,] to Worcester, after having endured a great fatigue.

The two Generals were extremely surprized, when they heard the King had escaped them. But it was too late to hope to overtake him. Mean while, the city of Oxford being well stored with provisions and ammunition, and the King having left there almost all his Foot, they did not think fit to besiege it, and the rather, as they had no orders to do it, unless the King remained there. The Parliament's intention was, that in case the King quitted Oxford, the Earl of Essex should follow him with his army, and Waller with his, take care of the affairs of the West. But the Earl of Essex, for some unknown reason, reversed this order, and would himself march into the West. And when Waller urged the Parliament's orders, the Earl of Essex positively commanded him, as his General, to obey, to which the other could make no reply. So, the Earl immediately began his march to the West. The Parliament were very much offended with the Earl of Essex's disobedience, and sent him an order, which reached him at Salisbury, to return, follow the King, and leave to Waller the western expedition. But the Earl, instead of complying, sent a letter to the committee of war (3), with the reasons of his conduct, subscribing his letter, Your innocent, though suspected Servant, Essex. Whether both Houses were satisfied with the Earl's reasons, or believed it proper not to incense him in such a juncture, they suffered him to pursue his march, which he did in a slow and easy manner, till he came into Devonshire.

The Queen had been ever since April at Exeter, the capital of that County, where she was delivered of the Princess Henrietta, about a fortnight or three weeks before the Earl of Essex's approach. As soon as she heard of his entering Devonshire, she sent and desired a safe-conduct to retire to Bristol (4). The Earl of Essex answered, if her Majesty would please to go to London, he would have the honour to wait upon her thither; but could not give her a safe conduct to Bristol, without the express order of both Houses. Whereupon the Queen withdrew into Cornwall, and some time after into France, with a convoy of men of war, sent her by the Prince of Orange.

Prince Maurice had been, since the 20th of April, before the little town of Lyme, which made a more obstinate defence than was expected. This place, and Plymouth, were almost the only towns in the West that were for the Parliament. It was therefore very necessary for the Parliament, to have in those parts, forces capable of reviving the courage of their friends, who had received no assistance since Prince Maurice's arrival. At the Earl of Essex's approach, who was now advanced to Dorchester, the Prince raised the siege of Lyme, and retired to Exeter. The same day, the Earl of Essex possessed himself of Dorchester. Then, he detached Sir William Balfour, who took Weymouth, whither the Earl of Essex instantly repaired. He had some thoughts of besieging Exeter, and indeed marched that way; but considering that Prince Maurice was there with his whole army, he was afraid of losing too much time in the siege, and stopped at Char, where he remained some time, and from thence marched to Tiverton. Whereupon, Prince Maurice sent a detachment from Exeter, with orders to fecure Barnstable; but the inhabitants shut the gates against him, and immediately sent to the Earl of Essex, to come and take possession of the town, which was done accordingly by the Lord Roberts. Here was taken Captain Hewerd, who having been formerly Lieutenant to Captain Pym, had deserted, with nineteen troopers, to the King's party; for which being now tried by a Council of War, he was condemned and executed. Upon this, Prince Maurice caused to be hanged Turpin, a Sea-captain, taken prisoner in attempting to relieve Exeter, when the Earl of Stamford was besieged in it. He being indicted for levying arms against the King, was by the Judges, Heath, Forster, Banks, and Serjeant Glanvil, condemned, but hitherto reprieved, by reason of the consequences. The Parliament was very much incensed at this reprisal, considering the difference between a prisoner of war, and a deserter. Wherefore having Serjeant Glanvil in their custody, who had lately quitted the King's party, and returned to London, they ordered him to be impeached of High-treason. Soon after, the King's party caused fourteen Clothiers to be hanged at Woodhouse in Wiltshire (5), and the Parliament ordered eight trishmen to be executed, who had been taken prisoners in some action. These are the sad effects of civil wars. These executions gave occasion to the Parliament, in August following, to erect a Court-martial, to which were given very severe instructions, chiefly with respect to deserters. About the middle of July, Taunton-Dean was taken for the Parliament, by a party of the garrison of Lyme (6).

I am obliged for a time, to break off the narrative of the affairs of the West, to relate what the King did after his happy escape from Oxford.

He arrived the 6th of June at Worcester with his little army; but staid there only a few days, hearing Waller was marching that way. When he quitted Worcester, he made several marches and counter-marches (7), to deceive the vigilance of his enemy, not being strong enough to venture to expect him. At last, having made a show of marching towards Shrewsbury, Waller doubted not but his design was to join Prince Rupert, who was still in those parts. For this was before the battle of Marston-moor. He thought it therefore very important to march before, and post himself between the King and Shrewsbury, in order to hinder his joining with the Prince. The King was very glad to have deceived Waller. As soon as he knew, Waller expected him upon that rout, he feigned to take it indeed, but suddenly turning about, instead of continuing his march towards Shrewsbury, took the road to Oxford, and left Waller in his post, without any possibility of overtaking him. When he came near Oxford, he was joined by the rest of his army, which he had left there when he quitted that city. Then, no longer fearing Waller, since he was stronger than he, he went and quartered in Buckinghamshire, without any other design than to give the enemy battle, if there was occasion.

Waller having been thus circumvented, approached the King however, and at length the two armies were in fight, with the river Cherwell between them. Waller drew up on a very advantageous ground, imagining the King would pass the river to attack him, and thereby furnish him with an opportunity to fight with advantage. But the King, to draw him from his post, feigned to march northward, and accordingly advanced into Northamptonshire, leaving a strong guard at Credeney bridge, to hinder the enemies from passing, and following him in the rear. Whilst he was marching, he had intelligence, there was a body of three hundred Horse going to join Waller, within two miles of the van of his army, and was told, they might be easily cut off, if the army moved faster. Whereupon orders were sent to the van, and main body, to advance faster. As soon as Waller perceived there was a great distance between the King's rear, and the rest of his army, he detached a thousand Horse, to pass the river at a ford, a mile below, and himself, with fifteen hundred Horse, one thousand Foot, and eleven pieces of cannon, attacked Credeney bridge, took it, and passed his troops. Which done, he fell upon the King's rear, but was repulsed, with loss of many of his Men, and part of his cannon. This is all that can be gathered with any clearness, from the accounts of this battle (8). The detachment, which, I said, passed 1644. the ford, had much the same success. Waller being thus repulsed, and forced to repass the river, drew up his men on a hill, and there waited the King's motions. As it was yet but three in the afternoon, the King believing, the enemies were discouraged with their ill success, ordered Cropley bridge, and the ford, to be attacked by two great detachments. The first was repulsed at the bridge, with great loss on the King's side. The other gained the ford; but all that could be done, was to maintain it, expecting in vain, till night, that the first detachment would recover the bridge. Night coming on, both sides retired, Waller remaining master of the two passes.

The King was so prepossessed with the notion, that the enemies army was entirely discouraged, that he resolved to send them an offer of Pardon by a herald, imagining it would be immediately accepted, and Waller deserted. In this belief, he sent a trumpeter to Waller, to desire a safe-conduct for a Gentleman to deliver a gracious message from his Majesty. Waller answered, he had no power to receive any message without permission from the Parliament, to whom his Majesty was to make application. The two armies faced each other for the space of two days, standing in the same posture, after which they both drew off, each taking a different rout (1). In all appearance, Waller after this loss, did not think himself in condition to go any more in quest of the King, who was superior to him in number. As it was about this time, that the report of Prince Rupert's defeat at Marston-moor was spread, Waller thought, doubtless, there was no great necessity to hazard a second battle, since the King would probably be very much distressed. When he knew afterwards, the King was marching towards the West, he gave himself still less trouble about what the King might attempt, since it belonged to the Earl of Essex to get off as he pleased. There was not a sufficient union between them, for Waller to be much concerned at what might happen to the Earl. Perhaps too, his not being able to follow the King, who was marching against the Earl of Essex, was the reason why he dismissed the regiments of the London auxiliaries, which, added to his loss at Cropley, disabled him from acting till he had fresh troops.

The King, who at the beginning of this campaign was in a sad strait, found himself, a month after, much at ease. Of the two armies by which he had been attacked, one was unable to hurt him, and the other was gone into the West, where he himself was very strong. In the first place, he was master of all the fortified towns, Plsmouth excepted. Secondly, he had at Bristol a large garrison, part whereof might be drawn out upon occasion. In the third place, almost all the Gentry of the western Counties were well-affected to him. There were only the meaner sort of People, who were divided between him and the Parliament, but who however were always ready to join with the strongest. Lastly, Prince Maurice had at Exeter, and in the neighbourhood, four thousand men, which could be easily brought to him by the North of Devonshire, and the Earl of Essex not be able to prevent it. All these considerations determined him to march westward, to give the Earl of Essex battle, if an opportunity offered. He had scarce begun his march, when he received the ill news of what had passed at York, which confirmed him in his resolution. He perceived, that if he remained in the middle of the Kingdom, where he had few friends or fortified towns, the three Parliament armies, which were now separated, would not fail to rejoin, and then, he should be too weak to withstand them.

As soon as the King had taken this resolution, he informed Prince Maurice of it, that he might be ready to join him, and by the same express sent orders to the Lord Hopton, to draw what men he could out of Wales and lead them to Bristol, that he might meet him on the way with those troops, and as many more as could possibly be spared from that garrison. So, the King making easy marches, in order to give the Waller's troops time to join him, came the 15th of July to Bath, from whence, after two days, he departed, and at length arrived at Exeter. When all the forces, he had sent for, had joined him, he saw himself at the head of an army much more numerous than the Earl of Essex's.

Five days after the fight at Cropley Bridge, the King being at Exeter, caused to be drawn up a message for peace to both Houses, a copy whereof was sent to the Earl of Essex by the Marquis of Hertford, to be communicated to the Parliament, it being intimated that the French agent had the original to deliver if required. This message directed To the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster, contained a general offer to treat of peace, and if commissioners should be sent to him, he would grant them a safe-conduct. The two Houses, ever jealous of the King, thought there was some artifice concealed in sending them only a copy of the message, and that his aim was to engage them to demand the original of the French agent. Besides, they did not conceive themselves to be owned by the direction of this message as the two Houses of Parliament, and therefore imagined, the King had a mind to reserve to himself the power of saying, that he did not acknowledge them for the true Parliament of England (2), and indeed he ought not, according to his principles, since he had published the forementioned Declaration against them. Wherefore they resolved to take no notice of the message, nor return any answer.

Whilst the King stayed at Bath, he had assembled the inhabitants of Somersetshire [at Kingmoor], and made a Speech to them, exhorting them to take arms for him, and furnish him with money. He told them, "That victory was the only means left to restore peace to the nation, that blessed peace which he had so often fought for from them at Westminster, and which they had so scornfully rejected. But, continued he, when I mention peace, I would be understood to intend that peace, which is built upon such foundations as are most likely to render it firm and stable; wherein God's true Religion may be best secured from the danger of Popery, Sectaries, and innovations; the Crown may possess those just prerogatives which may enable me to protect and govern my People according to law; and the Subjects be confirmed in those rights which they have derived from their forefathers, and which I have granted them in Parliament; to which I shall always be ready to add such new graces, as I shall find most to conduce to their happiness: This is the peace which I labour for, wherein I may justly expect your best assistance with your hearts, and hands, and purses."

For the clear understanding of the King's meaning, not only on this, but on all other the like occasions without exception, it must be considered, the Parliament did not deny, that a King of England ought according to the laws of the Land, to enjoy such prerogatives as his Majesty demanded; but they affirmed, it ought to be for the welfare, and not for the destruction of the People. They pretended, that Charles I. had abused these prerogatives to destroy the rights of the Subject, and from thence drew this inference, that it was absolutely necessary to put it out of his power to abuse them for the future, which could be done only by depriving him of part of the prerogatives he had abused. They maintained, only the King's bare word could not be relied on, and there was need of a stronger fence to secure the Laws. The King, on his part, did not deny, he had made ill use of his power. But he had repaired the mischief he had done, and protested, his intention was to govern for the future, according to the Laws of the Land. What therefore was the ground of the war? Why, the Parliament would not trust to the King's word, and the King refused to give other security. When therefore the King so frequently offered peace, on condition he should be restored to all his prerogatives, excepting those he had departed from in this Parliament, far from showing by these offers, that he was sincerely desirous of peace, he rather demonstrated, that nothing could satisfy him but an entire victory, whether by arms or treaty. On the other hand, when the Parliament seemed to wish for peace, but on condition that the King should be deprived of his prerogatives, was not this in reality to wish for war, since it was desiring to secure by a treaty an advantage, which their arms had hitherto rendered very uncertain? We must not therefore be misled by the sound of the word Peace, which was, as appears, a very ambiguous term, and of which both sides, especially the King, made a parade to dazzle the People. I am in hopes this remark will be of use to explain many the like passages of this reign.

When the Earl of Essex heard of the King's approach, he called a Council of War, to debate what was to be done in this emergency. His own opinion was, to return, and hinder the King from penetrating farther into the Country, and to give him battle if a favorable opportunity offered. He represented, that in Devonshire or Somersetshire, as he should not be straitened in room or provisions, he might either fight, or avoid it as he should think fit. But the Lord Roberts of Truro (3), Field-Marshal in this expedition, whose estate lay all in Cornwall, positively affirmed,

(1) Rushworth and Wilebeck both say the King drew off first, and then Waller marched over Cropley Bridge. Rapin follows the Lord Clarendon's account.

(2) The Author being obscure in this place, and having mistaken the direction of the Message as in Rushworth, the Translation is according to Waller's.

1644. firmed, that as soon as the army should enter that County, the People would all declare for the Parliament; that then it would be impossible for the King to come there, and the army might easily subvert, and be reinforced with a great number of troops. Upon this assurance, which afterwards proved very false, the Lord Robert, rather by a sort of violence, than the strength of his reasons, caused it to be resolved, that the army should march into Cornwall.

The King follows him to Clarendon, II. p. 396. Rushworth, V. p. 691. Whitelock.
Pursuant to this resolution, the Earl of Essex entered that county the 26th of July, after forcing the passage at Newbridge, which was bravely defended [by Sir Richard Grenvil.] The same day the King came to Exeter (1), and after a general Muster of his army, followed the Earl of Essex, who did not find in Cornwall what the Lord Roberts had made him expect. He advanced however to Lancelston, and from thence to Bodmin, where he writ to the Parliament, that he did not doubt, the King's design was to straiten him for provisions, and therefore earnestly desired, that an army might be sent into the West to lye upon the King's rear, and hinder him from executing his project. But as Sir William Waller was not ready to march, being then in London, soliciting supplies for his army, all that could be done was to detach Colonel Middleton with two thousand five hundred Horse and Dragoons (2), with orders to march westwards.

The King's Letter to the Earl of Essex, August 6. Rushworth, V. p. 691. Clarendon, II. p. 399. 400, 401. Whitelock.
The King seeing the Earl of Essex intangled in a Country where he wanted provisions for the subsistence of his army, thought it a fair opportunity to try to gain him. Wherefore he sent him a Letter under his own hand, perswading him to free himself from his present straits, by restoring peace to the Kingdom, that is, by declaring for such a peace as the King desired. The Earl of Essex returning no answer to this letter, Prince Maurice and the Earl of Forth, lately made Earl of Brentford, the King's General, writ to him two days after; and the next day he received another letter on the same subject, signed by [the Lord Hopton and] many General Officers of the King's army. At last, he returned a brief answer to the Earl of Brentford, that he had no commission to treat.

Wilnot arrested by the King, Clarendon, II. p. 398, 399, 397, 398.
About this time, the Lord Wilnot, Lieutenant-General of the King's Horse, was arrested [and sent prisoner to Exeter] by his Majesty's order, he having taken the liberty to send the Earl of Essex word, that if he would enter into treaty, the officers of the King's army were so desirous of peace, they would constrain his Majesty to conclude it upon reasonable terms. Wilnot's disgrace bred some murmurs amongst the Officers of Horse, by whom he was very much beloved. Nay, they presented a petition to the King, to pray him to let them know what crime that Lord was accused of. The King, in such a juncture, was very ready to give them this satisfaction. Nevertheless the Lord Wilnot was deprived of his post, which was given to the Lord Goring, after which, he had leave to retire beyond sea (3). It was generally believed in the army, that Wilnot's disgrace was owing to some intrigue of the Court, and the King's private hatred of him on account of the part he had acted against the Earl of Strafford.

The Earl of Essex in great distress, Id. p. 400, 401. Rushworth, V. p. 699. &c.
The Earl of Essex perceived too late the vanity of the Lord Robert's promises. So far were the People of Cornwall from rising in his favour, that on the contrary they ran in crowds to join the King's army. The Earl could have provisions but by sea, and in small quantities, by means of a river which afforded him a communication by sea with Plymouth (4). At last, Sir Richard Grenvil having brought the King a supply of troops, it was resolved in a Council of War, to make use of the superiority of the number, not to compel the Earl of Essex to fight, but to cut off his provisions entirely. This was happily effected, by means of a fort run up on the bank of the river, by which the enemies received their provisions. Thus the Earl of Essex being reduced to the last extre-1644. mity, after having kept his post almost a month, resolved to abandon his army, to avoid falling into the King's hands. But before he executed that design, he ordered Sir William Balfour to endeavour to save the Horse, which he performed very fortunately in a dark misty night, by passing unobserved through the King's quarters (5). As soon as the Earl of Essex knew the Horse were out of danger, he sent to the King and demanded a parley, but before the answer was returned, took ship with some officers and retired to Plymouth, leaving Major-General Skippon to see to procure the best terms he could for the Foot.

The King having granted the parley desired by the Earl of Essex before his departure, a conference was held between some officers of both armies, where the following articles were agreed on (6).

I. That on the morrow, being the 2d of September, all the officers and soldiers under the command of the Earl of Essex, shall deliver up all their cannons and train of artillery, with all carriages, necessaries and materials thereunto belonging; and likewise all arms offensive and defensive, with all ammunition whatsoever, except only the swords and pistols of all officers above the degree of Corporals.

II. That immediately after, all officers and soldiers shall march out of their quarters to Leftwithiel with their colours, trumpets, and drums; and that all officers above the degree of Sergeants, shall take with them such horses and servants as properly belong to them, with all their bag and baggage, and waggons with their teams.

III. That they shall have a safe convoy of one hundred Horse, from their quarters, to Leftwithiel, and thence in their march to Pool and Wareham.

IV. That in case they shall march from Pool to any other place by land, that they shall not bear arms more than is allowed in the agreement, until they come to Southampton or Portsmouth.

V. That all the sick and wounded should be left at Foy, till such time as they can be conveniently transported to Plymouth.

VI. That all the officers and soldiers shall be permitted to receive all moneys, provisions, and other accommodations, as they should be able to procure from Plymouth; to which end they shall have a pass for any twelve persons, whom they shall send for the same.

VII. That there shall be no inviting of any soldiers, but that such as will voluntarily come to his Majesty's service, shall not be hindered.

By this treaty, the King properly gained only artillery, arms, and ammunition. But though it was something to reduce this army to such a condition, it would have been of much more advantage to him, had he made the officers and soldiers prisoners of war. For the Parliament wanted neither artillery, nor arms, nor ammunition, to repair their army, which indeed was able within five or six weeks, to give the King battle. It is to be presumed, the King had good reasons to be satisfied with this little advantage.

Though the Earl of Essex might have been justly upbraided for the two faults he had committed, in obstinately pursuing his march into the West, contrary to the orders of both Houses, and in preposterously running himself into Cornwall, he was not insulted for his misfortunes, but at his return was very civilly received. It was then no proper time to examine his conduct. The point was to recruit and arm the ruined army, as well as that of Waller, and accordingly both Houses applied themselves to it with all possible diligence. They ordered also Colonel Middleton to repair speedily to the Earl of Essex's army, and the Earl of Manchester to march the same way with his forces.

After the King had gained so considerable an advantage, he hoped, the righted Parliament would desire nothing more than to come to an agreement. He plainly perceived, that such a peace as he desired was impracticable, as long after of peace him to take the honour, and pay him 10,000*l.* for it — The Lord Clarendon says, He was a man of an impetuous disposition, full of contradictions in his temper, and of parts so much superior to any in the Company, that he could too well maintain and justify all those contradictions. Tom. 2. p. 315. Ludlow adds, He persuaded the Earl to march into Cornwall, that he might have an opportunity to collect his rents in those parts. Tom. 1. p. 126.

(3) The Lord Goring was just come from Prince Rupert, with letters to the King, requesting that Goring might be made General of the Horse in his room. So that Rapin is mistaken, in saying, he had Wilnot's post given him. For his Majesty, the day after his receiving him, told the Officers of Horse, he had justly retrained Wilnot for the present, but had not taken away from him his command in the army. However, Wilnot, when he saw his military enemy Goring put in the command over him, thought himself incapable of reparation, or full vindication, so desired leave to retire into France, and had a Pass sent him for that purpose. It seems, the Earl of Brentford being grown old, the King designed to make Prince Rupert General. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 398.

(6) Whitchel, who pretends to give an impartial relation of this affair, says, That the Earl of Essex did not send to parley, but that after he was gone, some came by design to the Parliament force, intimating, that the King was willing to admit of a Treaty with them, which was great wisdom and gallantry in the King, choosing rather to treat them with their own consents, than hazard the useful trial of a battle. Upon this, Skippon calls his Officers together to a Council of War, and declares, he was for fighting his way through the enemy, as the Horse had done. But few of the Council did concur with him, so the above-mentioned Articles were agreed upon. Some of the Soldiers, as they were marching forth, being pillaged by the King's Soldiers, Skippon rose up to the King, who stood to see them pass by, and told him, "It was against his honour and justice, that the Soldiers should be pillaged, contrary to the Articles, and desired his Majesty to give order to restrain them," which the King did. There were delivered up forty pieces of brass Ordnance, two hundred barrels of powder, and nine thousand arms for Horse and Foot. See, says Whitchel, the uncertain issues of war! A few weeks before, Essex and Waller, with two great armies, were in pursuit of the King, who could scarce find a way to avoid them; and now the Parliament's army is defeated, alarmed, and dispersed, and the King becomes victorious. Whitchel, p. 102.

the Parliament was prosperous. But he flattered himself with the hopes, that after to great a misfortune, his enemies would gladly accept his offers, and insist no longer upon terms he was fully resolved not to grant. In this belief, he sent from Torjiblack a fresh message to both Houses, with a copy of peace, and proposed to it a duplicate of his former message from Essexham. This message was so worded, that he seemed out of pure moderation to offer, after his victory, to be content with having, by a peace, what he was in condition to obtain by force of arms. But if notice be taken of what I before said, to explain what is to be understood by the peace offered by the King, it will be found, that through an excess of modesty, moderation, and affection for his people, he would be fatisfied to obtain by a treaty, what hitherto he had not been able to procure by arms: For that was the real meaning of his offer, though disguised under the specious name of peace. The Parliament must have understood it in that sense, since it was not regarded. The King himself, doubtless, did not believe, he could deceive the two Houses by the bare name of peace, after having so often experienced how much they were upon their guard in that respect. But these frequent offers of peace were properly designed to make impression upon the people, who did not discover their true meaning.

The 10th of September, the King appeared before Plymouth (1), in hopes, that after his late victory, the gates would be opened to him. But having summoned it in vain, and even given some assaults, he was forced to retire, the season not permitting him to undertake so important a siege, which probably, would have employed him several months. Besides, his design was to march to London, where he supposed all were in the utmost consternation. Mean while, General Gering, with a detachment of the army, became master of Barnstaple.

I have had frequent occasion to speak of the affairs of the Elector Palatine, and to observe, how much James I. and Charles I. neglected the interests, the one of the King his Son-in-law, and the other, of the Elector his nephew. All the Elector's dominions being in the hands of his enemies, he fled for refuge to the King his uncle, who gave him a pension for his subsistence. This pension, it is likely, was ill paid since the King was engaged in the war with Scotland, and still worse, since the beginning of this Parliament. So the Elector having attended the King till he retired into the North, and seeing the war ready to kindle, abruptly quitted the King his uncle at York. He retired into Holland, and staid there till August 1644, when he suddenly came to London to reside there, under the protection of the Parliament. The King hearing of it, writ to him, to know the reason of so extraordinary a proceeding. It does not appear what answer the Elector returned; but probably, not knowing how to subsist, and considering the King his uncle was not able to maintain him, he believed, he should find more assistance in the Parliament, which had ever expressed a great affection and zeal for his House. He was not deceived in his expectations, for the Parliament granted him an honorable pension, which was more regularly paid than the former from the King (2). He afterwards desired and obtained leave to hear the debates in the assembly of Divines. Probably, as he did not care to be concerned in military affairs, he sought to spend his time in conversing with the learned, and improving himself in matters of Religion.

The King was so strongly possessed with the belief, that his victory could not but make a strong impression upon the minds of the people, that he resolved to march directly to London. He did not question, but his army would considerably increase by the way, and the people forsake the two Houses, when they should see him marching towards the metropolis. It is true, such turns had been formerly seen in England, but very seldom or never in favour of Princes, whom the Nation believed to have cause to complain of. However, though Charles had given but too much occasion to complain of his Government, yet was he persuaded, he was beloved by the people, and imputed whatever they did against him, to the artifices, calumnies, promises, threats, and violences, that were used to mislead or compel them. In this belief, he imagined, the people wanted only an opportunity to free themselves from the yoke of the Parliament, and that the present one being very favorable, was not to be neglected. He published therefore the 30th of September, a Proclamation, dated at Chard, wherein he set forth, with what earnestness and sincerity he had always desired, and offered peace, which had been constantly rejected by both Houses, after which he said, "That he had therefore resolved with his army, to draw presently towards London, and his southern and eastern Counties, not looking upon these parts as enemies to him, but as his poor Subjects, oppressed by power, (of which he was assured the greater part remained loyal to him,) and of deserving his protection; hoping, that at a nearer distance of place, there might be begot no right an understanding between him and his people, that at length he might obtain a treaty for peace, and a full and free convention in Parliament, and therein make an end of these unhappy differences, by a good accommodation; whereby his people might be settled in the possession of their Rights and Liberties. And therefore he required his Subjects within his own quarters, through, or near which he should pass, forthwith to prepare themselves with the best arms they could get, to be ready to join him. He authorized likewise as well the trained bands of London, as his Subjects of the eastern and southern Counties, to chuse their own commanders among those Gentlemen and Citizens, that were of approved loyalty, and lovers of peace, requiring them at his approach, to put themselves in arms, and assist in this expedition, and commanding them to seize such places of strength, as the rebels were possessed of, and to apprehend the persons of all such as should hinder the settling the peace of the Kingdom."

All the effect this Proclamation produced, was, that the inhabitants of Somersetshire, where the King then was, presented a petition to him, humbly beseeching his Majesty, "That they might have liberty to wait upon him in person, and, at a nearer distance of place, become petitioners to both Houses, to embrace his Majesty's offers of peace, and in case of refusal, they promised to spend their lives and fortunes, in assisting him to compels by the sword, what by fair means could not be effected." But this was only a promised aid, and as yet too remote for the King to make any use of it in the present expedition.

If every thing had happened as the King had imagined; if the People had flocked to his army; if he had been cheerfully supplied with all necessaries, very probably, he might have arrived at London before the Parliament-forces could have been joined to form a new army. But his army, instead of increasing in their march, as he expected, daily diminished by fatigues, by want of money, shoes, and stockings, and by sickness, which disabled many of his men from following the army (3). He was obliged to make frequent halts in several towns to wait for money and other necessaries, which, he perceived, would not be supplied when he should be removed. The Horse being discontented, as well as the Lord Wilmost's disgrace, as at their having received no pay this campaign, he was forced to stay till the eastern Counties should supply him with money to satisfy them, otherwise he durst not advance. These delays were the reason that he came not to Salisbury till the 15th of October, six weeks after the advantage gained in Cornwall. Then it was that he altered his resolution, and instead of marching to London, contented himself with returning to his old quarters in and about Oxford. Nay, this project could not be executed without difficulty, considering the measures taken by his enemies.

Whilst the King was on his march, the Parliament was not idle. They had provided [six thousand] arms, and cloths for the Earl of Essex's Foot, and detached the city-brigade consisting of five thousand men (4), besides the necessary recruits, to join him. Sir William Waller had taken the field again, his army being recruited and reinforced, and was now at Andover ready to march. The Earl of Essex's Horse, which had fortunately escaped in Cornwall, were come to him, as well as those sent into the West, under the command of Colonel Middleton. Thus, the Earl of Essex saw himself in condition to march the 17th of October, in order to join Sir William Waller and the Earl of Manchester, who was within distance. The King having notice that Waller was to march to Reading, advanced with all possible diligence towards Andover, to give him battle before he had joined the Earl of Essex. Nay, he fell upon his rear and killed twenty or thirty of his men. But this could not hinder the junction of the three armies, which was done the 21st of October.

Whilst the King's enemies lay so near him, he very

Upon his landing at Crausford, a Committee of the Commons attended him, and in May 1645, the Commons ordered him an allowance of 8000*l.* a year, 2000*l.* whereof out of the King's revenue, and the rest out of the Estates of the Lord Corington, and Sir Nicholas Crispe. *W. 1644. unadvisedly, as it seems, detached from his army the Earl of Northampton with three regiments of Horse, to relieve Banbury Castle, which had been besieged ever since July the 19th, and was now reduced to extremity. The Earl succeeded in his expedition, but the King was like to pay dear for it, since, a few days after, he was forced to fight, deprived of the aid of these three regiments. His design, as I said, was only to retire to Oxford, there being no farther reason to induce him to pursue his march towards London. But he would first besiege Dennington Castle, and therefore advanced to Newbury, which lies but a mile from that Castle, whilst the Parliament army was at Reading. The next day, that army marched towards Newbury, where the King fortified himself in the best manner he could, and placed his Foot in the intrenchments, whilst the Horse were posted in two adjoining open fields, and for some days there were frequent skirmishes between the two armies. At last, on the 27th of October [being Sunday] the Parliament-Generals having divided their forces into two bodies (1), attacked the King's intrenchments at two several places. The fight, which began about three or four in the afternoon, held till night, and was extremely sharp, each side repulsing the other by turns. This is all that can be gathered with any certainty from the accounts of this battle, except that when night approached, the assailants forced part of the intrenchment, and took some pieces of ordnance. But night hindered them from improving this advantage, and put an end to the fight (2).

Mean while, the King fearing the enemy would next morning penetrate into his lines, withdrew in the night, and marched to Wallingford, leaving his heavy cannon and baggage in Dennington Castle. The Earl of Essex was not in the battle. He had quitted the army some days before, whether on account of some sudden indisposition, or perhaps out of some discontent, not being able to agree, either with the Earl of Manchester, or Sir William Waller (3).

The Parliament-Generals, who thought themselves victorious, should, one would think, have attacked the King in his retreat, which they could not be ignorant of, it being then full-moon. They suffered him to march however without pursuing him (4), so that he safely arrived at Oxford. But this was not their greatest error. The King having left his cannon, ammunition, and baggage in Dennington Castle, they could have done nothing more advantageous than to employ their whole strength to take the Castle. But they contented themselves with summoning the Governour (5), and upon his refusal to capitulate, they remained quiet at Newbury without attempting any thing against him. This negligence must have been owing to the diffidence amongst them, the one blaming the other for being the cause, that with so superior an army, the King's was not entirely routed. This diffidence grew so high, that whatever was proposed by the one, was sure to be opposed by the other. We shall see hereafter still worse effects of their discord, and the alterations it occasioned.

Mean while, the King being informed of the discord between the Parliament-Generals, and of their leaving Dennington Castle unattacked, very wisely improved so favorable a juncture. Some days after his arrival at Oxford, he was joined by Prince Rupert, who brought him some Horse. He drew a body of Foot out of the garrison of Oxford, and other neighbouring towns, and the Earl of Northampton rejoined him with his brigade of Horse. By means of these supplies he formed an army of six thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, with which he marched back towards Newbury the 2d of November. After the battle, the Parliament-army had moved towards Oxford, but was returned to Newbury, on pretence that the ways were unpassable. But the chief reason was, the Generals could not agree, there being no commander in chief. They received some intelligence of the King's march; but would not believe it till they heard of his being within six miles of Dennington. Whereupon they resolved to draw up the next day between Dennington and the King's army. To that end, orders were given for all their Horse to rendezvous early on the morrow, it not being possible to march that day by reason their quarters were too separate and remote. But that very night, the King pursued his march to Dennington, and drawing up his army, between the Castle and Newbury, waited in that posture to see what the enemy would attempt. Though presently after the Parliament-army was also drawn up, the Generals, having viewed the posture and strength of the King's, and held a council of war, judged it unsafe to engage. So, after some skirmishes, the King having drawn out what he left at Dennington, marched back to Oxford, where he arrived the 21st of November. In his way thither, he sent a detachment of his army to the relief of [John Paulet] Marquis of Winchester, who had been long besieged in his own Castle of Basing. But this detachment found the siege already raised. Thus ended the campaign of the year 1644, which proved not so fatal to the King as he had reason to fear, though however he lost York and all the North.

It is time now to speak of some other occurrences of the year 1644, which had no immediate relation to the war, but of which the knowledge is no less useful and necessary than that of conflicts and battles, though they have no natural connection together, nor depend upon each other.

March the 26th 1644, the Parliament passed an Ordinance, enjoining every family [within the bills of mortality, for three months] to forbear one meal a week, and contribute the value thereof for the publick occasions. This was properly laying a tax upon every family. For otherwise, very likely the Parliament did not much care whether this weekly meal were forborne or not, provided the value [which was to be set upon each person and family] were paid.

April the 13th an Oxford spy was executed in the Palace-yard at Westminster.

The 15th of the same month, it was voted by the Commons, that the committee of both Kingdoms should prepare propositions for peace, to be presented to the King. Not that they desired then to enter into a new treaty with the King, for, since the conferences at Oxford were broken off, nothing had passed to induce them to alter their plan. But herein they had a double view, first to let the publick see, they pretended not absolutely to reject peace, as they were charged by the King: Secondly, they had thereby a pretense ready to propose a peace, in case they were forced to it by the misfortunes of war during the campaign. What confirms this to have been their chief aim, is, that these propositions, which after all were the same in substance with those debated at Oxford, were not sent up to the Lords till the 19th of August, at the very time that the Earl of Essex was driven into Cornwall, and not to the King till the 20th of November.

To the year 1644 the affairs of the war were so publicly debated in the Parliament, that the King was acquainted with the resolutions there taken, before they were begun to be executed. But this year the managers thought fit to give the Committee of both Kingdoms, who were charged with the affairs of the war, more power than before, that they might give their orders, and cause them to be executed, without being obliged to communicate their resolutions to both Houses. I do not know whether this was by express vote, or by mere usurpation, the Committee knowing they should at least be avowed by the leading Members, in case it was attempted to call them to an account. A considerable advantage indeed was hereby gained, in that the resolutions became more private, and the King had not so good information. But on the other hand, the Committee had by it a power which might be of very dangerous consequence. And therefore several Members complained, that the most important affairs were not communicated, but that the direction and management was reserved to themselves alone by the Committee. The time for which they had been appointed being about to expire, the Commons passed an ordinance, for the continuance of the Committee three months longer, and sent it up to the Lords. But the Peers instead of passing the ordinance as sent by the Commons, added a clause to increase the number of the Committee, with five Lords and ten Commons [of their nomination] (1). It is not to be doubted, the King's private friends used their endeavours to increase the number of the Committee, in hopes of being able to gain some one to inform them of what should pass there. But the Commons foreseeing the consequence of this addition, refused to consent to it, and desired the Lords, that they would pass the ordinance without any amendment. The Lords declining to do it for some time, the Commons found means to get the Lord-Mayor and Common-Council of London to petition them among other things, that the Committee of both Kingdoms might be continued as it was (2). Then the Lords perceiving, that since the City of London interposed, their resistance would be fruitless, passed the ordinance four days after. The declarations of the City of London were a curb frequently used by the Commons to stop the career of the King's friends, when by their cabals they were endeavouring to disturb their deliberations, or to sow discord between the two Houses. Besides that it would have been dangerous as well as unjust to disoblige that great City, by whom the charges of the war were chiefly born, experience had shown, that the City had infallible expedients to support their friends in the Parliament. The Historians of the two parties are in different sentiments on this subject. The King's Adherents pretend, that in general the Londoners were for the King, and would gladly have accepted the peace he was pleased to offer them, but were over-awed by their Magistrates, who were almost all devoted to the Parliament. On the contrary, the Parliament's friends affirm, that the number of Londoners who were for the King was far short of that of his enemies, and that the commotions now and then in the City, whether to demand peace, or to disturb the Parliament's debates, were but an effect of the cabals of some private persons, who secretly adhered to the King, and endeavoured to sow dissension between the Parliament and the City. That this manifestly appears in the ill success of all their attempts.

(3) Whitelock, upon this occasion, says, the Houses being informed the Lord General was not well, and stayed behind the Army, sent a Committee of Lords and Commons to visit him, and express the affect of us of both Houses to him. This was not (as was given out) a piece of courtesy, but I think real. There were some however, who were jealous that he was too much inclined to peace, and favouring of the King and his party. I think I knew as much of his mind as others did, and always observed him to wish for peace, yet not upon dishonourable or unjust terms. He was a lover of Monarchy and Nobility, which he suspected might be designed to destroy; which humour then beginning to boil up, he resolved to suppress. But the jealousies upon him (who was a faithful and gallant man, and fervent to the Publick) gave him great trouble in his thoughts. Mem. p. 108. See Hill's Mem. p. 21, &c.

There was in the London Petition above-mentioned, another article of no less importance. A great many Members of both Houses, as I have observed, had deserted the Parliament, before and after the beginning of the war. Some had taken this course out of affection to the King, and in order to serve him in his army, others by his express command, several through fear and punishment, for endeavouring to force the Parliament to a peace, and perhaps, some to avoid being exposed to the outrages of the London Mob. By the retreat of these Members, the opposite party to the King was become so superior in both Houses, that no man durst any longer oppose whatever they thought proper to move. Indeed, it would have been very fruitless, for the King's new friends in the Parliament to strive to support his interest. The King had therefore perceived, that his policy in diminishing the number of Members in both Houses, instead of being advantageous, had, on the contrary, proved very prejudicial, to him, for by that means the resolutions against him passed in Parliament with much greater ease. His enemies were now freed from restraint, and met with no farther opposition. The Commons perceiving, that from time to time some of these Members returned to London, thought not proper to admit them into the House, pursuant to a vote passed long before upon that head. They were apprehensive, if such Members were admitted, the King might in time find them so great a number, as would suffice to obstruct their deliberations. Mean while, to justify their refusal to admit them, they so managed, that in the petition presented to them by the Common-Council of London, was inserted an article, That none of the Members who had deserted the Parliament should be received, without satisfaction first given to both Houses for their future fidelity. In pursuance of this desire it was declared soon after, by an ordinance, that such Peers as had deserted, or should desert the Parliament, should not be re-admitted without the consent of both Houses; and that whatsoever Member of the House of Commons had so offended, or should so offend hereafter, and adhere to those that were levying war against the Parliament, were and should be absolutely disenable from sitting in the House of Commons. By this means, such as might intend to return to the Parliament for the King's service, had sufficient warning, that their artifice would be without effect.

[Robert Sidney] Earl of Leicester, who about this time quitted Oxford, and returned to London, was not of the number of those who forsook the King to do him service. He had too much reason to be dissatisfied with his Majesty, for amuling him two years together, under colour of sending him into Ireland, and for appointing at last the Marquis of Ormond, for Lord-Lieutenant in his room. The Earl of Leicester was however ordered into custody at his coming to London; but, in all appearance, it was only to show, that the new ordinance was intended to be rigorously executed.

In January 1643-4, the States-General of the United-Provinces, sent Ambassadors into England, to offer their mediation, which the two Houses made no great account of, knowing what credit the Prince of Orange, the King's Son-in-law, had in these Provinces. Besides, the Ambassadors, who were all supposed to be the Prince of Orange's creatures, refused to acknowledge the two Houses of Westminster, for the Parliament of England. In short, these Ambassadors, after several journeys to Oxford, and attempts to persuade the Parliament to accept their mediation, without the previous acknowledgment required, fully owned the two Houses for the Parliament of England, and presented a memorial to offer their mediation. It must be observed, this was the next day after the news of Prince Rupert's defeat at Marston-moor (3). As they had long delayed this acknowledgment, both Houses left them some time, in their turn, without any answer, being willing, doubtless, to intimate to them, that this mediation did not appear to them sufficiently impartial. Wherefore the 10th of December, they demanded a public audience, which was granted, and in which they offered again the mediation of their masters. Both Houses answered, that they readily accepted the mediation of the States: but had already sent propositions to the King for a treaty of peace, of which they were to wait the success. That, moreover the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, being united together by a solemn Covenant, they could do nothing without the concurrence of the Scots, which would require some time. Thus they evaded the offers of the States-General, not believing such a mediation could be for their advantage.

In July it was ordered by the House of Commons, that the fine imposed by the Star-Chamber upon Mr. Denzil Holles, for his asserting the liberties of his Country in Parliament, should be repaid him out of the King's revenue.

In October, an ordinance of both Houses was published, commanding, that no quarter should be given to any Irishman taken in arms against the Parliament.

In November, the Lord Maguire, and Mac Mahone, were brought upon their trials. They were apprehended at Dublin the very day they were to surprize the castle, and sent into England, where they had been confined in the Tower ever since. They had found means to break prison, and conceal themselves in a house in London. But unfortunately hearing a woman crying oysters in the street, one of them put his head out of window to call her, and was that instant espied by a servant of Sir John Clotworthy, who knew him, and immediately gave notice to the Lieutenant of the Tower. They were both seized again, and shortly after condemned and executed (4).

Since the famous William Laud Archbishop of Canterbury had been imprisoned at the end of the year 1640, I have had but little occasion to speak of him. It is time now to relate the catastrophe of his life. He was accused by the Commons of High-treason, December the 18th 1640, and thereupon committed to the custody of the Black-Rod. The 26th of February following, the articles of impeachment were brought in against him, and then he was sent to the Tower. There he remained till October the 23d, 1643, when the Commons having added ten fresh articles to the impeachment, he was ordered by the Lords to answer the 30th of the same month. It would be too tedious to specify all the petitions he presented, and all the expedients, his Council furnished him with, to cause his sentence to be deferred. It suffices to say, that he gained time till the 11th of November 1644, on which day he spoke several hours together in his own defence (5). But whether

(1) The reason was, because divers of the Committee, especially the Commons, were apprehended not to be so much the General's Friends, as others who were desired to be brought in, and this caused some plagues among them. Wittellack, p. 87.

(2) This Petition, says Wittellack, was suspected by the General's friends, to be set on foot by his enemies, and jealousy grew among the Granites of the Parliament, p. 88.

(3) On June the 6th, the Dutch Ambassadors addressed themselves to the two Houses in such terms as were acceptable; and it was resolved, they should be admitted to audience, which was done, July the 12th, in each House apart. Being brought into the House of Peers, and Charles prepared to receive them, they delivered their Embassy first in French, and then a Copy thereof in English. Then they were conducted by the Sergeant at Arms, with two Members, into the House of Commons: When they came in, the Speaker and all the Members stood up in their places uncovered, and the Ambassadors saluted them as they passed by them; they sat down in Chairs set for them, and the Members sat down likewise; and when the Ambassadors were covered, the Speaker and House were covered also. They made a short Speech, of the situation of their Kingdoms, and their desire to mediate an agreement between the King and his Parliament; and after their Speech ended, they returned with the same Ceremonies as at their coming thither. During the time of their being in the House, there lay upon the Table, in their view, forty eight colours, taken from the King's forces in the battle of Marston-moor. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 716. Wittellack, p. 94.

1644. the Commons were afraid, their proofs were not sufficient for his condemnation, or the delays granted him by the Lords, gave them cause to think, they were inclined to save his life, they used the same method as in the case of the Earl of Strafford, I mean, a bill of Attainder, which passed their House the same day the Archbishop made his defence before the Peers, with but one dissenting vote. The Bill being sent up to the Lords, they acquitted the Commons [at a conference] that indeed they found the Archbishop guilty of the charge as to matters of fact, but desired some farther satisfaction in point of Law, whether the matters amounted to Treason. Whereupon the Commons communicated to them the reasons, whereby they pretended to prove him guilty of that crime. Upon which the Lords, the 4th of January, passed the Bill of Attainder, whereby it was ordained, he should suffer death as in cases of High-treason, and on the 6th, both Houses ordered he should be executed the 10th. On the 7th, the Lords at a conference, informed the Commons of a pardon to the Archbishop from the King, dated the 13th of April 1643, but it was over-ruled and rejected. The same day, the Archbishop seeing there was no remedy, petitioned the Lords, that the manner of his execution might be changed to beheading. He desired also, that some of his Chaplains might be permitted to be with him before, and at, his death. The Lords very readily granted his two requests, but the Commons refused both, and sent him two Ministers whom he did not ask for, with one of those he desired. The next day he presented a second petition to be beheaded, setting forth, that he was a Divine, Bishop, Privy-counsellor, and Peer; whereupon the Commons were at length prevailed with. When he was upon the scaffold, he made a pretty long speech wherein, among other things, he intimated, that he suffered for not forsaking the temple of God, to follow the beatings of Jerusalem's calves, alluding to the Schism of the Presbyterians. He said,—"He had forsaken every corner of his heart, and thanked God, he had not found any sins there deserving death, by the known Laws of the land. The King had been traduced by being for labouring to bring in Popery, but, upon his conscience, he knew him to be as free from such a charge, as any man living, and held him to be as sound a Protestant, according to the Religion established by Law, as any person in the Kingdom. He protested, he never endeavoured the subversion of the Laws of the Realm, nor never any change of the Protestant Religion, into popish superstition. He had never been an enemy to Parliaments, but did indeed dislike the misgovernment of one or two ———". After he had prayed, the executioner did his office at one blow. His friends were permitted to take his body and bury it in Abbeys-Barking-Church. Such was the end of this famous Prelate, who, let his favours say what they please, was one of the chief authors of the troubles that afflicted England; first, by supporting with all his power the arbitrary principles, which the Court strove for several years to establish; Secondly, by a too rigid observance of trifles in the Divine Service, and by compelling every one to conform thereto. All that can be said in his favour, is, that he believed in his own conscience, this rigidity was necessary (1).

The same day the Lords passed the bill of Attainder against the Archbishop, they passed likewise an ordinance, that the book of Common-Prayer, should be laid aside, and the Directory established, which had been framed by the Assembly of Divines. Hereby the Church of England was rendered, by public authority, completely Presbyterian, to the great satisfaction of the Scots, and many of the principal Members of both Houses. This was an ill preparative for the peace which was now negotiating, and of which I have deferred to speak hitherto, that the narration might not be interrupted.

The King, as hath been often seen, sent message upon message to the two Houses, with overtures of peace; and no doubt, he would have granted it very willingly, had they been as ready to receive it in his sense. But they perfectly knew, what they were to understand by the word Peace. Besides, at the very time the King offered to treat with both Houses, he carefully avoided using any term that might intimate his owning them to be a Parliament. It was necessary therefore, if they desired to treat with him, either that he should expressly acknowledge them, or that they should treat as private persons without authority. But supposing they could have resolved to do so, what would such a treaty have signified? This was the pretence used by both Houses, during the campaign of the year 1644, not to answer the King's invitations. Mean while, as the King talked very much of his frequent offers, to persuade the people of his sincere desire of peace, and of the refusal of both Houses, they resolved to oblige him to explain more clearly, what he meant by Peace, that the people might examine, whether he offered sufficient security. For, as I said, this was the only point in question. The treaty at Oxford, where two propositions only were debated, not having fully cleared this matter, the two Houses thought it would be for their advantage to induce the King, by a second treaty, to declare positively, that he would give no other security than his bare word. They hoped, this would suffice to efface the impressions, his repeated offers might have made on the minds of the people.

During the campaign, it was no proper season for such a negotiation, by reason of the variety of accidents produced by the war. It was not till November the 20th, two days after the King's return to Oxford, that the two Houses sent him the propositions which had been prepared in the summer. They had sent to desire a safe-conduct for their commissioners, which the King had granted, but as to private persons, without one word to denote his considering them as the Parliament's commissioners. Though the two Houses were by no means pleased with such a safe-conduct, they accepted it however, and their commissioners repaired to Oxford, where the King arrived the day before (2). At the first audience, the King asked them, Whether they had power to treat: They answered, No; their commission was only to receive his Majesty's answer in writing. The King replied, Then a Letter-carrier might have done as much as you. In all appearance, he had expected, that the two Houses would treat with him, without his owning them for the Parliament of England, in which he was much mistaken. He heard the propositions read with great attention and patience, and then receiving them from their hands, told them, he would give them his answer.

[Montague Bartu] Earl of Lindsy, who was with the King at Oxford, having sent his compliments to Holles and Whitelock, they two, with the consent of the rest of the Commissioners, returned his civility by a visit. They found him indisposed, and in his bed; but he received them however in presence of several Lords who were in his room. Presently after, the King came in, and had a long conference with them. He told them, "He knew that they were both desirous of a peace, and wished, that all the rest of the Members were of their opinion; and therefore, says he, out of the confidence I have of you two, I ask your advice, what answer will be best for me to give at this time to your propositions, which may probably, further such a peace, as all good men desire?" Whitelock answered, "The best and most satisfactory answer, I humbly believe, would be your Majesty's presence with your Parliament, and which I hope might be without danger to you." The King perceiving they did not care to speak their minds before so much company, said, "I desire you two to go into the next room, confer a little together, and set down in writing, what you apprehend may be fit for me to return in answer to your message." Whereupon they withdrew into another room, and by Holles's intreaty, Whitelock wrote down what was their sense in this matter, and what might be fit for

The Treaty at Uxbridge. Id. p. 787. Logie's View. Clarendon, II. p. 442, &c. Authors of the new History in English a Peace.

(1) The managers at his trial were, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Brown, Sergeant Wild, Mr. Nicholas, for the Commons; and his Council were, Mr. Hume, and Mr. Clete. The sum of his Charge was, that he had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws and Government of the Kingdom of England, and to establish therein, to introduce an arbitrary Government. The Chaplains he desired to have with him, were, Stern, Haywood, and Martin; those sent by the Commons, were, Stern, Mayfield, and Palmer. He called his last Speech a Sermon, and began with a Text, Heb. xli. 1, 2. In his printed defence which he left behind him, he excuses himself in most particulars, by saying, That he was but one of many, who either in Council, Star-Chamber, or as a zealous man, humble in his private deportment; but withal, hot and indelicate, eagerly pursuing trifles, as bowing to the Communion Table, sports on the Lord's-day, &c. Rushworth, Burnet, Whitelock. Among other works of Piety and Magnificence, this great Prelate built a Court at St. John's College Oxon: like King Charles to give to the Clergy in Ireland, all the Improvements then remaining in the Crown: Settled the Impropriation of Guldford on the Bishoprick of Oxon: Got Commendations annexed to the Bishopricks of the new foundation: Obtained very ample Charters for the Universities of Oxford and Durham, and regulated the Statutes of the former: Founded an Academy Lecture at Oxford, and an Hospital in Reading: Set up a Greek Press in London, &c. He designed other great things, of which see an account in Rushworth, Tom. 2. p. 74, 75.—The Translator has received in a Letter, the following remarks on this famous Archbishop: The Author of the Letter thinks Ropin worthy of animadversion, for seeming to grant (in his Character, above), most of the fine qualities ascribed to him by his admirers, namely, Wisdom, Learning, and Good Sense. For (continues he) unless giving a series of the most violent and tyrannical Councils, be a proof of Wisdom, it does not appear, wherein his Wisdom consisted. Some Learning indeed he had, with a good share of School-Divinity, Languages, and Antiquities. But these, of themselves, are but very slender accomplishments, affording the mind the show, rather than the substance of knowledge, and tending more to fortify men in their prejudices, than to enlarge their understandings. And for his good Sense, let his own Speeches in the Star-Chamber remain as everlasting proofs of it; particularly his argument to execute the Painter for apprehending God like an old Man, drawn from his being called the Antient of days. Examine either his Actions or Speeches, and there can hardly be found any thing that looks like good sense, or even common discretion. His own Diary (however barbarous it was to publish it) shows him a man of a very mean Genius, a Bigger, and an Enthusiast.

(2) The Propositions having been prepared by the Committees of both Kingdoms, and approved of by both Houses, the Commissioners were appointed, namely, for the Peers, the Earl of Derby, and the Lord Maynard; for the Commons, Mr. Pierpont, Mr. Holles, Mr. Whitelock, and the Lord Wentman; and for Scotland, the Lord Maitland, Sir Charles Erskine, and Mr. Barclay. Whitelock, p. 121.

The Private Conference between the King and the Commissioners. Id. p. 122. Rushworth, p. 788.

1641-2. the substance of the King's answer. But this he did not in his usual hand, and without any name to it. The paper thus written being left upon the table, the King went in, and took it up immediately. No person was present, neither did the King admit any others to hear the discourse which passed between him and them. It cannot be denied, it was very extraordinary for these commissioners to confer in private with the King, unknown to their colleagues, to whom they imparted nothing of what had passed between the King and them. Accordingly, shortly after, the Lord Saville, now made Earl of Suffolk, who was in the Earl of Lindsey's room when the King came in, and who returned afterwards to the Parliament, accused them publicly, of having held private conferences with the King. But as he was not able to prove what he advanced, the thing rested there. What I have been saying remained a secret, till Whitelock published it in his Memorials, and even there we do not find the contents of the paper written with his own hand (1). But however, it is not impossible to vindicate these two commissioners, who having, doubtless, some knowledge of the plot that was now contriving, and of which I shall speak hereafter, wished, that a peace might be concluded before the plot was executed. In all appearance, they advised the King, in order to promote a peace, to grant the Parliament certain articles, otherwise they forelaw peace would be impossible; but the King thought not fit to follow their advice (2).

The next day the King sent his answer sealed up to the commissioners; but they refused to receive it, unless they had a copy of it. The King denied it some time (3); at last gave them a copy. The substance of it was only to demand a safe-conduct for the Duke of Lenox and the Earl of Southampton, to carry his answer to the propositions. As this Paper was not directed to any person, nor the Parliament so much as named in it, the commissioners made some scruple to receive it. They were prevailed with however, on the supposition, that the two Houses would be at liberty to make what use of it they pleased. This Paper being read at a conference of both Houses, the exceptions against the form and want of directions were highly debated; but at last, it was carried, to lay aside all objections, and ordered that the Earl of Essex should write to Prince Rupert to this effect: "That if his Majesty will send to the Parliament of England assembled at Westminster, and to the commissioners of the Kingdom of Scotland, they would with all readiness grant a safe-conduct for the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Southampton." The King was extremely loth to do this; but the affair being debated in his Council, none opposed it but himself. Nevertheless he could not be prevailed with, till after he was furnished with this expedient, to make a protestation against it in private, which should be recorded. After that, Prince Rupert's answer being worded as both Houses desired, the safe-conduct was sent to Oxford.

The two Lords sent from the King being come to London, delivered the King's answer to both Houses (4), dated the 13th of December, containing only, That whereas he found it very difficult to return a positive answer before a full debate, to their propositions, if the two Houses would appoint commissioners, he would nominate the like number to treat with them at any place that should be agreed on. As the King thought a common letter-carrier might have done the office of the commissioners, who brought the propositions, so it might be asked, where was the necessity of sending, two of the principal men of his Court and Council, to carry this answer to both Houses. But, in all appearance, the King's aim was to get information, by means of these two Lords and his friends in London, of some things which he was not fully acquainted with (5). However this be, not to dwell too long upon preliminaries, the particulars whereof are not absolutely necessary, it suffices to say, that the following articles were agreed on. That the commissioners of both parties should meet at Uxbridge: That the conferences should begin the 30th of January 1644-5, and should last twenty days: That the propositions, as well on the King's as the Parliament's side, should be reduced to these three heads, Religion, the Militia, and Ireland: That Religion should be treated upon, three days together, then the Militia three days more, and after that, Ireland, as many; which done, the affairs of Religion should be resumed for three days, then the business of the Militia, and lastly, Ireland for the same time. The King's commissioners were, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Kingston, the Earl of Chichester, and eleven others, among whom was Sir Edward Hyde Chancellor of the Exchequer, afterwards Earl of Clarendon (6). Those for the Parliament were twelve in number, the chief whereof were the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Denbigh (7); and for Scotland the principal were, the Earl of Lowdown, Lord-Chancellor of Scotland, and the Marquis of Argyll (8). I intend not to relate the particulars of this Negotiation, which was transacted by papers and answers in writing, but shall content my self with mentioning the principal matters. The King's propositions were in substance the same with those he had given at Oxford, without any alteration as to the sense. The Parliament's were not much different from the Oxford ones, but more large and full, and therefore I think it proper to insert them.

The Propositions of the Parliament, and Scotch Commissioners. Re. V. 39 D. 10.

"I. THAT all oaths, declarations and proclamations, against both or either of the Houses of the Parliament of England, and the late convention of Estates in Scotland, be declared null, and suppressed.

"II. That his Majesty may be pleased to swear and sign the late Solemn League and Covenant, and that an Act of Parliament be passed, for enjoining the taking thereof by all the Subjects of the three Kingdoms.

"III. That the bill be passed for the utter abolishing and taking away of all Archbishops, Bishops, &c. and the rest of the Hierarchy, out of the Churches of England and Ireland, and Dominion of Wales, with such alterations concerning the Estates of Prelates, as shall agree with the articles of the late treaty, of the date at Edinburgh, the 29th of November 1643, and joint declaration of both Kingdoms.

"IV. That the ordinance concerning the calling and fitting of the assembly of Divines, be confirmed by Act of Parliament.

"V. That reformation of Religion, according to the Covenant, be settled by Act of Parliament, in such manner as both Houses shall agree upon, after consultation had with the Assembly of Divines; and so far as both Kingdoms are mutually obliged by the said Covenant, to endeavour the nearest conjunction and uniformity in matters of Religion, that such unity and uniformity in Religion, according to the Covenant, as after consultation had with the Divines of both Kingdoms, now assembled, shall be jointly agreed upon by both Houses of the Parliament of England, and by the Church and Kingdom of Scotland, be confirmed by Acts of Parliament of both Kingdoms respectively.

"VI. That for the more effectual disabling Jesuits, Priests, Papists, and Popish Recusants, from disturbing the States, and eluding the laws, and for the better discovering and speedy conviction of Recusants, an oath be established by Act of Parliament, to be administered to them; and refusing the said oath, being tendered in such manner as shall be appointed by the said Act, to be sufficient conviction in law of Recusancy.

"VII. An Act of Parliament for education of the children of Papists by Protestants in the Protestant Religion.

"VIII. An Act for the true levying of the penalties against them.

Rushworth, V. p. 802, 803, 804, Dugdale's View.

(1) Rapin has committed some mistakes in his account of this matter, particularly he makes the Paper to be written by Hales, but they are corrected in the Translation, with some small additions from Whitelock's Memorials; which, though mentioned there and elsewhere by the Author, he never saw but is quoted in Rapin's.

(2) Whitelock, in his Speech to the House, when accused by the Lord Saville, says, the King pressed very much the unreasonableness of the Propositions, particularly those concerning Religion and the Militia; but he was told, that unless he would grant them, it would be in vain to treat of any peace. p. 154, 155.

(3) And told them, What is the answer to you, who are but to carry what I find; and if I find the Song of Baruch Hood and Little John, you must carry it? This, and other passages there were, which showed the King to be then in no good humour, and it was wondered at, since the disabling the Commissioners could be of no advantage to the King. Whitelock, p. 114, 115.

(4) The Houses were somewhat at a loss about the manner of their delivering their Message, as it was directed to the Scotch Commissioners, as well as to the Parliament. But at last it was resolved, that their reception should be by a Committee of fourteen Lords, and twenty eight Commons, and the Scotch Commissioners in the Painted Chamber. Rushworth, Tom. 5. p. 790.

(5) Had Rapin seen Whitelock's Memorials, he would have found his conjecture confirmed. He says, both Houses desired of the Duke of Richmond, and the Earl of Southampton, a list of their retinue, to the end no affront might be offered to them, but chiefly to discover such as came to Town with these Lords, under pretence of being of their retinue, when they were not, but came to do ill offices to the Parliament. Whitelock says, they were civilly treated, whereas at Oxford, he and the rest had been severely used, p. 118.

(6) The other ten were, the Lords Capel, Seymour, Hatton, and Calveley; Secretary Nicholas, Sir Richard Lane, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Sir Thomas Gardner, Mr. John Ashburnham, Mr. Jeffrey Palmer; with Dr. Stewart, Dr. Lox, and Dr. Shildan, for religious affairs.

(7) The other eight were, the Lord Viscount Weimar, Denzil Holles, William Pierpont, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Oliver St. John, Bulstrode Whitelock, John Crew, Edmund Prideaux.

(8) The other Scotch Commissioners were, the Lords Maitland and Balmerino, Johnston, Erskin, Dundas, Smith, Kennedy, Barclay, together with Mr. Alexander Henderson.

- 1644-5. "IX. That an Act be passed in Parliament, whereby the practices of Papists against the State may be prevented, and the Laws against them duly executed, and a stricter course taken to prevent the faying or hearing of mass in the Court, or any other part of the Kingdom.
- "X. The like for the Kingdom of Scotland, concerning the four last preceding propositions.
- "XI. That the King do give his royal assent,
- "1. To an Act for the due observance of the Lord's day.
- "2. And to the bill for the suppression of innovations in the worship of God.
- "3. And to the bill against the enjoying of Pluralities and Non-residency.
- "4. And to the following Acts, for the reforming and regulating of both Universities, of the Colleges of Wylmington, Winchester, and Eaton.
- "5. For the suppression of interludes and stage-plays.
- "6. For the taking the accounts of the Kingdom.
- "7. For relief of sick and maimed soldiers, and of poor widows and children of soldiers.
- "8. For raising of monies, for the payment and satisfying of the publick debts and damages of the Kingdom.
- "9. For taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, &c.
- "10. For the taking away all tenures by homage, and all fines, licences, seizures, and pardons for alienation: And that his Majesty will please to accept, in recompence hereof, one hundred thousand pounds per Annum;
- "And give assurance of his consenting in the Parliament of Scotland, to an Act ratifying the Acts of Convention of the Estates of Scotland, called by the Council and Conservatory of Peace, and the Commissioners for the common burthens, and assembled the 22d day of June 1643, and several times continued since.
- "1. That the persons who shall expect no pardon, be only these following, Rupert, and Maurice, Count Palatines of the Rhine, James Earl of Derby, John Earl of Bristol, William Earl of Newcastle, Francis Lord Cottington, John Lord Pawlet, George Lord Digby, Edward Lord Littleton, William Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, Matthew Wren Bishop of Ely, Sir Robert Heath, Knight, &c. and all such others, as being proceeded by the Estates for treason, shall be condemned before the act of oblivion be passed.
- "2. All Papists and Popish Reculants, who have been, are, or shall be actually in arms, or voluntarily assisting against the Parliaments or Estates of either Kingdom.
- "3. All Persons who have had any hand in the plotting, designing, or assisting the rebellion in Ireland.
- "4. That the members of either House of Parliament, who have deserted the Parliament, and concurred in the votes at Oxford, may be removed from his Majesty's councils, and be restrained from coming within the verge of the Court, and that they may not, without the consent of both Kingdoms, bear any office, or have any employment concerning the State or Commonwealth.
- "5. That by Act of Parliament, all Judges and Officers towards the Law Common or Civil; and likewise all Bishops, Clergymen, and other ecclesiastical Persons, who have deserted the Parliament, shall not be capable of any preferment or employment.
- N. B. Then follow several articles regulating the confiscation of the Goods, and the fines of such Delinquents as were not actually excepted in the Pardon.
- "XII. That an Act be passed, whereby the debts of the Kingdom, and the persons of Delinquents, and the value of their Estates may be known; and appointing in what manner the confiscations abovementioned may be levied.
- "XIII. That an Act be passed in the Parliament of both Kingdoms respectively, for confirmation of the treaties passed betwixt the two Kingdoms.
- "XIV. That an Act of Parliament be passed, to make void the cessation of Ireland, and to settle the prosecution of the war in that Kingdom.
- "XV. That an Act be passed in the Parliament of both Kingdoms respectively, for establishing the joint declaration of both Kingdoms, bearing date the 30th of January 1643.
- "XVI. That by Act of Parliament, the Subjects of the Kingdom of England may be appointed to be armed, trained, and disciplined in such manner as both Houses shall think fit; the like for the Kingdom of Scotland.
- "XVII. That an Act of Parliament be passed, for the settling the Admiralty and forces at sea, and for the raising of such moneys for maintenance of the said forces, and of the navy, as both Houses of Parliament shall think fit; the like for the Kingdom of Scotland.
- "XVIII. And an Act for the settling of all forces both by sea and land, in commissioners, to be nominated by both Houses of Parliament.
- N. B. Here follow the powers which those Commissioners were to have.
- "That the commissioners of both Kingdoms may meet as a joint Committee, 1. To preserve the peace betwixt the Kingdoms. 2. To prevent the violation of the articles of peace. 3. To raise and join the forces of both Kingdoms, to resist all foreign invasion. 4. To order the war of Ireland.
- "XIX. That his Majesty give his assent to what the two Kingdoms shall agree upon, in prosecution of the articles of the large treaty, which are not yet finished.
- "XX. That all Peers, made since the day that Edward Lord Littleton, then Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, deserted the Parliament, and that the said Great Seal was conveyed away, being the 21st day of May 1642, and who shall hereafter be made, shall sit or vote in the Parliament of England, without consent of both Houses.
- "XXI. That the Deputy, or chief Governor, or other Governors of Ireland, as also all the great officers of the Crown of England, be nominated by both Houses of Parliament.
- "XXII. That the education of his Majesty's children be in the Protestant Religion, and that their tutors and governors be chosen by the Parliaments of both Kingdoms. And that if they be male, they be married to such only as are of the Protestant Religion; if they be females, they may not be married but with the advice and consent of both Parliaments.
- "XXIII. That his Majesty will give his royal assent to such ways and means as the Parliaments of both Kingdoms shall think fitting, for the uniting the Protestant Princes, and for the entire restitution of Charles Ledwick Prince Elector Palatine, to his Electoral Dignity and Dominions, provided that this extend not to Prince Rupert, or Prince Maurice, or the children of either of them.
- "XXIV. That by Act of Parliament the concluding of Peace or war with foreign Princes and States, be with advice and consent of both Parliaments.
- "XXV. That an Act of oblivion be passed in the Parliaments of both Kingdoms respectively, relative to the qualifications in the Propositions aforesaid.
- "XXVI. That the members of both Houses of Parliament, or others, who have, during this Parliament, been put out of any place or office, for adhering to the Parliament, may either be restored thereunto, or otherwise have recompence for the same.
- "XXVII. That the armies may be disbanded, at such time and in such manner, as shall be agreed upon by the Parliaments of both Kingdoms.
- "XXVIII. That an Act be passed, for the granting and confirming of the Charters, Customs, &c. of the City of London, notwithstanding any Nonuser, Misuser, or Abuser. That the Militia of the City of London, and of the Parishes without, may be in the ordering and government of the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council.
- "That the Tower of London may be in the government of the City of London, and the chief officer and governor thereof from time to time be nominated and removeable by the Common-Council.
- "That the Citizens or forces of London shall not be drawn out of the City into any other parts of the Kingdom, without their own consent, and that the drawing of their forces into other parts of the Kingdom in these distracted times, may not be drawn into examples for the future.
- "And for prevention of inconveniences, which may happen by the long intermission of Common-Councils, it is desired, that there be an Act, that all By-Laws and Ordinances already made, or hereafter to be made, by the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, touching the calling, continuing, and regulating of the same, shall be as effectual in law, as if the same were particularly enacted by the authority of Parliament. And that the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council may add to, or repeal the said ordinances from time to time as they shall see cause.
- "That such other propositions as shall be made for the City for their farther safety, welfare, and government, and shall be approved of by both Houses of Parliament, may be granted and confirmed by Act of Parliament."
- If, after the reading of these propositions, it should be sought what authority the two Houses intended to leave the King, supposing he had accepted them, it would be difficult

1644-5, difficult to discover it. They pretended, as it evidently appears, to leave him only an empty title, and invest themselves with the sovereignty, and that, not by artifice, but openly and publicly. Their principle was, that the King having rendered himself unworthy, by the breach of his oaths, and of the trust reposed in him by the people, to hold the Reins of the Government, the supreme authority was to return to its original fountain, that is, to the people represented by the two Houses. Accordingly they did not pretend that the justice or injustice of these propositions should be debated in the treaty of Uxbridge; for it would have been ridiculous to assign but twenty days for such an examination; but they gave them as conditions from which they would not depart, and which the King was to embrace or reject. For this reason, the King's Commissioners endeavoured in vain to enter into a discussion of the propositions. All they gained by that was, that the Parliament's Commissioners offered to demonstrate by word of mouth, in private conferences, that the propositions were very just. After that, pretending to have urged satisfactory arguments, they coldly demanded their assent, though the King's Commissioners were far from being convinced by the reasons alleged to them. This method of proceeding baffled the King's Commissioners, who had prepared many arguments, objections, and difficulties against the propositions, and determined to find fault with every expression. For, after all, the King was no more desirous of a peace than the two Houses, as will presently appear, and indeed it was almost impossible, considering the contrariety between the principles on which the two parties founded their respective rights. To say all in one word, the Parliament's Commissioners departed not from one title of what was contained in the propositions.

In the first place, as to Religion, the need both Houses stood in of Scotland, and the Covenant made between the two Nations, allowed them not to question the justice of that Covenant, which had been now sworn to in both Kingdoms. Accordingly it may be affirmed, their Commissioners defended this article very ill. For, to prove the necessity of the alterations made in Religion, and in the discipline of the Church, the confirmation whereof they demanded, the best argument they alleged was the Covenant itself. It is true, in some conferences their Ministers were ordered to speak, and endeavour to shew that Episcopacy was not jure Divino. But this did not prove the absolute necessity of destroying it in England. All their reasonings were built upon the pretended mischiefs it had occasioned. But when the King's Commissioners proposed to suffer Episcopacy to remain, and to reform the abuses thereof, the reasons alleged by those of the Parliament not to agree to it were extremely weak (1).

For the Militia, an article which included the ordering of the forces of the Kingdom, the custody of places, the nomination to great Posts, &c. the Parliament could not depart from it, without owning, they were making war very wrongfully, since they pretended to do it, but in order to obtain such securities as they believed they had right to demand. If by a treaty, they should have accepted the King's word as sufficient security, every one would have perceived, they might have avoided the war, by accepting that security which the King had always offered before the breach. It must however be confessed, this article might very justly have been deemed a proper subject for a treaty. But the Parliament seems to have firmly adhered to this article of the Militia, only to lay invincible obstacles to a peace. For it may be affirmed, that neither party desired it, unless greater advantages could be procured by a treaty than by arms.

As for Ireland, the two Houses thought they had upon this article to great an advantage, that they were glad to expose the King to give ill reasons in his defence. It is therefore certain, it was not properly with design to make peace that the two Houses sent their Commissioners to Uxbridge. Their sole aim was, to let their party see, they were determined to support the alterations they had made in Religion, and the establishment of Presbyterianism: To shew the publick, the King, when he so frequently offered peace, offered only a peace very destructive and dangerous to the Nation: Lastly, to confirm the people in their suspicions, that the King did not proceed as he ought in the affairs of Ireland.

The King, on his part, was no more inclined to seek expedients for a peace than the two Houses. If he sent his Commissioners to Uxbridge, it was, first, because having so often expressed his earnest desire to treat, he could not decently recede, when he was, as I may say, taken 1644-5: at his word. Secondly, he knew, it had been moved in the Parliament to pursue the war more vigorously than ever, and that in order to do it with greater success, such alterations in the army were contriving, as could not but be disadvantageous to him. He hoped therefore, by means of the treaty of Uxbridge to retard the execution of that project, as well as the Parliament's preparations. Thirdly, he did not question, but the unreasonable demands of both Houses would produce a good effect for him in the minds of the people, because they would clearly see, that the Parliament's aim was to destroy entirely the worship of the Church of England, practised ever since the reformation; to assume to themselves the sovereignty under colour of curbing the power of the Crown; and, in a word, to change the constitution of the Government in Church and State. But tho' he had consented to treat upon the Parliament's propositions, he was however resolved never to consent to the abolition of Episcopacy, or diminution of the Regal Authority, nor to deprive himself of the aid he expected to receive from Ireland, by a peace with the Rebels, unless he was first sure of peace in England.

What has been advanced concerning the little inclination of both parties to peace, wants no proof with respect to the Parliament. Their propositions, the proceedings of their Commissioners, and the short space they assigned for the treaty, are clear evidences of it. As for the King, there are still more convincing proofs. First, there is not the least likelihood, that in his situation, if he had really and sincerely resolved to labour for peace, he would have been willing, I won't say to accept, but even to listen to propositions, which tended to leave him only the empty title of King, and to deprive him wholly of the exercise of the royal power. Had he been prisoner in the hands of the Parliament, harder terms could scarce have been proposed to him. And indeed, when that misfortune befel him afterwards, the Parliament made very little additions to these terms proposed to him at Uxbridge, when he was yet able to defend himself. Secondly, these intentions I ascribe to the King, with regard to peace, are proved by several papers found in his cabinet at the battle of Naseby, fought a few months after, and which the Parliament ordered to be printed and published. I shall give here some extracts of them, because they relate to the treaty of Uxbridge, of which I am now speaking. I own, it is not impossible, these papers may have been curtailed or forged by the publishers. But a bare possibility, without other proofs, would not be sufficient to take away all credit from these papers, the originals whereof the Parliament boasted to have in their hands. Besides, the impartial reader can find nothing there contrary to the genius and character of Charles I., or to the state of his affairs.

Directions for my Uxbridge Commissioners.

First, concerning Religion.

"IN this, the government of the Church (as I suppose) will be the chief question, wherein two things are to be considered, conscience and policy.

"For the first, I must declare unto you, that I cannot yield to the change of the Government by Bishops, nor only as I fully concur with the general opinion of Christians in all ages, as being the best, but likewise I hold myself particularly bound, by the oath I took at my Coronation, not to alter the government of this Church, from what I found it. And as for the Church's patrimony, I cannot suffer any diminution or alienation of it, it being, without peradventure, sacrilege, and likewise contrary to my Coronation-oath. But whatsoever shall be offered for rectifying of abuses, if any have crept in, or yet for the ease of tender consciences, (so that it endanger not the foundation) I am content to hear, and will be ready to give a gracious answer thereunto.

"For the second, as the King's duty is to protect the Church, so it is the Church's to assist the King in the maintenance of his just authority; wherefore my predecessors have been always careful, (especially since the Reformation) to keep the dependency of the Clergy entirely upon the Crown, without which it will scarcely sit fast upon the King's head; therefore you must do nothing to change or lessen this necessary dependency.

"Next concerning the Militia. After conscience, this is certainly the fittest subject for a King's quarrel; for without it the King's power is but a shadow, and therefore upon no means to be quitted, but to be maintained

(1) Upon the entrance into the debate of Religion, Dr. Stewart spoke against Presbyterian Government, and for Episcopacy, which he alleged to be the word of God. He answered him, and asserted, that Episcopacy was not so fixable to the word of God as Presbyterianism, when he urged the Discipline. Whereupon the Marquis of Hereford spoke to this effect. "My Lords, Here is much said concerning Church-Government in the general, but I desire to know the King's part affirm, That Episcopacy is jure Divino: The Reverend Ministers of the other part do affirm, That Episcopacy is jure hominum. For my part, I think that neither the one nor the other, nor any Government whatsoever, is jure Divino; and I desire to leave this argument, and proceed to debate upon the particular propoſitions." The Earl of Pembroke, says Whitlock; and many of the Commissioners, were of the same judgment. Whitlock's p. 128.

1644-5. "according to the antient known Laws of the land : Yet because (to attain to this fo-much-wished peace by all good men,) it is in a manner necessary, that sufficient and real security be given for the performance of what shall be agreed upon, I permit you, either by leaving strong towns, or other military force to the rebels possession (until articles be performed) to give such assistance for performance of conditions, as you shall judge necessary for to conclude a peace, provided always, that you take (at least) as great care, by sufficient security, that conditions be performed to me, and to make sure, that the peace once settled, all things shall return into their antient channels.

"As for Ireland, I confess they have very specious popular arguments to press this point, the gaining of no article more conducing to their ends than this; and I have as much reason, in both honour and policy, to take care how to answer this as any. All the world knows the eminent, inevitable, necessity, which caused me to make the Irish cessation; and there remain yet as strong reason for the concluding of that peace; wherefore you must consent to nothing to hinder me therein, until a clear way be shewn me how my Protestant Subjects there, may, probably (at least) defend themselves, and that I shall have no more need to defend my confidence and Crown from the injuries of this rebellion."

Oxford, Feb. 1644.

"I. FOR Religion and Church-government, I will not go one jot farther than what is offered by you already.

"II. And so for the Militia, more than what ye have allowed by me; but even in that you must observe, that I must have free nomination of the full half; as if the total number of Scots, and all, be thirty, I will name fifteen. Yet if they (I mean the English rebels) will be so base as to admit of ten Scots, to twenty English, I am contented to name five Scots, and ten English; and so proportionably to any number that shall be agreed upon.

"III. As for gaining of particular persons, besides security, I give you power to promise them rewards for performed services, not sparing to engage for places, so they be not of great trust, or be taken away from honest men in possession, but as much profit as you will. With this last you are only to acquaint Richmond, Southampton, Culpepper and Hyde."

The Queen to the King.

Paris, Jan. 6. Decemb. 27. 1644-5.

"I Understand that the Commissioners are arrived at London; I have nothing to say, but that you have a care of your honour, and that if you have a peace, it may be such as may hold; and if it fall out otherwise, that you do not abandon those who have served you, for fear they do forsake you in your need; Also, I do not see how you can be in safety without a regiment of guards; for my self, I think I cannot be, seeing the malice which they have against me, and my Religion, of which I hope you will have a care of both; but, in my opinion, Religion should be the last thing upon which you should treat: For if you do agree upon strictness against the Catholics, it would discourage them to serve you; and if afterwards there should be no peace, you could never expect succours either from Ireland, or any other Catholic Prince, for they would believe you would abandon them, after you have served your self."

His Majesty's Letter to the Queen.

Oxford, Dec. 1644.

"Dear Heart, — NOW (as a certain truth) that all, even my party, are strangely impatient for peace, which obliged me so much the more, at all occasions to shew my real intentions to peace: And likewise, I am put in very good hope, (some hold it a certainty) that if I should come to a fair treaty, the ring-leading rebels could not hinder me from a good peace: First, because their own party are most weary of the war, and likewise for the great distractions which at this time most assuredly are amongst themselves, as Presbyterians against Independents in Religion, and General against General in point of command. Upon these grounds a treaty being most desirable, (not without hope of good success) the most probable means to procure it was to be used, which might stand with honour and safety. Amongst the rest, (for I will omit all those which are unquestionably concealable) the found of my return to London, was thought to have so much force of popular rhetoric in it, that upon it a treaty would be had, or if refused, it would bring much prejudice to them, and be advantageous to me; yet, left foolish or malicious people should interpret this, as to proceed from fear or folly, I have joined conditions with the proposition (without which this found will signify nothing) which thou wilt find to be most of the chief ingredients of an honorable and safe peace. Then observe, if a treaty at London, with Commissioners for both sides, may be had without it, it is not to be used, nor in case they will treat with no body but my self; so that the conditions save any aspersions of dishonour, and the treating at London, the malignity which our factious spirits here may infuse into this treaty upon this subject. This I hope will secure thee from the trouble, which otherwise may be caused by false malicious rumours; and though I judge my self secure in thy thoughts, from suspecting me guilty of any baseness, yet I held this account necessary, to the end thou may make others know, as well as thy self, this certain truth, that no danger of death or misery (which I think much worse) shall make me do any thing unworthy of thy love. — I conclude, by conjuring thee as thou lovest me, that no appearance of peace, nor hopeful conditions of mine, make thee neglect to hasten succour for him, who is eternally thine."

To the Queen.

Jan. 1. 1644.

"I Shall now tell thee, That the rebels are engaged into an equal Treaty, — and that the distractions of London were never so great, or so likely to bring good effect as now. Lastly, that the assistance was never more needful, never so likely as now to do good to him, who is eternally thine."

To the Queen.

Dear Heart, Oxford, Jan. 2. 1644.

"AS for my calling those at London a Parliament, I shall refer thee to Digby for particular satisfaction; this is in general: If there had been but two (besides my self) of my opinion, I had not done it; and the argument that prevailed with me was, That the calling did no ways acknowledge them to be a Parliament. Upon which condition and construction I did it, and no otherwise, and accordingly it is registered in the Council-books, with the Council's unanimous approbation."

To the Queen.

Dear Heart, Oxford, Jan. 22. 1644.

"I Believe thou wilt approve of my choice of traitors; and for my propositions, they differ nothing in substance (very little in words) from those which were last.

"Now upon the whole matter, I desire thee to shew the Queen and Ministers there, the improbability that this present treaty should produce a peace, considering the great strange difference (if not contrariety) of grounds that are betwixt the rebels propositions and mine, and that I cannot alter mine, nor will they ever theirs, until they be out of hope to prevail by force, which a little assistance by thy means will soon make them so; for I am confident, if ever I could put them to a defensive (which a reasonable sum of money would do) they would be easily brought to reason."

The Queen to the King.

My dear Heart, Paris, Jan. 27. 1644.

"TOM Elliot, two days since, hath brought me much joy and sorrow; the first to know the good estate in which you are, the other, the fear I have that you go to London. I cannot conceive where the wit was of those who gave you this counsel; unless it be to hazard your person to save theirs: But thanks be to God, to day I received one of yours by the Ambassador of Portugal, dated in January, which comforted me much to see that the treaty shall be at Uxbridge. For the honour of God, trust not your self in the hands of these people; and if you ever go to London, before the Parliament be ended, or without a good army, you are lost. I understand that the propositions for the peace must begin by disbanding the army; if you consent to this, you shall be lost, they having the whole power of the Militia, they have done and will do whatsoever you will. I received yesterday Letters from the Duke of Lorraine, who sends me word, if his service be agreeable 1644-5. "to you, he will bring you ten thousand men. Dr. Goff, whom I have sent into Holland, shall treat with him in his passage upon this business, and I hope very speedily to send good news of this, as also of the money; assure your self, I will be wanting in nothing you shall desire, and that I will hazard my life, that is, to die by famine, rather than not to send to you. Send me word always by whom you receive my letters; for I write both by the Ambassador of Portugal, and the Resident of France: Above all, have a care not to abandon those who have served you, as well the Bishops, as the poor Catholics. Adieu."—

The King to the Queen.

Jan. 30.
"—THE treaty begins this day. I desire thee to be confident, that I shall never make a peace by abandoning my friends, nor such a one as will not stand with my honour and safety."—

To the Queen.

Dear Heart,
Oxford, Feb. 11. 1644.
"—AS for our treaty, there is every day less hopes than other, that it would produce a peace, but I will absolutely promise thee, that if we have one, it shall be such as shall invite thy return; for I vow, that without thy company I can neither have peace nor comfort within my self. The limited days for treating are now almost expired, without the least agreement upon any one article; wherefore I have sent for enlargement of days, that the whole treaty may be laid open to the world; and I assure thee, that thou needest not doubt the issue of this treaty, for my commissioners are so well chosen, (though I say it) that they will neither be threatened nor disputed from the grounds I have given them, which, upon my word, is according to the little note thou so well rememberest, and in this not only their obedience, but their judgments concur.—
"In short, there is little or no appearance, but that this summer will be the hottest for war of any that hath been yet; and be confident, that in making peace, I shall ever shew my constancy in adhering to Bishops, and all our friends, and not forget to put a short period to this perpetual Parliament. But as thou lovest me, let none persuade thee to slacken thine assistance for him, who is eternally thine."

C. R.

To the Queen.

Dear Heart,
Oxford, Feb. 19. 1644.
"I Cannot yet send thee any certain word concerning the issue of our treaty, only the unreasonable stubbornness of the rebels gives daily less and less hopes of any accommodation this way; wherefore I hope no rumours shall hinder thee from hastening, all thou may, all possible assistance to me, and particularly that of the Duke of Lorraine, concerning which I received yesterday good news from Dr. Goff, that the Prince of Orange will furnish shipping for his transportation, and that the rest of his negotiations goes hopefully on.—
"As for trusting the rebels, either by going to London or disbanding my army before a peace, do no ways fear my hazarding so cheaply or foolishly; for I esteem the interest thou hast in me at a far dearer rate, and pretend to have a little more wit."—

To the Queen.

Dear Heart,
Oxford, March 5. 1644.
"NOW is come to pass what I foresaw, the fruitless end (as to a present peace) of this treaty; but I am still confident, that I shall find very good effects of it: For besides that my commissioners have offered, to say no more, full measured reason, and the rebels have stucken rigidly to their demands, which I dare say had been too much, tho' they had taken me Prisoner, so that assuredly the breach would light foully upon them: We have likewise at this time discovered, and shall make it evidently appear to the world, that the English rebels (whether barely or ignorantly will be no very great difference) have, as much as in them lies, transmitted the command of Ireland from the Crown of England to the Scots, which, besides the reflection it will have upon these rebels, will clearly shew, that reformation of the Church is not the chief, much less the only end of the Scottish Rebellion.

"But it being presumption, and no piety, to trust to a good cause, as not to use all lawful means to maintain it; I have thought of one means more to furnish thee with for my assistance, than hitherto thou hast had; it is, that I give thee power to promise in my name (to whom thou thinkest most fit,) that I will take away all the Penal Laws against the Roman Catholics in England, as soon as God shall make me able to do it, so as by their means, or in their favours, I may have so powerful assistance as may deserve so great a favour, and enable me to do it. But if thou ask what I call that assistance, I answer, that when thou knowest what may be done for it, it will be easily seen if it deserve to be so esteemed. I need not tell thee what secrecy this business requires; yet this I will say, that this is the greatest point of confidence I can express to thee, for it is no thanks to me to trust thee in any thing else but in this, which is the only thing of difference in opinion betwixt us: And yet I know thou wilt make as good a bargain for me, even in this, I trusting thee (though it concerns Religion) as if thou wert a Protestant, the visible good of my affairs so much depending on it."—

To the Queen.

Dear Heart,
Oxford, March 13. O. S.
"WHAT I told thee the last week concerning a good parting with our Lords and Commons here, was on Monday last handsomely performed: And now if I do any thing unhandsome or disadvantageous to my self or friends in order to a treaty, it will be merely my own fault; for I confess, when I wrote last, I was in fear to have been pressed to make some mean overtures to renew the treaty, (knowing there were great labourings to that purpose;) but now I promise thee, if it be renewed, (which I believe will not without some eminent good success on my side) it shall be to my honour and advantage, I being now as well freed from the place of base and mutinous motions, (that is to say, our mungrel Parliament here) as of the chief causers, from whom I may justly expect to be chidden by thee, for having suffered thee to be vexed by them; Wilmot being already there, Percy on his way, and Suffox within few days taking his journey to thee.—

I shall make no other remark on these letters, than that they evidently shew, the peace which the King seemed to desire so earnestly, was an empty sound which had nothing real, but as taken in his private sense of the word. I have shewn on the other side, that the two Houses were not more inclined to peace. Wherefore I hope my Readers will not take it ill, that I forbear to enter into a long detail of the conferences at Uxbridge, where both parties sought rather to amuse the publick than expedients to conclude. I shall therefore content my self with briefly relating, how far the concession of the two parties reached towards making that peace they seemed to wish for so ardently.

Upon the article of Religion, the King's Commissioners, after many disputes, consented at last to the following particulars.

"1. That freedom be left to all persons, of what opinions soever, in matters of ceremony, and that all the penalties of the laws and customs which enjoin these ceremonies be suspended (1). The offer of the King's Commissioners about Religion. Rushworth, V. p. 818. Dugdale's View, p. 720.

REMARK (1). Since the penal Laws were not to be abolished, but only suspended, it followed that the Presbyterians could rely on that freedom no longer than it was out of the King's power to deprive them of it.

"2. That the Bishop shall exercise no act of Jurisdiction or Ordination, without the consent and counsel of the Presbyter, who shall be chosen [by the Clergy of each Diocese,] out of the learnedest and gravest ministers of that Diocese (2).

REM. (2). It was not declared who they were that would chuse the Presbyter. If it was the Bishop, this concession amounted to little or nothing (a).

"3. That the Bishop keep his constant residence in his Diocese, except when he shall be required by his Majesty to attend him on any occasion, and that (if he be not hindered by the infirmities of old age or sickness) he preach every Sunday in some Church within his Diocese (3).

REM. (3). This was no more than the Bishop's duty, and it was not for the King's honour to let this be considered as a concession to promote the peace.

(a) This Remark was needless, being occasioned by Rapin's omitting the words [by the Clergy of the Diocese] which are in the Concessions. See Rebellion, Tom. V. p. 618.

1644-5. "4. That the Ordination of Ministers shall be always in a public and solemn manner, and very strict rules observed, concerning the sufficiency and other qualifications of those men, who shall be received into Holy Orders; and the Bishop shall not receive any into Holy Orders, without the approbation and consent of the Prefbyters, or the major part of them.

"5. That competent maintenance and provision be established by Act of Parliament, to such Vicarages as belong to Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, out of the Impropriations, and according to the value of those Impropriations, of the several Parishes (4).

REM. (4). One of the principal things urged against the Church of England by the Presbyterians, was, that the Churches were ill served, because the Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, committed the cure of those which belonged to them, to insufficient Preachers for cheapness sake. This abuse, doubtless, ought to have been reformed, without making it one of the conditions of the Peace.

"6. That for the time to come, no man shall be capable of two Parsonages or Vicarages with Cure of Souls.

"7. That towards the settling of the publick peace, one hundred thousand pounds shall be raised by Act of Parliament, out of the Estates of Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, in such manner as shall be thought fit by the King and two Houses of Parliament, without the alienation of any of the laid Lands (5).

REM. (5). By the treaty between the Parliament and Scotland, the Lands of the Bishops, Deans, and Chapters were assigned for the payment of the Scotch troops. The King agreed by this concession to agree, that one hundred thousand pounds should be raised upon those Lands. But in supposing likewise the necessity of the King's consent for the applying that sum, the Scots could not be sure he would agree that it should be assigned to them.

"8. That the jurisdiction in causes testamentary, decimal, matrimonial, be settled in such manner as shall seem most convenient by the King and the two Houses of Parliament (6).

REM. (6). This concession signified nothing, for since the King meant not to give up his negative vote in Parliament, to say, that after the peace this article should be settled by the King and the two Houses, was as much as to say, there should be no alteration in it but what the King pleased.

"9. That one or more Acts of Parliament be passed, for regulating of Visitations, and against immoderate fees in Ecclesiastical Courts, and the abuses by frivolous Excommunications, and all other abuses in the exercise of Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in such manner as shall be agreed upon by his Majesty, and both Houses of Parliament (7).

REM. (7). This pretended concession is like the former; for after the peace should be made, it would be still in the King's breast to give or withhold his assent to the reformation of the abuses; whereas the point was to settle what ought to have been reformed.

When these concessions are compared with the Parliament's demand, that Episcopacy should be abolished; it is no wonder, the Parliament's commissioners were not satisfied with them. Accordingly, without losing time in disputing upon these articles, they rejected them as insufficient, and offered not to qualify their demand in the least.

As to the Militia, the King's commissioners, after long disputing, and alledging various arguments to shew the injustice of depriving the King of one of the most essential Privileges of the Crown, and the inconveniences which would infallibly spring from thence, were willing to grant:

"That all the forces of the Kingdom, both by sea and land, should be put into the hands of twenty commissioners, ten to be named by the King, and ten by the two Houses, and that the same thing should be done in Scotland. But they would not consent, the commissioners for Scotland should be joined with those for England, so as to form one Committee, or that the first should in any manner meddle with the affairs of England. Upon these conditions, they offered, that the King should be content that this commission should continue for three years." But still the power of these commissioners was first to be settled, wherein there were very great difficulties.

The Parliament's commissioners would not agree, that the King should name ten of the persons that were to be intrusted with the Militia. Their reason was, that the point being to give the People security, they would have none, if half the commissioners were nominated by the King: Nay, rather it would be a means to re-kinde the war, there being no likelihood that these commissioners, thus equally divided, would ever agree, since they would be of directly opposite principles. Moreover, proceeding upon the foundation of the union between England and Scotland, and upon the Dangers being common to both Kingdoms, they persisted to demand, that the commissioners of both Kingdoms should act in common. Upon these two conditions they agreed, that the commission should continue but seven years, after having long contended for an unlimited time. Thus the negotiation upon this, succeeded no better than upon the foregoing article (a).

As to Ireland, the Commissioners agreed upon nothing. The Parliament's would have the cessation to be void, and for the future, neither peace nor truce to be made without the consent of both Houses. The King's, knowing his Majesty's mind, that he would not only maintain the cessation, but even designed to make peace with the Irish, were far from consenting to the Parliament's demand. So, the whole dispute turned upon this point, whether the King had power to conclude a cessation, without the privacy of the two Houses, some affirming, others denying it. On each side, the same arguments were frequently repeated, with mutual reproaches for several proceedings; and almost all the facts alledged by one side, were denied by the other, so that neither of the parties made any concession.

After a negotiation of eighteen days upon the three articles I have been speaking of, the King's Commissioners desired, his Majesty's propositions, particularly those concerning the cessation of arms, and the King's return to the Parliament, might be considered. The other Commissioners answered, that when the two Houses should see the treaty like to succeed, they would consent to prolong it. The two remaining days were spent by the King's Commissioners, in trying to obtain a prolongation of the treaty, but they could not prevail. It must be remembered, that the King's aim was to gain time for two principal reasons. First, as he was persuaded, that as long as the people had any hopes of peace, they would not easily be induced to find the Parliament the necessary supplies for the continuation of the war, and so the preparations of the two Houses would be retarded. The second was, that he rightly judged, the Parliament would not seriously think of executing their project concerning the army, whilst there should be any expectation of peace. The two Houses perceiving the King's intention, avoided the snare, and the conferences broke off upon the expiration of the twenty days (b).

The House of Commons, or rather, a new party which had been formed in the House, waited only for this rupture, to execute a project which I have just mentioned, but of which it will be necessary to speak here more largely, since the execution of this project serves for foundation to all the events which afterwards happened.

Before the Parliament was assisted by Scotland, the war had not been much to their advantage. The successes of the two first campaigns were so far from answering their expectations, that very probably, without the assistance of the Scots, they would have been forced to make such a peace as the King desired. If in the third, the King had lost all the North, he had made himself amends, by gaining almost all the western Counties, and, after the second battle of Newbury, he was still at Oxford, in condition to withstand his enemies. The Scotch army, which, having subdued all the North, was advancing towards the middle of the Kingdom, was therefore what made the balance incline to the Parliament's side, and what, probably, was to give them the superiority in the fourth campaign, for which both sides were preparing. This aid came very seasonably, to establish the affairs of the Presbyterians, who were then all-

(a) The Parliament sent an express to Uxbridge, with their vote, to propound a limitation of the Militia for three years, after the three Kingdoms are declared by the King and Parliament to be settled in peace, or to have it settled in the Parliament for seven years, after the time the King is willing to settle it. When they first treated of the Militia, Sir Edward Hyde would have had it taken for granted, that the whole power of the Militia, by the Laws of England, is in the King only. This by Mr. Whitlock was denied to be so very clear; and he undertook to make it out, that our Laws do not positively affirm, where that great Power is lodged, and doubted not, but to satisfy the Commons fully in that point. Whereupon it was moved, that a day might be appointed to hear their arguments. But on account of the time, it was thought fit to adjourn the debate. The Commissioners of both Kingdoms, at their return from their quarters, thanked Whitlock for encountering Sir Edward Hyde, upon the point of the right of the Militia, where he was so confident. Whitlock, p. 129, 133.

(b) A great many of the King's friends and particularly the Earl of Southampton, went post from Uxbridge to Oxford, to press the King again and again upon their knees, to yield to the necessity of the times; and by giving his assent to some of the most material Propositions that were sent him, to settle a lasting peace with his People. The King was at last prevailed with to follow their counsel; and the next morning was appointed for signing a Warrant which his Majesty received, a few hours before he was to sign from the Marquis of Montrose, giving an account of the Earl of Argyll's defeat, and assisting his Majesty from treating with his Rebel-subjects. Because, as the Marquis affirmed, "he doubted not, but before the end of the summer, he should be able to come to his Majesty's assistance with a brave army." Whitlock's Mem. p. 62, 63, 302, &c. Burnet's Hist.

1644-5. powerful in the Parliament, and disposed of every thing as they pleased. They were the men who had most conducted to engage the Kingdom in a war, and called in the Scots, because they could not hope to execute their designs, unless the Parliament's arms were victorious. But before I proceed, it will be absolutely necessary to make known these Presbyterians, who till then seemed to make but one and the same party, though in reality they consisted of two, very different from each other, both in principles and interests.

After all my pains, I have not been able to discover precisely, the first rise of the Independent sect or faction. Thus much is certain, their principles were very proper to put the Kingdom in a flame, as they did effectually. With regard to the State, they abhorred Monarchy, and approved only a Republican Government. As to Religion, their principles were contrary to those of all the rest of the world. They not only were averse to Episcopacy, and the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy; but would not so much as endure ordinary Ministers in the Church. They maintained, that every man might pray in public, exhort his brethren, interpret the Scriptures, according to the talents God had endowed him with; whereas very often Ministers were ordained without proper endowments, whilst those of many Laymen remained useless for want of external Ordination. So with them, every one prayed, preached, admonished, interpreted the Holy Scriptures, without any other Call than what he himself drew from his zeal, and supposed Gifts, and without any other authority than the approbation of his auditors (1).

auditors (1). I cannot exactly tell, whether this sect or faction was entirely formed at the beginning of the Parliament, or whether it sprung up during the sessions. But there is, I think, a distinction to be made upon this subject. I conjecture, that the sect was already formed, with respect to civil Government, and arose from the principles of arbitrary Power, which James I. and Charles I. laboured to establish, but that with regard to Religion, it was formed during this Parliament. I build my conjecture upon this. When the long Parliament began, there were but two known parties in the English Church, namely, the Episcopals, or Church-of-England-men, and the Presbyterians. The name of Independent was entirely unknown, and those, afterwards called Independents, were certainly united with the Presbyterians, and made a very considerable part of them. But they were different from the other Presbyterians, as they proposed for their end to change the Monarchy into a Common-wealth, which cannot be imputed to the Presbyterians in general. It is very true, the Presbyterians were for humbling the regal power, and leaving the King only the shadow of Sovereignty; but they preserved a sort of attachment to the name of King, and at least an external respect for royalty. If we examine the propositions they presented to the King at several times, we shall find them all built upon this foundation. They were in that like the Scots, who cannot justly be accused of intending to abolish Monarchy, though they proposed to reduce it within very narrow bounds. The Independents, after having lent their utmost assistance to diminish the regal power, in hopes thereby to attain their end, the destruction of the Monarchy; perceived at last, they should not be able, without great difficulty, to accomplish their design. The reason was, because neither the English, nor Scots, Presbyterians, had any inclination to establish a Common-wealth, and because their whole Clergy, who had a great influence in that party, were of the same principles. They judged therefore, it would be very advantageous to them, to destroy the Clergy's authority, by intimating them to be unnecessary, and their vocation established upon no good foundation. Then it was that the Independent sect began to be formed with regard to Religion; for there are no signs of it, till about the end of the year 1644. I own this to be only conjecture, which may be rejected if any 164:-5, thing more plausible occurs.

It is no wonder therefore, that from the beginning of this Parliament, the Independents had earnestly contributed to put it out of the King's power to preserve his authority but by a war, and to ruin the Church of England. It rather to be considered, that this was the natural consequence of their principles, and a very proper means to lead them to their end. The humbling of the King, and the destruction of the Church of England, were two points that were necessarily to be gained, before the establishment of a Commonwealth was endeavoured. It was not therefore proper, they should separate from the Presbyterians, as long as these last concurred with them in their design to gain these two principal points. For that reason, they readily consented to call in the Scots, and made no scruple to approve of the Covenant, and whatever else was required by the Sects. The selfishness then was to be able to resist the King, who had acquired some superiority, by the happy success of his arms. This was the common interest of the Presbyterians and Independents, who would have been equally ruined, if the King's party had prevailed.

Mean while, the Scotts army, in strengthening alike the Presbyterians and Independents against the King, confirmed withal to the first, the superiority they had for some time enjoyed. As long as this superiority lasted, it was almost impossible for the Independents to attain their ends. They judged it therefore absolutely necessary, to undermine the great power of the Presbyterians, not openly, for fear of being oppressed before they had well laid their measures, but secretly, and by artifice. To that purpose, the leaders of this party, as Paine, Cromwell, Tate, Haslerig, and some others, began to make themselves very popular, and to express a great zeal for the publick, in order to gain the good-will of the people. They had their emissaries every where, who diligently aggravated the faults committed since the beginning of the war, as well in the administration of the Government, as in the military actions, and insinuated, they were entirely to be ascribed to the private views of the members of Parliament, who possessed all the places and offices, were very unmindful to put an end to the troubles. That some of the Generals had designedly missed opportunities of fighting with advantage, and that, in a word, the greatest part dreaded nothing so much as a decision, either by arms or a good peace.

In support of these rumours which were spread abroad, Cromwell, in the House of Commons, on 22 June 1659, Cromwell speech, 22 June 1659, House of Commons, 1659, 1660, 1661, 1662, 1663, 1664, 1665, 1666, 1667, 1668, 1669, 1670, 1671, 1672, 1673, 1674, 1675, 1676, 1677, 1678, 1679, 1680, 1681, 1682, 1683, 1684, 1685, 1686, 1687, 1688, 1689, 1690, 1691, 1692, 1693, 1694, 1695, 1696, 1697, 1698, 1699, 1700, 1701, 1702, 1703, 1704, 1705, 1706, 1707, 1708, 1709, 1710, 1711, 1712, 1713, 1714, 1715, 1716, 1717, 1718, 1719, 1720, 1721, 1722, 1723, 1724, 1725, 1726, 1727, 1728, 1729, 1730, 1731, 1732, 1733, 1734, 1735, 1736, 1737, 1738, 1739, 1740, 1741, 1742, 1743, 1744, 1745, 1746, 1747, 1748, 1749, 1750, 1751, 1752, 1753, 1754, 1755, 1756, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1760, 1761, 1762, 1763, 1764, 1765, 1766, 1767, 1768, 1769, 1770, 1771, 1772, 1773, 1774, 1775, 1776, 1777, 1778, 1779, 1780, 1781, 1782, 1783, 1784, 1785, 1786, 1787, 1788, 1789, 1790, 1791, 1792, 1793, 1794, 1795, 1796, 1797, 1798, 1799, 1800, 1801, 1802, 1803, 1804, 1805, 1806, 1807, 1808, 1809, 1810, 1811, 1812, 1813, 1814, 1815, 1816, 1817, 1818, 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, 1828, 1829, 1830, 1831, 1832, 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838, 1839, 1840, 1841, 1842, 1843, 1844, 1845, 1846, 1847, 1848, 1849, 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853, 1854, 1855, 1856, 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954, 1955, 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971, 1972, 1973, 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977, 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996, 1997, 1998, 1999, 2000, 2001, 2002, 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, 2008, 2009, 2010, 2011, 2012, 2013, 2014, 2015, 2016, 2017, 2018, 2019, 2020, 2021, 2022, 2023, 2024, 2025, 2026, 2027, 2028, 2029, 2030, 2031, 2032, 2033, 2034, 2035, 2036, 2037, 2038, 2039, 2040, 2041, 2042, 2043, 2044, 2045, 2046, 2047, 2048, 2049, 2050, 2051, 2052, 2053, 2054, 2055, 2056, 2057, 2058, 2059, 2060, 2061

This public proceeding of Cromwell raised a suspicion, ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} that he was one of the principal authors of the rumours ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} which tended to render the people jealous of the Parliament. ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} There was even a conference held at the Earl of Essex's, ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} where it was considered, whether he should be arrested. ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} But as the proofs appeared not sufficiently clear, it was re- ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} solved to wait till he should have laid himself more open. ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} Probably, some of those that were present at this conference ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} informed him of it, which made him hasten the execution ^{Dr. Gifford, referring to} of the project formed by himself and his friends (3).

This project was to exclude all the Members of Parliament from enjoying any office or command military or civil. It is certain, that from the beginning of the war, the Parliament in the distribution of posts, had not forgot their own Members, or rather to say the truth, all the principal posts were possessed by the Members of one or other House. Hence sprung two great inconveniencies.

1644-5. some difference between the two Houses. But after several conferences, the Lords approv'd of the lift the 18th of March.

Thus the new Model was completed, and though the Self-denying ordinance had been thrown out by the Lords, the Commons had now obtained, by empowering the General to nominate the officers of the army, the exclusion of the members of Parliament from all military posts. This made them hope, it would not be impossible to cause their ordinance to pass. And indeed, [they resumed the Debate of it March 24, and] on the 31st, it was sent up to the Lords for their consent, though they had already refused it. Then, the Earls of Essex, Dentigh, and Manchester, perceiving it would be in vain to strive against the stream, and that their House was not in condition to withstand the Commons, surrendered their commissions, and received the thanks of both Houses (1). The next day, the 3d of April, the Lords passed the self-denying ordinance; and thus ended this affair, which had been depending four months (2).

When it is considered, with what earnestness the Commons proceeded in the self denying ordinance, one is apt at first to believe, either that the number of the Independents was very superior in the House, or that the members were very disinterested. But neither of these was the case. The Presbyterians ever preferred a superiority of number, which became still greater by the members excluded from their posts, who not being employed in the army or elsewhere, increased their party in the Parliament. As to the disinterestedness of the members, it is not to be imagined, that men who had till now expressed such a greediness, as to monopolize, as I may say, and ingross to themselves all the places of trust and profit, should thus suddenly change from black to white, and sincerely desire to relinquish them. But the case was, they were attacked on their weak side, and so could vindicate themselves only by shewing a disinterestedness, which might at least make it doubtful, whether it was through selfishness that they had ingrossed to themselves all the offices and posts. The Independents, before they discovered their design, had taken care to prepossess the People with such plausible reasons, that the Parliament was in danger of being entirely deserted, if they undertook to justify their conduct, and maintain their partiality. This extenuation was what caused the ordinance to pass, though it was manifestly designed to ruin the Presbyterian party. For though their superiority of number in the Parliament did not cease, the Independents knew, that by having the army on their side, it would be in their power to obey the Parliament no farther than they pleased. Accordingly to this they bent all their endeavours, as soon as things were regulated as they had projected. The new General was reckoned a zealous Presbyterian, and by that the Parliament had been allured to chuse him. But Cromwell had such an influence over him, that he made him do whatever he pleased. He had artfully persuaded him, that his sole view was the welfare of Religion, and the good of his Country, and thereby prepared him to receive his counsels, and place an entire confidence in him. For though the Independent party began to shew themselves very openly, they did not yet pretend to form a separate party from that of the Presbyterians, and it was more than a year before they appeared at last entirely unmasked. Cromwell especially, more than any other of this party, put on the appearance of a rigid Presbyterian, and seemed to intend only the firm establishment of Presbyterianism. This was necessary to preserve the confidence of the new General, and make him act according to his views, without discovering the end to which he meant to conduct him. But it was not yet time to make known his designs. There were then but two things absolutely necessary for the advantage of his party. The first, in new modelling the army, to order it so, that the officers, whom the Independents thought they could confide in, might keep their commissions, and those whom they considered as their enemies, might be cashiered. For as three armies were to be reduced into one, many officers would of course be dismissed. The second thing was to prosecute the war more vigorously than hitherto, and endeavour more strenuously to disable the King to maintain it. It is evident the designs of the Independents could not be executed but by the King's destruction. This was necessarily to be supposed, and consequently, all risks were to be run to put a speedy conclusion to the war, as nothing could be more prejudicial to them than its continuation.

As soon as Sir Thomas Fairfax had received his commission from the Parliament, he came to Windor, his head quarters, and from thence lent commissioners where-ever there were troops, to form the new regiments, and disband the supernumerary officers. No doubt, these commissioners, who were mostly general officers, had private instructions concerning the officers, they were either to continue or break, and Cromwell had framed in great measure these instructions, though he did not appear to be concerned. The Parliament undertook this reform in a very dangerous season (3). It was in April, when the King was preparing to take the field. If unhappily, they had met with resistance in the troops, as many were apprehensive, and if this change had occasioned revolts, which might easily have happened by the intigations of the disbanded officers, they would have been without an army, at the beginning of a campaign, and consequently unable to withstand the King's forces. But they heard with pleasure, that every thing was effected with great tranquillity, and their orders every where perfectly obeyed.

The General remained at Windor all April, not being able sooner to finish what was to be done, to prepare the army for action. During this time, he received a letter from the Committee of both Kingdoms (4), informing him, that the King had sent to Prince Rupert, to come and join him with two thousand Horse. Wherefore, he was ordered to dispatch a party of Horse towards Oxford to hinder this junction. And as the self-denying ordinance was not to take place till after forty days, namely, on the 13th of May, the charge of this service was by the committee particularly recommended to Lieutenant General Cromwell.

Cromwell departing from Windor the 24th of April, met, near Slip-Bridge (5), with a brigade of the King's Horse, consisting of the Queen's, and three other regiments, and utterly routed them (6). Then he marched to Sir Thomas Coggin's at Blechington, where Colonel Windesbank, Secretary Windesbank's Son, kept a garrison for the King, and summoned the Colonel with a sharp message, who immediately surrendered. The King was so incensed at his cowardice, that he caused him to be condemned by a council of war, and afterwards shot to death. Cromwell gained some other advantages in those parts, but was repulsed in an assault upon Farrington.

After the Earl of Essex's disaster in Cornwall, the Parliament was very weak in the western Counties. They had in Dorsetshire only Poole, Lyme, and Weymouth; in Devonshire, Plymouth alone, and that beleiged; and in Somersetshire, only Taunton, closely invested by Sir Richard Greenwell, and in great distress. The Parliament, fearing to lose this important place, sent express orders to the General to march with his whole army, and raise the siege, not considering that the midland Counties would be left defenceless, just as the King was going to take the field. Mean while, Fairfax, in obedience to the orders, began his march the 30th of April, and on the 7th of May was beyond Salisbury.

The Committee of both Kingdoms having intelligence, that the King was on the 7th of May to head his army, perceived their error in sending all their Forces into the West, and leaving the middle of the Kingdom defenceless. Wherefore they dispatched with all speed an order to the General, which reached him at Blandford, to return, and lend only a party to relieve Taunton. The General immediately obeyed, and detaching Colonel Welden with about five thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse to Taunton, returned back to Newbury, where he stayed some days to refresh his troops.

At the approach of the Party sent to Taunton, Sir Richard Greenwell raised the siege of that place, where relief could not come more seasonably, so much as it pressed. But shortly after, General Goring came into Somersetshire with three thousand horse, given him by the King, when he heard Fairfax was marching to the West. Then, Greenwell joining him, they went together, and laid siege again to Taunton, where the Party that relieved the town were shut up.

During these motions of the Parliament's forces, the King, on the 7th of May, took the field, and marched [with about eight thousand men] towards Chelster, to re-1645. lieve the place, besieged by Sir William Brereton (1). But he heard by the way, the siege was raised; and having nothing more to do there, marched to Leicester, which he took by storm the 30th of May.

Mean time, the Parliament perceiving the King was marching towards Chester, sent orders to General Fairfax to besiege Oxford. Accordingly Fairfax approached the city, and began the siege. But within a few days, the Parliament having intelligence of the taking of Leicester, were apprehensive, the King's design was to enter the associated eastern Counties, and therefore ordered their General to raise the siege of Oxford, and follow the King. Fairfax therefore marched away on the 7th of June. As, very likely, a battle would quickly ensue, he writ to desire the Parliament to dispense with Cromwell's absence from the House, and to order him to march to the army, and command the Horse, which was readily granted. Thus, Cromwell, who had been one of the most forward to pass the ordinance for the exclusion of the members of Parliament from all offices and posts, civil and military, was the only person that kept his seat in Parliament, and his command in the army. This would be a very honorable distinction for him, were there not room to suspect, it was owing to his own intrigues (2).

Mean while, the King was very uneasy. He was informed of the siege of Oxford, but did not yet know it was raised, and that the enemy was marching directly towards him. This made him resolve to move towards Oxford, in order to relieve a city of so great importance to him. To that end, he encamped at Harborough, from whence he sent an express to General Goring, to order him to come and join him with all possible speed. Here it was he received intelligence, that Fairfax was drawn off from Oxford, and had been repulsed with great loss, in an assault upon Berks house (3). His troops, as was usual with them, were so elated at this news, that they imagined the enemies to be in the utmost consternation, which ought to be improved by immediately giving them battle. The King himself was prepossessed with this notion, which made him contempt his enemies, and unfortunately induced him to advance to Daventry in Northamptonshire, in a belief it would always be in his power to fight when he pleased, and that his enemies would never dare to attack him. Otherwise, he might have retired to Leicester, and there quietly expected the three thousand men, Colonel Gerrard was to bring him from Wales, and Goring's three thousand Horse from the West. As to Goring, an accident happened, which very much conducted to hasten a battle. Fairfax had sent a man to Oxford, who pretending to serve the King, had managed so artfully, that Secretary Nicholas had entrusted him with a packet to General Goring, who was before Taunton. This man having discharged his commission, Goring thought he could not employ, to carry a letter to the King, a more trusty messenger than the person sent to him by Secretary Nicholas. He gave him therefore a letter for the King, wherein he told his Majesty, that he hoped to be master of Taunton in a short time, conjuring him not to engage, but to stand upon the defensive, for he did not question, in twelve or fourteen days to join him with the forces under his command. The King knew nothing of this letter which was brought to Fairfax. But it convinced the Parliament-Generals of the absolute necessity of fighting, before this aid should come to the King.

Pursuant to this resolution, Fairfax continued to advance towards the King, who being better informed of the number and designs of his enemies, resolved to retire to Leicester. To that purpose, he began to march towards Harborough, where his van arrived, whilst the rest of the army was yet above two miles behind. That same night, he heard, the enemies were within six miles of Harborough, and indeed General Ireton, Cromwell's Son-in-law, had now fallen upon some of the King's quarters, and taken several prisoners. Whereupon it was resolved at a council of war, held in the night, to march back and meet the enemy, considering the impossibility of going to Leicester, without exposing the rear to certain destruction. So, the King returning in the morning, the 14th of June, met the Parliamentarians, who upon news of his march, had drawn up near Naseby. Here was fought the fatal battle that decided the quarrel between the King and the Parliament.

Prince Rupert commanded the right wing of the King's army, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale the left. Sir Jacob Astley (4) led the main body of the foot, and the King was at the head of the reserve of Horse (5). On the Parliament's side, the right wing of Horse was commanded by Cromwell, the left by Ireton. General Fairfax, and Major-General Skippon, were both at the head of the main-body, the first on the right, and the other on the left (6).

Prince Rupert began with charging the left wing, commanded by Ireton, and after a long conflict, wherein he met with great resistance, broke that body of Horse, put them to flight, and chased them almost to Naseby town (7). In his return, he lost some time in trying to become master of the Parliament's artillery. He even fummed the train, but, they being well defended with fire-locks, and a rear guard, and he without Foot, he could not execute his design.

At the same time, Cromwell was engaged in a very obstinate fight with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, but at length the King's Horse took to flight, and were pursued about a quarter of a mile. After that, Cromwell leaving a party of Horse to oppose the King's, in case they should rally, returned with speed to the field of battle, where his assistance was very much wanted by his friends.

The Parliament's Foot were engaged with the King's, and began to be pressed in such a manner, that they were in great disorder. Cromwell, who was returned victorious, changed the face of the battle, by charging the King's infantry in flank, who could not stand so vigorous an attack. Fairfax and Skippon, took advantage of this assistance to rally their troops, who had been roughly used at the beginning of the battle (8), and at last, the King's Foot were so routed, that there was no possibility of rallying them.

In the mean time, the Prince not being yet returned from the chase, the King was, with his reserve of Horse, unable to charge Cromwell, who was stronger than himself, and was also re-joined by the party he had left behind. As soon as Prince Rupert was returned with his victorious Horse, and had joined the reserve, the King used his utmost endeavours to persuade them to charge once more the enemy's Horse, not questioning, that if he could put them to rout, he should afterwards easily vanquish the Foot. But he could not prevail with them to make a second charge (9). This is not very strange, since it could not be done without manifest danger. Fairfax, Skippon, and Cromwell, without losing time in pursuing the King's dispersed infantry, had speedily rallied their troops. They faced the King's Horse, and prepared to receive, or to charge them. So, to renew the fight, the King must, with one single wing of Horse, and his small body of reserve, have fallen upon the enemies army, which wanted only the wing that was routed. This the Cavaliers clearly perceived, and was what hindered them from obeying the King's orders. At the same time, an accident happened, which induced them to take to flight, or furnished them with a pretence. [Robert Dalziel] Earl of Carnarworth, seeing the King, notwithstanding the unwillingness of his own troops, bent upon charging the enemies, rode up to him and said, Sir, will you go upon your death in an instant? And withal, laying hold of the King's bridle, turned his Horse to the right. The King's cavalry seeing his Majesty's Horse turned, without knowing the cause, took occasion to disband, and rode upon the spur without looking behind them. So, the King was also forced to retire, and leave his enemies ma-

entirely routed.

(1) It was Prince Rupert that advised the King to march into the North of England. The rest of his Council were for his marching into the West. See Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 501, 502.

(2) This was much spoken against by Essex's party, as a breach of the Self-denying Ordinance, and a discovery of the intentions to continue whom they pleased, and to remove others from commands, notwithstanding their former Self-denying Pretences. Whitelock, p. 145.

(3) In Buckinghamshire, held by the Livery of a Horse. Colonel Campton was Governor of it. Idem. p. 146.

(4) Lately created Lord Astley of Reading.

(5) Though Rapin quotes Rushworth, he has followed the disposition of the army, as related by Clarendon. For both Rushworth and Whitelock say, the King commanded the main body himself, Sir Jacob Astley, with the Earl of Lindsey, the right hand reserve, and the Lord Bard and Sir George Liffle the left. Rushworth, Tom. 6. p. 42. The King's forces, according to the Lord Clarendon's computation, were in all but about seven thousand four hundred men. Tom. 2. p. 506.

(6) The Reserves were brought up by Col. Rainborough, Hammond, and Pride. Rushworth, Tom. 6. p. 42.

(7) Ireton had his Horse killed under him, was run through the Thigh, wounded in the Face with a Pike, and made Prisoner, but found means to escape upon the turn of the battle. Whitelock, p. 150.

(8) Fairfax had his Helmet beat off, but however, tid up and down bare-headed. Whereupon, Colonel Charles D'Esly told him, he exposed himself to too much danger, and offered him his Helmet, but he replied by saying, It is not enough, Charles. Then he ordered him to charge a body of the King's Foot, which stood unbroken in the front, whilst he would do the same in the rear, and meet him in the middle. Which was done accordingly. In this charge Fairfax killed the English, and one of D'Esly's Troopers took the colours, bragging, he had killed the English, for which D'Esly chiding him, Fairfax said, Let him alone, I have honour enough, let him take that honour to himself. Skippon being wounded in the beginning of the fight, was desired to go off the field, but he answered, It would not stir as long as a man would stand. Whitelock, p. 151.

(9) Here the Lord Clarendon makes the following remark. This difference, says he, was observed all along in the discipline of the King's troops, and of those under Fairfax and Cromwell; that though the King's troops prevailed in the charge, they did not rally of themselves again in order, nor could be brought to make a second charge the same day. Whereas the other troops, if they prevailed, or though they were beaten, presently rallied again, and stood in good order, till they received new orders. The same thing, he says, was not observable in the forces under Essex and Waller. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 508.

sters of the field (1). All his infantry were so dispersed, that the enemies took as many prisoners as they pleased. He lost his whole train of artillery, all his bag and baggage, with his Cabinet, wherein were his most secret papers and letters, which the Parliament were so cruel, as to print and publish, particularly his letters concerning the treaty of Uxbridge, of which the reader has before seen some extracts. After this, he was never more able to bring a considerable army into the field. It is said, there were not slain on the King's side above six hundred men, but amongst them were more than one hundred and fifty officers; and besides, the enemy took above five thousand prisoners.

The King, and Prince Rupert, that same day retreated by Leicester to Ashby de la Zouch, from whence, after a few hours refreshment, they continued their march with their Horse in very great disorder to Hereford, where they parted. Prince Rupert hastened to Bristol, to prepare the city for a siege, there being great likelihood, it would quickly be attacked. The King retired into Wales, and made some stay at Ragland castle, not despairing of being able to form another army in those parts. The reason is unknown, why he was bent, contrary to all appearance, upon raising a new army in Wales, and the neighbouring Counties, instead of marching into the West with his Horse, where he had a strong body of troops, under the command of Goring and Greenvil, with which he might have long continued the war.

Mean while, Fairfax advanced towards Leicester, which surrendered by capitulation, four days after the battle of Naseby. Then, he marched with all speed to the West, where it was very necessary to lead the army, as well to relieve Taunton and the party there shut up, as to reduce to the obedience of the Parliament the western Counties, which were all for the King. At the approach of the army, Goring raised the siege of Taunton (2), and in few days was defeated by Fairfax at Langport, who killed many of his men, took twelve hundred horses, and fourteen hundred prisoners (3). This victory was followed with the taking of Bridgewater, Bath and Sherburn, after which, Fairfax laid siege to Bristol.

It was universally expected, Prince Rupert would, according to custom, perform wonders in the defence of this city, which was strongly garrisoned (4) and well stored with provisions and ammunition. Nay, the Prince himself had sent the King word, he hoped to hold out at least four months. And yet, the Parliament-army approaching the lines drawn about the place, and repelling several sallies, the Prince, upon the first summons, agreed to capitulate. Fairfax came near the lines the 23d of August, and the capitulation was signed the 10th of September, before the besiegers had approached the walls. When the King heard, Prince Rupert had surrendered Bristol in this manner, he was so enraged at it, that he ordered him by a letter to depart the Kingdom, and revoked all his commissions. The Prince published a Manifesto in vindication of his conduct. But he did not sufficiently demonstrate the necessity of surrendering so quickly a place of such importance (5).

Immediately after the taking of Bristol, Fairfax marched again to the West, as well to relieve Plymouth which was still invested (6), as to subdue all those Counties to the Parliament. But to prevent the mischief incurred by the Earl of Essex the last year, for want of an open communication with London, he ordered Cromwell, with a party of Horse, to take such places as might hinder this communication. He also detached Colonel Rainsborough to besiege Berkley Castle, the only garrison, the King had between Gloucester and Bristol. He went himself to Bath the 17th of September, where he remained till his orders were executed.

Cromwell with his party appeared before the Castle of the Devises in Wiltshire, situate in the road of traffick between London and the western Counties. The Governor [Sir Charles Lloyd] made a show of defending himself, but however capitulated on the morrow. The same day Cromwell detached Colonel Pickering, who became master of Laycock House, where was a garrison of the King's [kept by Colonel Beville]. After that, Pickering rejoined the army, as did Colonel Rainsborough, Berkley

Castle having been surrendered [by the Governour Sir Charles Lucas] upon articles.

September the 26th, the General called a council of war, where it was resolved that the army should march farther westward. But as the Prince of Wales, the King's eldest son, was in those parts with Goring's, Greenvil's, and some other troops, which all together made a considerable body, the General was apprehensive of meeting many difficulties in this expedition, and therefore thought it incumbent upon him to secure the communication with London. To that purpose, he detached Cromwell once more with orders to endeavour to take the Castle of Winchester, and then Basing house, which had been twice besieged in vain.

Cromwell, with his wonted activity, marching directly to Winchester, took the city and castle upon articles. A complaint being made by some of the garrison that they were plundered at their marching out, he caused strict inquiry to be made after the offenders, of whom six were found and condemned to die. After lots cast for their lives, he, whose lot it was, was executed; and the other five were sent to Sir Thomas Glemham Governor of Oxford, to be punished as he pleased. But the Governor sent them back with an acknowledgment of Cromwell's justice and civility.

From Winchester, Cromwell advanced to Basing, the house of the Marquis of Winchester, which he having fortified, kept garrison there for the King (7). As he refused to surrender, he was so suddenly and briskly assaulted, that the place was carried by storm, and himself taken prisoner and sent to London. After that, Cromwell took Langford House [near Salisbury] which surrendered upon articles.

In the mean time, Fairfax pursuing his march into the West, came before Tiverton. It was resolved at a council of war to storm the town: but whilst they were consulting how to order the attack, a round-shot happened to break the chain of the draw-bridge, which falling down, the soldiers, without waiting for orders, possessed themselves of the town.

After that, the army marched towards Exeter, the capital of Devonshire. But as this place was strong and well garrisoned, and the season not proper for so important a siege, it was resolved to block it up till it could be invested in form.

Whilst the General was employed in ordering the blockade, which held till December, and in building necessary forts on the east-side of the Ex, the Prince of Wales had time to assemble all the King's forces in those parts, with the militia of Cornwall, and form an army of eight thousand men. Fairfax hearing, the enemies were preparing to march against him, resolved to prevent them, by advancing towards them. He made such speed that he surprized a brigade of their Horse, commanded by the Lord Wentworth, and took between three and four hundred Horses. This obliged the King's Generals to proceed with more caution, raise the blockade of Plymouth to strengthen their army, and pass the Tamar, in order to retire into Cornwall.

The Prince's retreat into Cornwall gave Fairfax opportunity to attack Dartmouth, a Sea-port of great consequence, which he took by storm; the season not allowing him to besiege it in form.

After all these advantages, Fairfax returned to Exeter, and finished the blockade of that city. Shortly after, he left the command of it to Sir Hardress Waller, and went himself to meet the Lord Hopton, who was marching to the relief of Exeter, at the head of seven or eight thousand men. General Goring being withdrawn into France, the Prince of Wales had given the command of his army to the Lord Hopton. Fairfax approaching the enemies, heard, the Lord Hopton was intrenched in Torrington, to oblige him either to attack him thus advantageously posted, or to keep the field in a very rainy season, in a country where there were few villages to shelter his army from the weather. Fairfax having weighed the inconveniences of leaving the enemies thus intrenched, resolved to attack them. To that end, he advanced within a mile of Torrington, and possessed himself of some posts, with design

(1) Whitelock says, that on the Parliament's side were wounded and slain above a thousand Officers and common Soldiers; and that the King showed himself this day a courageous General, keeping close with his Horse, and in person engaging them to his encounter. Mem. p. 122. This battle was fought in a large fallow field, on the North-West side of Naseby, about a mile broad: there are now no signs of a fight remaining, excepting some two holes, which were the burying places of dead men and horses. This Town is said by some, to stand upon the highest ground in England. Addit. to Camden June 17, 1645. Clarendon, II. p. 437. Rushworth, VI. p. 50.

(4) The Garrison was said to be nine hundred Horse, two thousand five hundred Foot, and fifteen hundred Auxiliaries. Idem p. 167.

(5) He came afterwards to the King at Newport, to vindicate himself. See Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 554. And in Novemb. enclosed a Paper from the Parliament to go beyond sea. Whitelock, p. 128, 129.

(6) And had been in for two years. Idem p. 126.

(7) He had withstood several sieges, declaring, that if the King had no more ground in England but Basing house, he would not as he did, and had set out to the last extremity. For which reason the house was called Lloyd's. Rushworth, Tom. 6. p. 97.

1645-6, to ingage on the morrow. But in the night Hopton's troops attempting to dislodge the Parliamentarians, and these last receiving assistance from the army, the battle began infernally, and held almost the whole night. In short, after a long conflict in the dark, the Lord Hopton's intrenchments were forced, and himself obliged to retire with his Horse, and only four or five hundred of the four thousand Foot, he had before the battle. Thus all his infantry were slain or taken, or so dispersed, that it was not possible for those that escaped to rejoin their General, who was retired into Cornwall (1).

After this fresh victory, Fairfax judged, his main business was, utterly to destroy the enemies Horse that escaped from Torrington, consisting of three thousand, and to hinder them from joining the King. Instead therefore of returning to Exeter, he resolved to march into Cornwall with his whole army. He set out the 23d of February, and seizing the passes of the river Tamar, left there strong guards, as also in all places where he thought the enemies might try to pass, in case they intended, as was very likely, to join the King. The Lord Hopton finding, Fairfax was advancing towards him, and not being able to fight him, quitted Bodmin, where he had posted himself, and retired farther westward. Mean while, Fairfax still advanced, taking all possible care to guard all the passes by which the enemy might escape him.

The approach of the Parliament-army caused the Prince of Wales to resolve to secure his person by retiring into Scilly, where he safely arrived (2). Mean while, the Lord Hopton was extremely embarrassed, and the more, as the people of the county who before were devoted to the King, began to alter their minds, and even voluntarily offered themselves to General Fairfax, to block up the passes, and hinder the King's forces from escaping. At last, the Parliament-army approaching Truro, where Hopton had his headquarters, Fairfax sent and offered him honorable terms if he would capitulate. Whilst he waited for an answer, he still advanced towards the enemies, and beating up one of their quarters, took three hundred Horses. In short, not to descend to unnecessary particulars, I shall content my self with briefly saying, that the Lord Hopton seeing himself surrounded on all sides, and despairing to escape, agreed to capitulate. By the treaty, signed the 14th of March, it was agreed, that all the forces under the command of the Lord Hopton, should [within fix days] be disbanded, with leave to go beyond sea, or to their homes. That all the horses and arms should be delivered to General Fairfax, and upon performance thereof, each trooper should receive twenty shillings, or his horse. That passes should be given to such as desired to go beyond sea, upon their promising not to bear arms any more against the Parliament of England (3). There were several other articles, which it is needless to specify, as they concerned only the manner how the treaty was to be executed (4). The Lords Hopton and Culpepper retired to Scilly before the treaty was signed. Thus the King's army in the West was entirely dispersed. After this, Fairfax returns before Exeter, which was surrendered upon articles the 9th of April 1645. With the taking of this city, Fairfax ended his western expedition, which could not be more glorious to him, or more advantageous to the Parliament, since the King had neither towns nor forces left in the County.

It is time now to see what passed in the rest of the Kingdom, whilst the Parliament-army was employed in reducing the western counties.

The Scotch army having taken Newcastle in October 1644, divided themselves into two bodies, one whereof besieged Carlisle, which surrendered upon articles in June 1645.

The other part of the army durst not ingage in a siege, because the Marquiss of Montrose, who served the King in Scotland, having had great success there, it was to be feared, the King would think of sending him reinforcements. Wherefore the Scots always kept in a readiness to oppose it. This became still more necessary after the battle of Nasby, there being great likelihood of the King's resolving to join the Earl of Montrose with his cavalry. Besides, the Scots by keeping thus in the middle of the Kingdom, prevented the King from making new levies in those parts. At last, after the taking of Carlisle, the two bodies being re-joined, they besieged Hereford about the end of July. But after having in vain carried on the siege above a month, they raised it in the beginning of September. The Earl of Leven their General published, on this occasion, a sort of Apology, wherein, among other things, he said, that for six or seven months past, they had received but one month's pay. That they had been promised to be supplied with all things necessary for a siege; in which they had been extremely disappointed, since they had received but three pieces of cannon, with fifty Ball to each; that they had but few horse, and being informed the King was marching towards them with three thousand horse, it was impossible to continue the siege. Lastly, that General Lesley was obliged to go into Scotland with his whole party of Horse and Dragoons, to oppose Montrose.

After the siege of Hereford was raised, the Scotch army retired into Yorkshire, complaining pretty openly of being entirely neglected. Whereupon, the Parliament assigned them thirty thousand pounds, provided they appeared before Newark [upon the first of November,] and ordered that the eastern association should pay them fourteen hundred pounds a week. The Scots agreeing to these terms, the siege of Newark was begun about the end of October 1645, and lasted till May 1646.

In July, Ponfret Castle was surrendered to the Parliament, and four days after, that of Scarborough capitulated also, having maintained a long siege [under Sir Hugh Cholmley] in which Sir John Meldrum was killed.

I left the King in Wales after the battle of Nasby, where he was employed in seeking means to raise a new army. As to the disposing of his person, it was hardly possible for him to come to any resolution, before he knew what his enemies intended to do after their victory. But when he saw General Fairfax, with his army, ingaged in the western Counties, he departed from his retreat with his cavalry, consisting of three thousand horse. As the Parliament had but very few forces in the midland parts, the King came without danger to Lichfield, and from thence, entering the associated eastern Counties, took Huntington, where he met with a great booty, after which he came to Oxford (5). From thence he departed in three days, taking with him what forces could be spared, and marched to Camden.

The Parliament, thinking the King's design was to relieve either Bristol or Hereford, which were both besieged at the same time, gave orders to Major-General Pointz and Colonel Roffiter to assemble what forces they could, and diligently attend the King's motions. Accordingly they drew together about two thousand Horse, and posted themselves between the King and Oxford. But at the same time, the Scots having raised the siege of Hereford of their own accord, the King marched thither, where he continued till the 20th of September. Here he received the news of the surrender of Bristol.

About the same time, Colonel Jones, with Adjutant-General Louthian, who served the Parliament, besieging Beefton Castle, drew off thence on a sudden a party of thirteen hundred men, and went to surprise Chester, in which they partly succeeded. But as they had not sufficient forces to become masters of the rest of the City, they were content to keep what they had got, expecting Sir William Brereton, who was to bring them a supply. As the King then expected a body of troops from Ireland, which could land but at Chester, this City was of so great consequence to him, that he immediately marched to dislodge the enemies from that part, they had in their power. He was no sooner on his march, but Poyntz closely followed him, and overtook him [on Roston beach] within two miles of Chester, which obliged him to turn against his pursuers. The fight at first was pretty obstinate, but as the King had five thousand, and Poyntz only two thousand, men, Poyntz was briskly repulsed, and put into great disorder. Mean while, just as the King thought himself entirely victorious, Jones and Louthian came from Chester with eight hundred men, and falling upon the King's rear, forced them to turn against them. This gave Poyntz time to rally his men, and then charge the King's army, who finding themselves at once attacked before and behind, were at last utterly routed, with loss of six hundred men, and a thousand prisoners. [Bernard Stewart] Earl of Lichfield, and some other officers of quality were killed. It was with great difficulty that the King, with the remains of his army got into [Denbigh Castle in] Wales, where he continued some time; after which, with a party of about three thousand men, he came to Newark in Nottinghamshire.

(1) There were not above five hundred slain, the greatest part were dispersed.

(2) The King his Father, by two Letters dated November 7, and December 7, ordered him, as soon as he should find himself in a probable danger of falling into the enemy's hands, to retire into Denmark, or some other place beyond Sea. See Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 546, 547. The Prince, on April 16, 1646, embarked for Jersey, where he landed the next day, and from thence passed into France. Ibid. Tom. 3. p. 3, 4.

(3) Those that lay in England, as well Foreigners as others, were to bind themselves for ever not to take arms against the Parliament. Rushworth, Tom. 6. p. 114.

(4) Colonel Fremant, then with his Regiment at Paris, sent to desire to be included in the Treaty, as did also the Governor of St. Mary's Castle, that commands Falmouth Haven. Rushworth, Tom. 6. p. 108.

(5) Whose day before died the Lord-Keeper Littleton. Ibid. p. 116.

Among the colours were taken the Lord Hopton's own, with this Motto, I 1645-6. He layed in that town, till fearing to be besieged by the Scots, who were approaching, he went away by night, and safely arrived at Oxford the 6th of November, there being no other remedy left than to make a peace with the Parliament.

But this peace was not easy to be made. The King would have willingly granted, in the present situation of his affairs, something of what he had before refused, but did not care to yield all. The Parliament, on their side, were willing to make peace, like Conquerors, and by aggravating the terms instead of rendering them more tolerable.

Mean while, notwithstanding the difficulties which were naturally to occur in the conclusion of a peace, the King's friends at London made him hope, that the diffentions between the Presbyterians and Independents might turn to his advantage. It was intimated to him, that the Presbyterians were enraged to see the Independent party daily increase in number and strength, and that it was not doubted, but if he could obtain leave to come and treat in person with the two Houses, the Presbyterian Members would find means to conclude a peace, in order to be freed from the yoke of the Independents: That the City of London was almost wholly Presbyterian; that the King had there also many friends, and if the Parliament expressed an inclination to peace, which was very likely, it would not be in the power of the Independents to prevent the conclusion. This was all very well; but they should have first explained what was to be understood by the word Peace. Very probably, the Parliament, or Presbyterian Party, which still prevailed, would have very gladly consented to a Peace, if the King had been willing to grant two points, which were considered by them as absolutely necessary, namely, the abolition of Episcopacy, and sufficient security for the performance of his promises. For in these two points consisted the Parliament's scheme for a peace. But this was not the King's scheme. He ever meant that such a peace should be made as he desired, and which I have often explained. It is true, that in his present circumstances he was willing, with regard to the security, to grant something more than what he had yet offered; but nothing could prevail with him to consent to the abolition of Episcopacy. So, by ever preserving the ambiguity in the term Peace, he imagined, if he could obtain liberty to come and treat at London with the two Houses, it would not be impracticable, with the help of his friends, to force the Parliament to make peace with him, in his sense of the word, though nothing was further from the intention of both Houses.

In this belief, the 5th of December, he demanded of the two Houses a safe-conduct for the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Southampton, John Ashburnham, and Jeffery Palmer Esquires, who were to bring propositions for a peace.

The 15th of the same month he renewed his demand, complaining of his having received no answer.

The 26th he sent them a third message, wherein he said:

"That conceiving the former treaties had hitherto proved ineffectual, chiefly for want of power in those persons that treated, as likewise, because those from whom their power was derived, could not give so clear a judgment as was requisite; if therefore he might have the engagement of the two Houses at Westminster, the commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, the Mayor, Aldermen, Common-Council, and Militia of London; of the chief commanders in Sir Thomas Fairfax's army, as also of those in the Scots army, for his free and safe coming to, and abode in London or Westminster for the space of forty days; he would come and have a personal treaty with the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and the commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, upon all matters which might conduce to the restoring of peace and happiness to his Kingdoms.

"He declared beforehand, that he was willing to commit the great trust of the Militia, for such time, and with such powers, as were expressed in the paper delivered by his commissioners at Uxbridge, to thirty persons he named. But if this did not satisfy the Parliament, then he offered to name the one half, and leave the other to the election of the two Houses."

Before the two Houses received this last message, they had sent the following answer to the two first:

"That finding that former treaties had been made use of for other ends, under the pretence of peace, and had proved dilatory and unsuccessful, they could not give way to a safe-conduct, according to his Majesty's desire. But both Houses of the Parliament of England, having under their considerations, propositions and bills for the settling of a safe and well-grounded peace, which were speedily to be communicated to the commissioners of the Kingdom of Scotland, did resolve, after mutual agreement of both Kingdoms, to present them with all speed to his Majesty."

The King replied, the 29th of December. He complained, that a safe-conduct was denied for the persons he intended to send. He insisted upon his demand of a personal treaty, and desired an answer to his message of the 26th. He said, he should never have thought of coming to London, if it was not his sincere intention to make peace.

The 15th of January 1645-6, he sent another message to both Houses, wherein he complained of not having an answer: he said, "That what he earnestly desired was peace, and the means, his personal presence at Westminster; where the government of the Church being settled as it was in the times of Queen Elizabeth, and King James, and full liberty for the ease of their consciences, who would not communicate in that service established by law, and likewise for the free and publick use of the Directory, to such as should desire to use the same; and all forces being agreed to be disbanded, his Majesty would then forthwith join with his two Houses of Parliament, in settling some way, for the payment of the publick debts to his Scotch Subjects, the city of London, and others. And having proposed a fair way for the settling of the Militia, he would endeavour, upon debate with his two Houses, so to dispose of it, as likewise of the business of Ireland, as might give them and both Kingdoms satisfaction. Not doubting also, but to give good contentment to his two Houses of Parliament in the choice of the Lord-Admiral, the officers of State, and others."

The 15th of January 1645-6, two days before the date of the last message, both Houses had returned an answer to that of the 29th of December.

"That there had been a great deal of innocent blood of his Subjects shed in the war, by his Majesty's commands and commissions.

"That there had been Irish rebels brought over into both Kingdoms, and endeavours to bring over more, as also forces from foreign parts.

"That his Majesty was in arms in those parts, and the Prince at the head of an army in the West; there were also forces in Scotland against that Parliament and Kingdom, by his commission; and the war in Ireland was fomented and prolonged by his Majesty.

"That until satisfaction and security was first given to both Kingdoms, his Majesty's coming to the Parliament could not be convenient, nor by them assented unto.

"That they could not apprehend it a means conducing to peace, that his Majesty should come to his Parliament for a few days, with any thoughts of leaving it, especially with intentions of returning to hostility against it.

"That his Majesty desired the engagement not only of his Parliaments, but of the Lord-Mayor of London, &c. which was against the privileges and honour of the Parliaments, those being joined with them, who were subject, and subordinate to their authority.

"That the only way for the obtaining an happy and well-grounded peace, was, for his Majesty to give his assent to those propositions that should be sent to him.

"That there was not so much as any mention of Scotland."

The King, in a reply to this answer, greatly complained of the assertions cast upon him by both Houses, and reproached them in his turn. He insisted upon an answer to his message of the 15th of December, saying, "No rational man could think their last paper, to be any answer to his former demands."

But the 24th of the same month, he sent a farther reply to every particular article of that answer. The substance whereof was:

1. That a great deal of innocent Blood had been spilt.

That is the very reason why he presseth that there should be no more (1).

REMARK (1.) The meaning of this objection of both Houses was, that there having been a great deal of blood spilt in the war, it was reasonable the authors thereof should be punished, and that the King continuing to protect them, it was necessary to prosecute the war till he should be obliged to deliver them to justice. So, the King's general reply upon this article answered not the objection.

2. That he had caused some Irish to repair to his assistance. He answered, that those whom they called Irish, were indeed (for the most part) such English Protestants as had been formerly sent into Ireland by the two Houses, and unable to stay there any longer, by the neglect of those that sent them thither, who should have better provided for them (2).

1645-6. Irish forces, the King had sent for from Ireland. The two Houses were far from giving these soldiers the name of Irish. But they meant the Irish Papists entertained by the King in his army, and particularly ten thousand men which the Earl of Glamorgan was to bring over. The King feigned not to understand the two Houses, and made an evasive answer to this objection.

5. That the Prince was at the head of an army. The King answered, it was no great wonder, since there was yet no peace.

6. That he desired to come to his Parliament but for a few days. He answered by protesting, that he sought that treaty to avoid future hostility, and procure a lasting peace (3).

REM. (3). The Parliament did not question it: But they thought the King would come to London only to compel, by means of his friends, both Houses to make such a peace as he desired. So, this general answer was not capable of given them satisfaction.

5. That the engagements which his Majesty had desired for his security, were a breach of Privilege. The King answered, that whosoever should call to mind the particular occasions that enforced him to leave the city of London and Westminster, would judge his demand very reasonable and necessary for his safety. But he no way conceived how the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, &c. of London, were either subject or subordinate to the authority of the two Houses.

6. That he had made no mention of Scotland. He answered, it was included in his former, and had been particularly mentioned in his latter, message of the 15th.

Lastly, He desired a positive answer to his former message.

The 29th of January, the King sent another message to both Houses, wherein he expressly disavowed the Earl of Glamorgan, concerning the treaty with the Irish rebels. And said, "That that Earl having made offer unto him to raise forces in the Kingdom of Ireland, and to conduct them into England for his Majesty's service, he had granted him a commission to that purpose, and to that purpose only: But that he had no commission at all to treat of any thing else, without the privy and directions of the Lord-Lieutenant. And this clearly appeared by the Lord-Lieutenant's proceedings with the said Earl, who had orders to call him to an account (1).

REM. (4). The disguise used by the King on this occasion will manifestly appear in what will be said presently concerning this treaty.

The King added, "That if the two Houses would admit of his repair to London for a personal treaty, speedy notice should be given him thereof, and a safe-conduct with a blank sent for a messenger to be immediately dispatched into Ireland, to stop the conclusion of the peace, the Lord-Lieutenant being empowered to treat and conclude it.

"That he would leave the Management of the business of Ireland wholly to the two Houses, and make no peace there but with their consent, in case his endeavours in the treaty should be blessed with success.

"That if his personal repair to London should be admitted, and a peace thereon ensue, he would then leave the nomination of the persons to be intrusted with the Militia, wholly to his two Houses, with such power and limitations as were expressed in the Paper delivered by his Majesty's commissioners at Usbridge the 6th of February 1644-5.

"That if the peace succeeded, he would be content, that pro hac vice, the two Houses should nominate the Admiral, Officers of State, and Judges, to hold their places during life, or Quamdiu se bene gesserint, to be accountable to none but the King and the two Houses of Parliament.

"That as for matter of Religion, he intended, that all Protestants should have the free exercise of their Religion according to their own way.

"That upon the conclusion of peace there should be a general Act of Oblivion and free-pardon.

"And this to extend to Scotland.

The King had never made such advances before, and yet all his endeavours to obtain a safe-conduct were fruitless. The two Houses were so persuaded of his ability in the choice of his expressions, which were commonly ambiguous, and capable of a different sense from what appeared at first sight, that they could not resolve to treat with him upon his own propositions. Besides, they did not doubt, but the overture of a personal treaty was designed for a snare to force them to such a peace as he desired. They sent therefore to his several messages no other answer than what has been seen. So, this sort of negotiation, of which the King expected a happy event, only left things just as they were.

Both Houses, as we have seen, reproached the King, that he was now endeavouring to bring Irish troops into England; the King did not disown it, but denied the giving of the Earl of Glamorgan power to treat with the rebels upon any other Article. This was literally true, but the King took care not to discover the whole extent of this Article, and yet both Houses were perfectly informed of it, as will hereafter appear. To understand fully the objection and answer, it will be necessary to relate what passed in Ireland upon this subject. This is not one of the least curious points of the reign of Charles I., tho' the Lord Clarendon has thought fit to pass it over in silence.

The cessation made by the King with the Irish rebels, had not entirely suspended hostilities in that Island. [Munster O'Brien] Lord Inchiquin, who commanded in Munster for the Parliament, and Major-General Monroe, who was at the head of the Scots in Ulster, had refused to accept of the cessation (1). On the other hand, the English forces drawn by the King out of Ireland, had been entirely ruined and dispersed in England. Thus the King had reaped no advantage by the cessation, the motive, whereof he had concealed with all possible care. He had pretended, he was indispensably obliged to conclude it, in order to save the English from the utter destruction they were threatened with, by the superiority of the rebels, and the Parliament's neglect to send supplies into Ireland. But when these English troops were seen to come into England, it was easy to perceive the true reason of the cessation.

The King not having reaped from this artifice all the advantage he expected, desisted not from the design of making use of the assistance of the Irish, to continue the war against the Parliament. On the contrary, he formed the project of a peace with the rebels, in order to employ, not only the rest of the English troops still in Ireland, but also a good body of Irish, whom he intended to send for into England. He ordered therefore the Marquis of Ormond, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, to negotiate this peace, wherein however difficulties seemingly insurmountable occurred. To make peace with the Irish, they were necessarily to be satisfied in point of Religion. But this the King could not do without running-counter to all his protestations concerning his great zeal for the Protestant Religion, and without confirming in some measure, the suspicions of those who believed he was concerned in the Irish rebellion. In a word, he could not take this step, without relinquishing the interest of the Irish Protestants, and giving the Catholics such advantages, as would render them very superior to the Protestants. The interests of England were also to be abandoned, and the dominion he had always enjoyed over Ireland, since the conquest of that Kingdom, was in great measure to be forfeited. Nay, he was in danger by such a proceeding to lose many friends in England. Those who were sincerely attached to him, and persuaded, that he acted upon motives of justice and religion, must have opened their eyes, when they saw him manifestly betray the interest of England, and the Protestant Religion, if he had concluded with the Irish such a peace as they demanded. There were great difficulties which could be surmounted but by one of these ways; either by persuading the Irish to rely on his general promises, that he would content them at a better juncture, and when it was more in his power; or else, by colouring with some specious pretence, the favours he should be obliged to grant them for a peace. As to the first way, the King forgot nothing that he believed apt to induce the Irish to trust to his promises, and herein the Marquis of Ormond was long employed without any effect. The Irish were immovable, and would not be contented with bare words. The second way was still more impracticable: For what colour could be put upon an entire relinquishing of the interests of Religion and England?

Mean while, as the King hoped, that with the succours from Ireland, he should be able to give law to the Parliament, and then, be obliged to use no farther ceremony; he resolved not to deprive himself of such an advantage, but to grant the Irish whatever they demanded. However, to avoid the prejudice such a proceeding might create him in England, he chose to conclude a private peace with the Irish, without solemnity, or the intervention of the Lord-Lieutenant, and to bind himself to have it effectually executed, till it should be in his power to ratify it solemnly, with which the Irish were content.

To this purpose, whilst the Marquis of Ormond was seemingly labouring with great earnestness to make a peace with the rebels, by trying to persuade them to desist from part of their demands, [Edward Somerset] Earl of Glamor- gan, authorized by the King, was treating secretly, and more effectually with them. He granted them, on the King's behalf, all their demands, on condition they would furnish him with ten thousand men, who should pass into England, under the command of the same Earl of Glamorgan. But as this Lord's bare promise was not a sufficient security for the Irish, the King sent him full Powers, the tenour whereof was as follows :

CHARLES R.

"CHARLES by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To our trusty, and right well-beloved cousin, Edward Earl of Glamorgan, greeting. We, reposing great and especial trust and confidence in your approved wisdom, and fidelity, do by these (as firmly as under our Great-Seal, to all intents and purposes) authorize, and give you power, to treat and conclude, with the confederate Roman Catholics in our Kingdom of Ireland, if upon necessity any be to be confederated unto, wherein our Lieutenant cannot so well be seen in, as not fit for us at the present publicly to own : Therefore we charge you to proceed according to this warrant, with all possible secrecy ; and for whatsoever you shall engage your self, upon such valuable considerations, as you in your judgment shall deem fit, we promise, on the word of a King, and a Christian, to ratify and perform the same that shall be granted by you, and under your hand and seal ; the said confederate Catholics, having by their supplies, testified their zeal to our service. And this shall be, in each particular to you, a sufficient war-

Given at our Court at Oxford, under our Signet, and Royal Signature, the 12th day of March, in the 11th year of our reign 1644.

The date of this warrant is remarkable, for it was at a time when the King's affairs did not seem absolutely to require his employing the Irish Catholics. In the foregoing campaign, he had gained a signal advantage over the Earl of Essex, with all the western Counties. He had fought a battle at Newbury, which had not procured his enemies any real advantage, and on the contrary, had shown in the affair of Dennington, that he believed to have no reason to fear them. It was just after the treaty of Uxbridge, where he did not think himself under a necessity of making any concessions. In a word, it was at a time when the Parliament, by reason of the ill success of their arms, were labouring to new-model their army. It cannot therefore be said, that the King was driven by despair, to make use of the assistance of the Irish. It is rather very easy to perceive, it was solely to increase the superiority he then had over the Parliament.

By virtue of this warrant, the Earl of Glamorgan concluded a treaty with the popish Bishops, concerning the Clergy-livings. This was a preliminary treaty, upon which the Bishops made the following Instrument :

"Whereas in these articles touching the Clergy-livings, the right honourable the Earl of Glamorgan, is obliged in his Majesty's behalf, to secure the concessions in these articles by act of Parliament : We holding that manner of securing those grants, as to the Clergy-livings, to prove more difficult and prejudicial to his Majesty, than by doing thereof, and securing those concessions otherwise, as to the said livings, the said Earl undertaking and promising, in the behalf of his Majesty, his heirs, and successors, as hereby he doth undertake to settle the said concessions, and secure them to the Clergy, and their respective successors, in another secure way, other than by Parliament, at present, till a fit opportunity be offered for securing the same, do agree, and condescend thereunto : And this Instrument by his Lordship signed, was before the perfecting thereof intended to that purpose, as to the said livings, to which purpose we mutually signed this indorsement : And it is further intended, that the Catholic Clergy shall not be interrupted by Parliament, or otherwise, as to the said livings, contrary to the meaning of these articles."

GLAMORGAN.

The Earl of Glamorgan added also the following protestation or oath :

"I Edward Earl of Glamorgan do protest, and swear, faithfully to acquaint the King's most excellent Majesty with the proceedings of this Kingdom, in order to his service, and to the endearment of this nation, and punctual performance of what I have (as authorized by his Majesty) obliged my self to see performed ; and in default, not to permit the army intrusted to my charge to adventure it self, or any considerable part thereof, until

"conditions from his Majesty, and by his Majesty be permitted." 1645-6.

GLAMORGAN.

The Substance of the Treaty between the Earl of Glamorgan, and the Confederate Irish Catholics.

IT was said in the beginning of the treaty, that much time had been spent in meetings and debates betwixt James Marquis of Ormond Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the Commissioners of the Catholick Council of Kilkenny, for the treating and concluding of a peace ; and thereupon many difficulties arising, the Earl of Glamorgan was entrusted and authorized by his Majesty, to grant and assure to the said confederate Catholics, further grace and favours, which the said Lord-Lieutenant had not as yet, in that latitude as they expected, granted unto them ; In pursuance therefore of his Majesty's authority, under his signature royal and signet, bearing date at Oxon the 12th day of March, in the 20th year of his Majesty's Reign.—"It is accorded and agreed between the said Earl of Glamorgan, for and on the behalf of his Majesty, and Richard Lord Viscount Montgarret President of the supreme Council at Kilkenny, Donough Lord Viscount Muckerry, &c. Commissioners appointed by the Confederate Roman Catholics :

"I. That all the professors of the Roman Catholick Religion in Ireland shall enjoy the free and publick use and exercise of their Religion.

"II. That they shall hold and enjoy all the Churches by them enjoyed within that Kingdom, or by them possessed at any time since the 23d of October 1641, and all other Churches in the said Kingdom, other than such as are now actually enjoyed by his Majesty's Protestant Subjects.

"III. That all the Roman Catholics shall be exempted from the jurisdiction of the Protestant Clergy, and that the Roman Catholick Clergy shall not be punished or molested, for the exercise of their jurisdiction over their respective Catholick flocks.

"IV. That the following Act shall be passed in the next Parliament to be holden in Ireland. [Here is inserted the form of an Act for securing all the King's concessions to the Catholics.]

"V. That the Marquis of Ormond, or any others, shall not disturb the professors of the Roman Catholick Religion in the possession of the articles above specified.

"VI. The Earl of Glamorgan engages his Majesty's word for the performance of these articles.

"VII. The publick faith of the Kingdom shall be engaged unto the said Earl by the Commissioners of the Confederate Catholics, for sending ten thousand men by order of the General Assembly at Kilkenny, armed with the one half with Muskets, and the other half with Pikes, to serve his Majesty in England, Wales, or Scotland, under the command of the Earl of Glamorgan."

Signed the 25th of August 1645.

Moreover, the Irish Commissioners engaged their word and the faith of the supreme Council of Kilkenny, that two thirds of the Clergy's revenues should be employed for the space of three years, towards the maintenance of the ten thousand men, the other third being reserved for the Clergy's subsistence.

This Treaty, though made very secretly, was however discovered by an extraordinary accident. The Archbishop of Tuam, President of Connaught, going into Ulster about some affairs, met with a body of Irish troops marching to besiege Sligo, and joined with them, whether for security's sake or some other design (1). When they came near Sligo, the Garrison made a Sally, charged the troops that were come to besiege them, utterly routed them, and killed the Archbishop of Tuam. In his pockets it was that authentick copies, attested and signed by several Bishops, were found, of the fore-mentioned treaty, and of the King's warrant to the Earl of Glamorgan, which were sent to the Parliament.

The Marquis of Ormond, the Lord Digby then in Ireland, and some others having soon heard that the secret was discovered, found no better expedient to clear the King, than to arrest the Earl of Glamorgan, for having, in a presumptuous manner, worthy of severe punishment exceeded his orders, and concluded a treaty with the Irish. This is what the King also insinuated in his message to both Houses of the 19th of January 1645-6.

Rushworth has inserted in his Collections two intercepted letters of the Earl of Glamorgan, one to his Countess dated in January, acquainting her that his imprisonment did not give him much uneasiness. In the other of the 26th of February, directed to the King, he told him, that he was 1645-6. at Waterford providing shipping to transport six thousand Foot immediately, and that four thousand more were to follow them by May (1). These troops came not however into England, probably by reason of the change in the King's affairs, which were in a melancholy situation after the battle of Naseby. All his towns were taken one after another. The Scots were now before Newark, and General Fairfax having reduced all the West to the obedience of the Parliament, was preparing to besiege the King in Oxford.

The Court of France sent Montreuil into England, on pretence of procuring a peace between the King and the Parliament: But their real intention was, that Montreuil should endeavour a private agreement between the King and the Scots (2).

This could not be done without the King's entirely forsaking the Bishops, and consenting to the establishment of the Presbyterian Government in the Church of England. The Court of France and the Queen of England hoped, this project would succeed the more easily, as it was agreeable to good policy, and the King's interests. The King would thereby have gained not only the Scots, who had a strong army in England, but also the City of London, and the majority of the Members of Parliament, who, for the most part, insisted upon the other points in dispute, only to obtain this the more easily. This was properly the sole means of balancing or surmounting the great power of the Independents, who were in a manner masters of the army. If the King had taken this course, it is very evident, it would have turned greatly to his advantage: whereas, at the time it was proposed to him, he was entirely without remedy. But his zeal for Episcopacy would not suffer him to accept of such an overture, and he told Montreuil, he would never consent to it. About the same time the Queen sent Sir William Davenant to persuade the King to join with the Presbyterians, as the only means to free himself from his sad condition. The moment Davenant offered to speak to him, he commanded him to hold his tongue, and never more appear in his presence.

Mean while, Montreuil at his arrival in England being possessed with the notion, that the King would not refuse the course, which was to be proposed to him, had made some overtures to the Scotch Commissioners residing in London, and found them inclinable to treat with the King: but after he had spoke and writ to his Majesty several times, he found him immovable. The Scots, on their part, being no less inflexible, constantly refused to promise the King any assistance, unless he consented to the abolition of Episcopacy (3).

Whilst this affair was delayed by this difficulty, and Montreuil gone to the Scotch army before Newark, to try to find some medium favorable to the King, Fairfax was advancing with his army, so that the King was in danger of being inclosed in Oxford. The King's principal concern then was to deliver himself from this imminent danger. Though he had till that time demurred upon going to the Scotch army, on account of the fore-mentioned difficulty, he saw however no other remedy when the danger approached. The Scotch Officers had made him some general promises, founded probably upon their hopes of his consenting at last to their demands. He sent them word of his intention to come to their army, and they promised to receive him and provide for his safety. He had not time, doubtless, to make a more particular treaty. At least, it is not known to this day upon what terms the King put himself into the hands of the Scots, and on what conditions they received him. However this be, the King having no time to lose, that he might not be inclosed in Oxford, departed privately and came to the Scotch army, the 5th of May, 1646 (4).

1646. The King had, on the 13th of April, imparted by letter to the Marquis of Ormond his design to throw himself into the arms of the Scots, in these words: Having lately received very good security that we and all that do or shall adhere to us, shall be safe in our persons, honours and consciences in the Scotch army; and that they shall really and effectually join with us, and with such as will come in to us, and shall employ their armies and forces to assist us to the procuring of a happy and well grounded Peace. If it shall please God that we come safe thither, we are resolved to use our best endeavour, with their assistance, and with the conjunction of the forces under the Marquis of Montrose, and such of our well-affected Subjects of England as shall arise for us to procure, if it may be, an honorable and speedy Peace.

The Marquis of Ormond sent a copy of this letter to General Munroe, who commanded the Scotch troops in Ireland, and Munroe communicated the same to the commissioners of the Parliament in Uxler, by whom copies of the letter, as printed at Dublin, were sent over to both Houses, and it was read in the House of Commons on Saturday June the 9th. Whereupon, on the Monday following, the Scotch commissioners delivered a declaration to the House of Peers, positively denying, that their army had made any treaty with the King to assist him. Thus we see on one side, the King affirming he had received very good security that the Scots would declare for him; and on the other, the commissioners of Scotland denying that their army had made any treaty with the King to assist him.

In all probability the Scotch commissioners and the general Officers of their army had given Montreuil hopes, they would declare for the King, but on condition he would renounce Episcopacy; without which condition, it is not easy to conceive, that the commissioners or officers should have made such a promise, which was not in their power; since they could not engage contrary to the express tenor of the Covenant, and without positive orders from those who governed Scotland. Wherefore it could only be hopes, and those conditional, that the King preposterously took for assurances, and which Montreuil, perhaps, confounded as well as he. It is true, the Earl of Clarendon cites a Paper signed by Montreuil, wherein he says, I do promise in the name of the King and Queen (my Master and Mistress) and by virtue of the powers I have from their Majesties. That if the King of Great-Britain shall put himself into the Scotch army, he shall be there received as their natural Sovereign, and shall be with them in all freedom of his conscience and honour. And that the Scots shall employ their armies and forces to assist his Majesty in the recovery of his just Rights, &c.

But it must be observed, there is not in this Paper a single word to show that Montreuil was impowered to make this promise, either by the Commissioners, or the General Officers, or the Parliament of Scotland: Nay, it does not so much as appear that he was accepted for mediator in this affair; that besides, he could not engage the authority of the King of France and the Queen-Regent to make such a promise, unless he was furnished with a treaty, which however has never appeared. The Lord Clarendon intimates that Montreuil had the word of the principal Officers of the Scotch army, but that afterwards finding them grown cold, he writ to the King to dissuade him from venturing his person among them. Indeed it is hard to conceive, that Montreuil should sign such a promise without being authorized. But on the other hand, is it likely that, if he had been authorized by a treaty, or other warrant, he would not have mentioned it in his Paper?

But what seems still more impossible, is, that the Scots should promise without condition, as this engagement intimates, contrary to the tenor of the Covenant between the two nations, since the King would not so much as hear of the abolition of Episcopacy. There must therefore have been some mistake in the negotiation carried on by Montreuil's mediation, and the King and mediator must have taken, for positive assurances, promises which were conditional only, as appears in the King's letter to the Marquis of Ormond, and the solemn denial of the Scots. However this be, Montreuil was recalled and disgraced, and, as there is reason to believe, it was for engaging

(1) This Letter to the King, with the Lord D'Elby's Narrative of his proceedings against the Earl of Clarendon, &c. came to the Parliament's hands in the following manner: Whilst Fairfax was in Corwall hunting in the Lane Hoggs, a Ship came into Portsmouth from Ireland, not doubting but to have been well received; whereas the Town's people, with the help of some Parliament Dragoons, seized and boarded her. The Captain, one Alvaret Usterson, had thrown a Packet of Letters over-board, which were found floating on the water, and carried to Fairfax, who found, amongst others, the Letter and Narrative above-mentioned. These Letters being showed and read to the people of the Country, who were summoned to appear on the Day by Richard Worth, Tom. 6. p. 104.

(2) The Lord Clarendon affirms, that the Scots were under terrible apprehensions of being disappointed of all their hopes, by the prevalence of the Independent army, and therefore wished for nothing more, than an opportunity to make a firm conjunction with the King. Tom. 2. p. 579.

(3) The Scots produced a writing signed by the Queen, wherein were such expressions, as did not please the King, and made him look upon that Negotiation, as rather a Conspiracy against the Church, between the Catholics and Presbyterians, than as an expedient for his restoration or preservation. Clarendon, Tom. 2. p. 579.

(4) According to the Lord Clarendon, the King was not resolved, when he left Oxford, whether he should go to London or the Scotch army. He Lays, the King went away the 27th of April, attended only by John Alpharham Groom of his Bed-chamber, and one Mr. Hudson a Divine, who understood the ways. It was nine days after his leaving Oxford before it was known where the King was. It seems, the King had waited that time in several places, partly to be informed of the condition of the Marquis of Montrose, and to find a secure passage to get to him, which he exceedingly desired. Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 17. — Hudson, upon his examination, said, That the King crossed the Country, was at Woking, Brentford, and Harrow on the Hill, where he stayed some time, and was almost persuaded to come to London; and then he went to St. Albans, and in to Hardenburgh in Yorkshire, where he found the Agent who was to have met him with some Horse, to conduct him to the Scots army, but came not; from thence the King went to Stamford, where he found the Agent and from thence to Drumhead in Northamptonshire, where he layed at a petty Ale house, from April 30, to May 3; that he palia measures by the time of Richard Trotter, sometimes Doctor, and sometimes as Alpharham's Servant. Whitebook, p. 209. Rushworth, Tom. 6. p. 167. Itinerary, p. 97.

1646. ards, charges, and sufferings. They also said, since his Majesty had not agreed to the propositions presented to him, it was necessary to consult with them what was to be done, as well concerning the King's person, as the peace and safety of the two Kingdoms. Both Houses returned them thanks, and appointed a committee to examine their accounts.

Some days after, they delivered in an account of arrears, amounting to two millions. The Parliament disputed several articles, and deducted such sums as the Scots had received. The Scots allowed the justice of some of these deductions, but could not agree to others (1). At last, after many debates, the Scots offered to accept of a sum in gross, for a full discharge of their arrears. Whereupon they were asked, what sum they demanded, and at first they insisted upon five hundred thousand pounds. The House of Commons offered two hundred, and afterwards three hundred, thousand pounds. At length, the Scots abating one hundred thousand pounds of their demand, it was agreed to allow them four hundred thousand, one half to be paid upon their removal out of the Kingdom, and the other at certain times. This is the fatal bargain, whereby it is pretended, the Scots sold the King to the Parliament of England, because indeed they delivered him up some months after. But it must be observed, that this is only a suspicion, a bare conjecture, and, if it be true, that the Scots, when they agreed upon this sum of four hundred thousand pounds, obliged themselves to give up the King to the Parliament, which I will neither affirm, or deny, at least, they acted with so much address, that there appeared no express proof of it. No treaty, no paper, concerning this affair, ever came to the knowledge of the publick. This sum was promised them for arrears due to their army, from the 18th of January 1643-4, to the 18th of September 1645. If it could be proved, that in all that time the Scotch army had been regularly paid, according to the treaty between the two Nations, and that no arrears were due to them, this, doubtless, would be a confirmation of the aforementioned suspicion. But this proof is very difficult. For if on one side, the Scots, to mount the debt to five hundred thousand pounds, inserted in their accounts several unjust articles, which ought to have been abated, the English on their side, acted with no less injustice, in pretending to make unfair deductions. This appears by the particulars of the accounts brought in by both parties, which are to be seen in Rushworth's Collections. Nays, it seems, if the English had been desirous to conceal the secret motive of this bargain, they should not have disputed the debt, since nothing would have been more proper to remove the suspicion of their giving this sum to the Scots, to engage them to deliver up the King, than to show it was really due to them for arrears.

Another, and no less important remark may be made upon this subject. The thing that has rendered odious this pretended sale of the King's person, is the tragical death of that Prince, of which it was the occasion. But it must be considered, it was so only by accident. Nothing was at that time farther from the thoughts, both of the Parliament and the Scots, than putting the King to death. The Independents, mortal enemies of the King, Scots, and Presbyterians, were the men who twice took away the King from the Parliament, by means of the army, and cut off his head, at the very time the Parliament and Scots were heartily labouring to restore him, as will hereafter appear. If therefore this pretended sale, supposing it real, was the occasion of the King's death, it may be affirmed, it was the innocent occasion, and its effects ought not to be imputed to the Parliament, such as it was at that time, since it is certain, neither both Houses, nor the Scots, did then carry their views so far, nor could possibly foresee what afterwards happened. But, as I said before, it can by no means be proved, that the Scots did indeed sell the King to the English. We shall see presently, the reasons why the Scots would not take charge of the King's person.

In the beginning of September, the Duke of Hamilton, who had been released out of Michael's Mount in Cornwall, upon the Parliament's taking that place, came to Newcastle with some other Scotch commissioners, and earnestly pressed the King to accept the propositions for peace. If the Scots had bargained, by a secret treaty, to give up the King to the Parliament, this proceeding seems to have been prejudicial to them, since the King's compliance would have voided their bargain with the English, and deprived them of the promised sum.

The King answered the Duke, and the other commissioners, "That he only desired to be heard, but could not obtain his desire. That he did not give a denial to the propositions, but only desired to be rightly informed of "what was demanded, and that his reasons might be heard."

In another answer given them in writing the next day, he said, "He should be content to restrain Episcopal Government to some few Dioceses, as Oxford, Winchester, Bristol, Bath and Wells, and Exeter; leaving all the rest of England fully to the Presbyterian Government, with the strictest clauses they should think upon against Papists and Independents. In a postscript, he required them, to give a particular account of this offer to the General-assembly in Scotland; assuring them, that he would punctually make good his last letter to them. And hoped, that they, as Church-men, would not press him to comply with what was against his conscience, till he should have leisure to be better informed."

This answer was a plain intimation, that when the King said, he desired to be heard, it was only a pretence to have liberty to come to London, to cause, if possible, the propositions to be altered. We see also by this answer, that he considered the affair of Church-government, as the principal, and most difficult point. In a word, his offer shows he was very hard pressed, since he agreed, that Presbyterian Government should be established throughout the whole Kingdom, a few Dioceses excepted.

Some time after, he sent a letter to the Duke of Hamilton [who was now retired, finding the King immovable] telling him, that the two Houses thought of getting him into their hands, by saying, they did not intend to make him a prisoner, but only to give him an honorable guard; but for his part, he would not be left in England, when the Scotch army retired, without a visible force upon his person. Probably therefore, when he demanded leave to come to London to treat in person with both Houses, he meant, that he should remain at perfect liberty (2). Perhaps he intended to escape into France, or elsewhere. But how could he imagine, he should be left at perfect liberty, on the bare presumption, that a negotiation with him would be successful?

At last, on the 18th of September, it was voted, that the King's person should be disposed of as both Houses of Parliament should think fit. But as he was not properly in their power, they appointed a committee to confer with the commissioners of Scotland upon that head.

In one of these conferences, the Lord Loudon, Chancellor of Scotland, endeavoured to show, that one of the two Kingdoms had no more right than the other, to dispose of the King's person, because he was equally King of both, and that, besides, they were united in the same interest by their Covenant. The English commissioners answered, That the King being in England, it belonged to the English to dispose of his person, and though he had retired to the Scotch army, this army being only auxiliaries, and in the pay of England, it was the same as if he had retired to the Parliament's army, whereof the Scotch forces were a part.

In another conference, the same Lord strenuously continued to prove, the principle advanced by him in the former, namely.

"That the disposing of his Majesty's person did belong to both Kingdoms, and therefore, that he ought not to be disposed of by any one of the Kingdoms, but by joint advice of both. He explained the word dispose, which was liable to be misunderstood: And said, he meant thereby, either that his Majesty should be put under restraint, or be at freedom with honour and safety. As for the way of restraint, he said, he looked upon it as a remedy more dangerous than the disease, and as a means to draw the war of foreign Kings upon the Nation, (especially the Prince being in other Kingdoms) rather than to quiet the troubles at home. And therefore he concluded, that he would lay aside the way of restraint, and speak of the way which might be with freedom, honour, and safety; and that could be no other, but that his Majesty should go into Scotland, or come to his Parliament, or some of his Houses about London. His going into Scotland, he observed, was full of dangers and inconvenience to both Kingdoms: For the Irish, banded with a crew of malignants, possessed the mountains and High-lands, which were the strong-holds, and never conquered parts of that Kingdom. That they had not laid down their arms, but kept in a body together; and they were so near Ireland, as the forces of the rebels there might in two or three hours space come over and join with them; and Scotland not being able to keep and entertain armies long, the King being there, might raise such forces in that Kingdom, as might make way quickly into England. And therefore his Majesty's go-

(1) They acknowledged the receipt of but 700,000 l. in Monies, Provisions, Assessments, Quarters, and otherwise. See Rushworth, Tom. 6. p. 323.

1646, "ing into Scotland being of most dangerous consequence to both Kingdoms, he offered to their Lordships consideration, his Majesty's coming to London, or some of his houses thereabouts." The principal reason on which he grounded his opinion, was the same as the King himself had alledged. "That he had not refused his assent to the propositions, but only desired to have his doubts cleared, and difficulties explained."

But in this reasoning there was a material defect, which must have been visible to all. And that is, the Chancellor supposed, the King should not be put under restraint, but left at full liberty in Scotland, at London, or some one of his houses; which certainly was very far from the thoughts of the person that spoke, of the Scots, and of the Parliament of England. In building therefore upon so wrong a foundation, the Lord Loudon could not expect that his reasoning should be considered as of much weight, if he had not been to deal with men whose interest it was to feign, they thought it very solid.

Nothing seems more apt to confirm the suspicion of the Scots being engaged to deliver the King to the Parliament, than this artifice of the Lord Loudon to that end. For though he supposed, the King would be in one of his houses with honour and safety, he knew the contrary, and that the Parliament would always be master of his person. Consequently it was the same thing as delivering him to the Parliament, the condition that he should be there with honour and safety, being only dazzling terms, to which the Parliament might always give what sense they pleased. But it must be considered, this is not a real proof, but a bare conjecture, which even seems to be destroyed by what happened shortly after. The commissioners of Scotland having caused an account of what passed at these conferences to be printed, with the specious to prove that England had no more right than Scotland to dispose of the King's person, the Commons were so offended at it, that they ordered all the copies to be seized, and the Printer committed. They made likewise a long answer to the account of the Scots, and sent it to the Scotch commissioners, who refused to receive it, because it came only from one of the two Houses; but the Commons ordered it to be printed and published. If it be true that the Scots had engaged to deliver the King to the Parliament for the sum of four hundred thousand pounds, nothing was more preposterous than this dispute, which was mixed with great bitterness, unless it is supposed, the Parliament and Scotch commissioners had agreed together to act this sort of farce.

This dispute, real or feigned, hindered not the Scotch army from preparing to return home. But as they were to be paid two hundred thousand pounds, before they began their march, they might yet have staid several weeks in England, had not the City of London engaged to advance that sum. It was however upon two conditions; the first, that the lenders should have 8 l. per Cent. interest for their money; and that the payment of the Principal should be secured out of the receipts of the grand Excise, and the sale of Bishops-lands (1). For this reason both Houses made haste to sequester these Lands, and appoint a committee to expose them to sale (2).

The 10th of December, the Parliament of Scotland took into consideration what was to be done with the King's person. After great debates, it was at length resolved, that the commissioners residing at London should demand of both Houses, from the Parliament of Scotland, that the King might return to London with honour and safety. That they should declare to them, that the Parliament of Scotland was resolved to support Monarchy in the person of the King and his just title to the Crown of England. This resolution seems directly contrary to the engagement to give up the King to the Parliament.

But the next day the Commissioners of the General Assembly presented to the Parliament a Paper, intitled, A solemn and reasonable warning to all estates and degrees of persons throughout the Land, wherein, they represented the heinous crime of forsaking the Covenant, and endeavouring a breach with England. They maintained, that such projects were infused into some by the devil, and that they who attempted to sow division between the two nations, and violate the Covenant, which was their chief strength, could not but be enemies to the State. Then, as to the disposal of the King's person, they said, that so long as his Majesty did not approve in his heart, and seal with his hand, the League and Covenant, he could not be received in Scotland without exposing the Kingdom to fresh troubles. That, on the other hand, to dispose of the King's person without the consent of the Parliament of England, was openly breaking the Covenant, and incurring the guilt of perjury. That it was very true, they were engaged by the Covenant to defend the King's person, but it was no less true, that the end of the union between the two Nations, was to settle Religion in both Kingdoms, according to the tenour of the Covenant, and that these two engagements could not be separated. That for these reasons they desired, that fresh endeavours might be used to prevail with his Majesty to give satisfaction to both Kingdoms, that he might return to his Parliament of England as a reconciled Prince to satisfied Subjects, in order to establish a happy peace.

This Paper being read in the Parliament, the matter was again taken into consideration, and at last after a great debate it was resolved, "That his Majesty should be desired to grant the whole propositions; and in case of refusal, the certifications given to his Majesty should be put in execution, namely, to secure the Kingdom without him;" and it was declared, "That the Kingdom of Scotland cannot lawfully engage themselves for his Majesty: He not taking the Covenant, satisfying as to Religion, &c. Nor would they admit him to come into Scotland, unless he gave a satisfactory answer to the whole propositions lately presented to him in the name of both Kingdoms (3)."

The King having notice of this resolution [from the Earl of Lanerick] sent a message to both Houses at Westminster, to desire again to come to London, or any of his houses thereabouts, upon the public faith and security of his Parliament and the Scotch Commissioners, that he should be there with honour, freedom and safety, in order to have his doubts cleared and difficulties explained. Assuring them, that he would most willingly condescend to them in whatsoever should be really for their good and happiness. Praying them to consider, it was their King who desired to be heard, which if refused to a subject by a King, he would be thought a tyrant for it.

Upon this message the Lords voted, that the King might come to Newmarket, there to remain with such attendants about him, as both Houses should appoint: But the Commons voted, that Holmby House in Northamptonshire would be the fittest place for his Majesty, to which the Lords consented. Then it was resolved, That his coming to Holmby should be with respect to the safety and preservation of his Majesty's person, and in defence of the true Religion, according to the Covenant (4).

The 5th of January 1646-7, a Committee of both Houses was appointed to go down and receive the King from the Scots (5). For though both Houses had declared, he should be at Holmby with honour and safety, they meant not to leave the manner to his choice, and whatever expressions they might use, it was to be in effect a real imprisonment.

Some days after, the two Houses received from the Parliament of Scotland, the following Declaration.

"THAT the King's Majesty came to their Quarters before Newark, and professed he came there with a full and absolute intention to give all just satisfaction to the joint desires of both Kingdoms, and with no thought either to continue this unnatural war any longer, or to make division betwixt the Kingdoms; but to comply with his Parliaments, and those intrusted by them, in every thing for settling of truth and peace; and that he would apply himself totally to the counsels and advices of his Parliament: Which he did not only profess verbally to the Committee of Estates with the Scottish army; but also in his several letters and declarations under his hand, to the Committee of Estates of Scotland, and to the two Houses of Parliament of England respectively. In confidence whereof, and of the reality of his intentions and resolutions, which he declared did proceed from no other ground, than the deep sense of the bleeding condition of his Kingdoms; the Committees of the Kingdom of Scotland, and general officers of the Scottish army, declared to himself, and to the Kingdom of England, their receiving his royal person to be on these terms (which is truth, notwithstanding what may be suggested or alledged to the contrary, by any within or without the

Order of the Commons to the General about the

ral's answer

(1) For the Town of Cambridge.
(2) The forces voted that for service were seven Regiments of Foot, three thousand Horse, and twelve hundred Dragoons, and 40,000 Whitlock, p. 212. About this time, Colonel George Monk took the Covenant, and engaging in the campaign, he was killed at the Battle of Marston, 1646, made it the criterion for Cromwell to carry on his designs. For doubtless, the Earl of Essex would have given some check to the fury that was going to prevail. The Lord Gloucester says, that it was reported he was pilfered; and that Cromwell and his party were wonderfully exalted with his death. Tom, p. 3, p. 33. On the 23rd of November following, the Earl's Horse and Rifles were cut to pieces and defaced in Wolfe's Abbey; and the like barbarous action was done to Gasden's tomb there. Whitlock, p. 238.

1646-7. Grimes, who, he hoped, would give a full and candid account of the whole matter.

Accordingly, these officers were examined before the House; after which, the Speaker, in dismissing them, told them what sense the Houses had of the petition, and desired their care for suppressing the same, or any other of the like nature for the future (1). The same day, the House ordered the General to publish a declaration, at the head of every regiment, importing, that the petition tended to put the army into a mutiny, and obstruct the relief of Ireland, and that the promoters thereof should be proceeded against as enemies to the State, and disturbers of the public peace (2).

The Commons could not do any thing more agreeable to those, who had formed the project of sowing division between the Army and the Parliament. This declaration gave occasion to the officers and soldiers to complain openly,

That they who had fought for the liberty of the Subjects of England, were denied the liberty of the Subject to petition, though it were to their General, and merely in things relating to them as soldiers, meddling neither with Church nor State-affairs, and withal, submitting it to the General's judgment for approbation or correction, as he saw cause.

Mean while, the two Houses intending to execute their resolution, of sending forces into Ireland in the manner they had projected, appointed a Committee for that purpose, and gave them power to form the regiments of this army, and commission such officers as they should think fit. At the same time, they resolved to encourage those that voluntarily offered to serve in Ireland, and ordered the commissioners speedily to execute their charge.

The commissioners (3) repairing to Saffron-Walden, the General's head-quarters, gave notice to the officers to assemble the next day. Then the Earl of Warwick, head of the committee, made a speech, exhorting them to accept of the terms offered by the two Houses. When he had done speaking, Colonel Lambert answered in the name of all the officers, and desired to know, what satisfaction should be given them concerning four articles, namely, arrears, indemnity, maintenance in Ireland, and conduct? Sir John Clotworthy replied, That the Parliament had taken care of all, except the point of indemnity, for which an ordinance would be ready in a few days. The officers demanded, what Generals were to command them in Ireland? It was answered, Skippon, and Maffey, were named for General, and Lieutenant-General; but for other commanders, the Parliament had not yet come to any resolution. Then the officers cried out with one voice, that if the command was given to Fairfax, Cromwell, and Skippon, they were ready to march. The commissioners seeing, the officers insisted upon a thing not agreeable to the intentions of the Parliament, desired such as would lift in the service of Ireland, to come to their lodgings in the town, where they would give them farther satisfaction; but there came very few. At the same time, the rest prepared a declaration, which was presented to the commissioners, wherein they said, "They had reason to complain, that they had received no positive answer to their desires: That however, those who in their own persons did not engage for Ireland, would be ready to promote the service: That if the same conduct under which the army had been so prosperous in England, was continued, it would conduce much to their personal engagement in the service of Ireland: That this was the general sense of the officers of the army."

The General, who hitherto seemed very desirous to serve the Parliament, ordered the officers who had a mind to serve in Ireland, to draw out as many of their men as would engage in that service. But the number was very small, and the Parliament was informed, there were officers who took great pains to dissuade the soldiers from this service, and cherish the discontent of the army (4).

At last, their boldness was such, that some of the principal officers scrupled not to appear at the head of the mutineers, in a declaration presented to both Houses. They said, "That the misrepresentations of their harmless intentions to the House, having occasioned hard thoughts, and expressions of the House's displeasure against them, they humbly craved leave to offer some reasons to clear their proceedings in those passages, which they found most obvious to exceptions in their petition, whereby they hoped to make it evident, that the means they used; and the method they took, was, as they conceived, most orderly and inoffensive; proceeded not in the least from dis Temper, and aiming in no measure to put conditions on the Parliament; and that from hence might be discovered, the corruptions of those men's hearts, who have been the evil instruments of occasioning the late declaration against them. And,

1. For the liberty of petitioning, they hoped, the honourable House of Commons would never deny it unto them, there being not any thing more essential to freedom; and particularly, since they had justified and commended it in their declaration of the 2d of November 1642, in these words: It is the liberty and privilege of the people, to petition unto us for the ease and redress of their grievances and oppressions, and we are bound in duty to receive their petitions.

2. They presented not their petition to the House, but with the approbation, and by the mediation, of their General, and consequently, that it could not be reprobated as seditious.

3. The report of their forcing subscriptions was not true. For the petition had taken its first rise from amongst the soldiers, and the officers had engaged but in the second place to regulate the soldiers proceedings, and remove, as near as they could, all occasion of distaste.

4. They were forced to desire an act of indemnity for such actions as they had committed during the exigency of the war, not warrantable by law, since they were liable to be indicted for them in time of peace.

5. As to their desiring the Royal assent, they never intended thereby to lessen the Parliament's authority; but only used it as a provident caution for their future safety. And they observed, that the Parliament itself had, by offering propositions, judged, the desiring the King's assent convenient.

6. As to the desire of their arrears, necessity enforced them thereto: That their wages had been hardly earned, and the desire of them could not argue them guilty of the least discontent, or intention of mutiny.

7. For what concerned the relief of Ireland, they thought it hard, that those who had voluntarily served in the wars, and left their parents, trades, and livelihoods, and without any compulsion, engaged of their own accords, should, after all their free and unwearied labours, be forced and compelled to go out of the King's dom."

This declaration was signed by Thomas Hammond, Lieutenant-General of the ordinance, seven Colonels, seven Lieutenant-Colonels, six Majors, and one hundred and thirty Officers, Captains, and Subalterns.

The same day this declaration was presented to the House, the Commons voted, that the army should be disbanded, and the soldiers have six weeks pay when dismissed.

Some days after, Major-General Skippon, who was to command in Ireland, and [being returned from Barnstable] had taken his seat in the House, notwithstanding the Self-denying ordinance, which was no longer regarded, reported, that a letter was presented to him the day before by some troopers, in the behalf of eight regiments of Horse, and produced the same, which was immediately ordered to be read. These regiments complained of the many late scandals, and false suggestions, against the army, and their proceedings, and alleged the reasons why they could not engage in the service of Ireland, under the conduct of the intended Generals. The troopers, [Sexby, Allen, and Sheppard] who brought the letter, were called in and examined, concerning the meaning of some expressions in the petition; to which they replied, That the letter being a joint act of those several regiments, they could not give a punctual answer, being only agents; but if they might have the queries in writings, they would carry them to the regiments, and return their answers.

Though the declaration of the officers was in itself very reasonable, it looked however more like an insolent accusation against the Parliament, than an humble apology. This convinced the Commons, that the evil was greater than was at first imagined; wherefore they passed several votes to give some satisfaction to the army, and to hinder the increase of their discontent. At the same time, Skippon, New Com-

1647. Cromwell, Ireton, and Fleetwood, were ordered to go and acquaint the army with what the House intended to do for the troops, and that a considerable sum was preparing for their pay, before they were disbanded. Hitherto the Commons seem not to have perceived the true aim of the army's complaints, but hoped to appease them by some concession.

Answer of the Officers to the Commissioners. Rushworth, VI. p. 424; 168.

The Generals sent by the Parliament being come to the army, and calling the officers together, read to them the votes passed in their favour; after which, Skippon made a speech, to ingage them to serve under him in Ireland. The officers answered, as this affair concerned the soldiers, as well as the officers, it was necessary to inform them of it, in order to know their resolution.

Whitelocke. 2. 242.

Mean while, the Parliament ardently desiring to disband the army, after that which was to serve in Ireland was formed, ordered, that before they were disbanded, a fortnight's pay should be added to the six weeks, formerly voted, and that six weeks pay more should be given to those who would ingage for the service of Ireland.

The Soldiers' style to come into the army. Rushworth, VI. p. 425.

The troopers and soldiers being informed of what the Generals, sent by the Parliament, had reported to the officers, answered, that as the whole army was concerned, they desired to discuss the affair in a Committee, chosen by themselves, out of every company and troop, who should report the desires of each Regiment to a Committee of General Officers; to be by them contracted into a method, and if general, communicated to both Houses, as the sense of the army. It is easy to perceive in this answer, a secret direction of some of the leading Male-contents, who intended by this means to be matters of the soldiers' resolutions, and compose in the army, a sort of Parliament, in opposition to the two Houses.

It is granted them. They set up the Council of Agitators. Rushworth, VI. p. 33; Whitelocke.

This demand, of which, perhaps, the consequences were not by many foreseen, being granted, the soldiers chose two out of every Company, who were called Adjutors, or Agitators, to debate upon the matters which were to be brought to the council of officers, called, the Council of War, consisting of Generals, Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors, and Captains. Among the Agitators there were few or none above the degree of an Ensign. These two Councils were afterwards continued, to the great prejudice of the Parliament, and great advantage of the heads of the Independent-party, who easily found means to admit only such as were devoted to them, or not of sufficient ability to discover their designs.

The Parliament persist in their design. Rushworth, VI. p. 431.

Mean while, the two Houses persisted in their resolution to disband the army, excepting those who would ingage to serve in Ireland. To effect this the more easily, it was ordered, that their arrears should be speedily audited, and good security given them, for so much as should not be paid off upon disbanding: That none that had voluntarily served in the wars, should be pressed for any service beyond sea: That an ordinance should be drawn for providing for widows, maimed soldiers, and orphans. After that, the two Houses settled the manner of disbanding the army, namely, that the regiments should be disbanded at different times and places, and that the money to pay them what was promised, should be sent to the several rendezvous. But the army openly complained of the intention to pay them but two months arrears upon disbanding, when there was no less than fifty six weeks due to them.

The Army only come to the Council. Rushworth, VI. p. 437; Whitelocke.

Shortly after, the General called a council of war at Bury, at which were present above two hundred officers, and communicated to them the votes of both Houses, advising them to a compliance with the order of Parliament. But the officers answered, They did not think these votes satisfactory to the soldiers; 1. Because eight weeks pay was not a considerable part of what was due to them. 2. Because no visible security was given for the arrears. 3. Because nothing was done for their vindication, and they being declared enemies, and sent home, might hereafter be proceeded against as enemies, unless the declaration were recalled.

The Soldiers reason. Rushworth, VI. p. 438.

At the same Council a petition was produced and read, which had been that morning presented to the General, in the name of the private soldiers of the army, complaining, "That it was intended to disband them without redressing their grievances, and in a strange, unheard of manner, one regiment apart from another, which posture could not but render them suspicious to the Kingdom. And therefore they desired the General would be pleased to appoint a rendezvous for the army, and use his utmost endeavours, that they might not be disbanded before their grievances were heard, and fully redressed, which if not done, they should be necessitated, though unwillingly, to do things that might be prevented, by granting their just desires."

General reads the petition of the Army. Rushworth, VI. p. 437.

The council of War having examined this petition, believed, or feigned to believe, it was absolutely necessary to take notice of it, for fear, if they saw all their desires rejected, they should have a rendezvous without their officers. It was therefore resolved, that the quarters of the army should be contracted, to prevent disorders, and for the greater readiness to suppress them. It was manifest, the design of the petition, and the council of war's resolution, was, to break the Parliament's measures. It had been resolved to separate the army, and disband them at different times and places, in order to do it the more easily; and the army, on the contrary, had contracted their quarters, so that they could rendezvous in a very short space, without any possibility of being prevented by the Parliament.

The Parliament sent their Commissioners. Rushworth, VI. p. 438; Whitelocke.

The General failed not to acquaint the two Houses with the result of what had passed in the council of war, intreating them to proceed with caution, that the army might not be incensed, and a breach made, which could not but be very dangerous. He writ the same day to the Speaker of the House of Commons, that he was extremely uneasy concerning the disposition of the army, and heartily wished some means could be found to appease the diffractions, which was not in his power. That he was forced to yield to many things to prevent worse inconveniences.

Whereupon, the two Houses recalled the Commissioners, and from the money which had been lodged in several places for the payment of the soldiers. But three thousand five hundred pounds carrying to London, was stopped by Colonel Rainesborough's men at Woodstock. It was very evident, the army was unwilling to be disbanded; but the Parliament not being in a condition to command obedience, were forced to stay till a more convenient season, without relinquishing however their design. Their intention was to divide the army, under colour of the necessity of sending forces into Ireland; and, the better to ingage the soldiers to leave the army, it was voted, that a month's pay should be given to those that would quit their regiments, and serve in Ireland. They hoped by this means to form an army equal or superior to that which refused to obey, wherein they were greatly mistaken. Mean while, to give some satisfaction to the army, it was ordered by the Commons, that the subordinate officers and soldiers should have all their arrears, deducting for free quarters according to the usual rules of the army. That the Commission-officers should have one month's pay more added to the two months arrears formerly voted. Lastly, that the declaration against those that drew up the first petition should be razed out of the Journal of the House (1). But all this was not capable of contenting the army, who were resolved not to be satisfied. The directors of these proceedings had a mind to continue the army, in order to be able to oppose the Presbyterians, who were superior in the Parliament. So, the reasons alleged by the army being only pretences, though every thing had been granted, others would have been devised, to prevent their disbanding; and indeed, it will presently appear, that left all their desires should be granted, they added new demands, which the Parliament could not comply with.

The Division between the Parliament and army. Rushworth, VI. p. 438; Whitelocke.

It was easy to perceive, that every thing tended to a breach between the Parliament and the army. The Parliament accused the army of mutiny and sedition (2), and the army pretended, that the Parliament, under colour of sending forces into Ireland, thought of forming a new army, to become masters of the Kingdom, when the old one should be cashiered, or to kindle a fresh war, in case the troops refused to obey. But they were far from being upon an equality. The army had the sword in their hands, and tho' some officers and soldiers had quitted their regiments for the service of Ireland, their number was inconsiderable (3); all the rest remained united, and were supported by most of the Generals, who being against the Parliament, privately cherished the discontent of the officers and soldiers. The Parliament had no forces to compel the army to obedience, and therefore were terribly embarrassed. They durst not drive the army to extremities; and on the other hand, they plainly perceived, that the discord was fomented by the leaders of the Independents, who sought the destruction of the Parliament, for fear the Parliament should destroy them, as indeed both Houses intended.

This therefore was a critical season, the point being to know who should be master, the Parliament or the Independent party. But these last had the army on their side, and that alone balanced the power and authority of the Parliament. They had so well laid their measures, by means of the Agitators, that the army was become a sort of Republic, where the suffrages of the common soldiers were upon a level with those of the Generals; nay, the soldiers did not think themselves obliged to follow or to ask the advice of their Officers. Hence sprung confusion, which was suffered to 1647. prevail. Every thing was done in the name of the army, a loose term which signified, sometimes the Council of war alone, sometimes the Council of Agitators, now both Councils together, and now, the Agitators of some particular Regiments. In this last sense must be understood the enterprize performed, in the name of the army, by the Agitators of some Regiments of Horse, of carrying away the King by force from Holmby House to New-market (1).

To execute this design, they chose Cornet Joyce, one of the Agitators of his Regiment, who, from a Taylor before the war, was become an Officer, and had signalized himself for his bravery. Joyce being put at the head of fifty Horse, marched directly to Holmby, and came there in the Night, after the King was in bed. Having secured the avenues, he went up with two or three more to the King's Chamber, and cauled the door to be opened. The King getting up, asked him what he meant. Joyce answered, he intended to carry him to the army, for they had received certain advice, there was a design to convey him away by force. The King asked him, whether he had the General's orders? He replied, no, but that he was authorized by the army, and as he held a pistol in his hand, sufficiently intimated, it was by that he was chiefly empowered (2). The Parliament's Commissioners who were at Holmby to take care of the King, would have opposed this violence: But the King's guard refusing to make any resistance, and the troops that were in the neighbouring villages to relieve the guard every day, would not have been able to stand out, all the King could obtain was to stay till the morning. That same night he wrote a Note, which he intrusted with the Earl of Dumfries, to acquaint the two Houses, he was carried away from Holmby against his will, and that they should not give any credit to what he might afterwards write whilst under restraint. The next morning, he went into the Coach, and was conducted by Joyce, who carried him that night to Colonel Montague's, and the next day to New-market.

Whilst these things passed, the General having appointed a Rendezvous of the army at New-market, for the 4th and 5th of June, the several Regiments presented a Petition to him, complaining of the Votes passed in Parliament the 21st and 25th of May, as not being satisfactory, for the following reasons.

“1. That eight weeks arrears to be paid at disbanding, was but a mean reward for all their labours, and a very slender supply to carry them to their homes, and set them up again in their former callings and conditions.”

“2. That in the orders given for the stating of their accounts, they found no consideration or regard had of their arrears incurred in the former army commanded by the Earl of Essex, which to the most of them were much greater than those under the new model.”

“3. That three Shillings a week was to be abated to Foot Soldiers for quarter, which was more than they should have paid for themselves, if they timely had their pay.”

“4. That there was no provision or allowance made in relation to any quarters discharged by them.”

“5. That, contrary to custom, no Trooper was capable of allowance for arrears, unless he delivered in his horse and arms.”

“6. That the visible security for what arrears should not be paid at disbanding, appeared to them insufficient.”

“7. That the ordinance voted, to exempt from pressing, for the service of Ireland, such as had served as volunteers in the army, was defective; because after their discharge, it was very difficult for them to obtain a testimonial of their past services.”

“8. That the ordinance for the maintenance of maimed soldiers, &c. had not yet passed in Parliament.”

“9. That the ordinance for indemnity seemed to make but slender provision for their safety.”

“10. That no reparation had been made to those officers of the army, that had been at several times sent for to attend the Parliament as Delinquents, though they had been found innocent.”

“11. That there had been yet nothing declared by the Parliament, to clear them as to their right of petitioning. (There was in this article heavy complaints against the Parliament's arbitrary power.)

“12. That the Declaration made against the army was yet standing in force.”

“13. That nothing had yet been done towards the discovery or censure of those that had wronged the army, and abused the Parliament, so as to procure the proceedings against them, with relation to their petition.”

It is easy to perceive, these complaints were but mere pretences, or at least, if the army had not resolved to be satisfied upon no terms, these differences might possibly have been adjusted. But this was only a preparative to what they had resolved to do. The next day, June the 5th, the Officers and Soldiers subscribed a Paper, which they called, a solemn Engagement, whereby they consented to disband, when required by the Parliament, but on condition, That they should first have such satisfaction in relation to their grievances, and such security as to their persons, as should be agreed unto by a Council to consist of those General Officers (who had concurred with the army) with two Commission Officers, and two Soldiers to be chosen for each Regiment; and declared, that without such satisfaction, and such security they would not willingly disband, nor justify themselves to be disbanded or divided.

This Engagement was seconded with Petitions from the Inhabitants of the Counties of Essex, Suffolk and Norfolk, intreating the General, not to suffer the army to be disbanded till every thing relating to the Government was settled.

June the 7th, both Houses received a letter from the General acquainting them, that the soldiers at Holmby had brought the King thence by consent, having thought proper to secure his person, from an apprehension of forces gathering to fall upon them and force him out of their hands. That as soon as he knew it, he sent Colonel Waller's Regiment to guard the King; after which, for prevention of danger, he had sent two Regiments more to re-inforce Colonel Waller. That Waller had desired the King and the Commissioners, in his name, to return to Holmby, but that his Majesty was not willing to go back. That upon this, he had sent Sir Hardy Waller, and Colonel Lambert, to desire the Commissioners to think of returning to Holmby, but that the Commissioners refused to act in upholding the King. He affirmed moreover, that neither himself, nor the Officers about him, nor the body of the army were concerned in removing the King, protesting that it was as well as the army's desire, to study to settle a firm peace. That they had no intention to oppose Parliament, nor let up the Independent Government, but to give all to the wisdom of the Parliament, without advancing any particular party or interest.

It was a very strange thing, that the King should be removed from Holmby by fifty troopers, without any orders from the General or the Officers about him, and without the consent of the body of the army; and that the general Officers should suffer him to be in the center of the quarters of the army, without inquiring after those who gave, or those who executed, such an order. This shewed, there was some mystery in it, which it was not thought proper to discover to the Parliament, and that Joyce knew he should be protected if called to an account. On the other hand, though the King had sent word to both Houses, that he was unwillingly removed (3), it appears by the General's letter, that his Majesty consented to it, and was unwilling to return to Holmby, when it was in his power. All this seems very mysterious, and I do not believe the publick was ever fully informed of what passed before the removal of the King. What followed makes it conjectured, that some of the general Officers believed it to be absolutely necessary for their interest to have the King in their power, at a time when they thought there was reason to fear, the Parliament would come to an agreement with him, and that they caused him to be taken away from Holmby by persons without warrant, well-knowing, they should be powerful enough to hinder the affair from being strictly examined. It may be, the King himself was privy to it, since he was unwilling to return to Holmby, and appeared, for some time, much more at ease in the hands of the army, than when he was in the Parliament's power.

The Commons seeing the army master of the King's person, and unwilling to disband, resolved at least to shew the publick by their votes, that the imputations laid to their charge by the army were groundless, and that they were not swayed by self-interested motives. So, June the 10th, they confirmed the test-denying ordinance, and

The Army marches towards London. Ruthworth, VI. p. 552.

553. The committee of the Army against some of the Commons. Id. p. 552.

554. Clarendon, III. p. 38. The approach of the army threw the Parliament and City into great consternation, and an ordinance was passed, to enable the committee of the Militia of London to raise forces. They seemed to intend to put themselves in a posture of defence against the army. Within a few hours after, the City received a letter signed by the General, and all the other general officers, complaining, there were certain members of Parliament who endeavoured to engage the Kingdom in a new war, as having no other way to protect themselves from the punishment they justly deserved. Adding, that they desired no alteration of the Civil Government, nor in the least to hinder the settling of Presbyterianism, neither did they intend any evil to the City, if they appeared not to assist that wicked party, who would embroil them and the Kingdom. That they were ready to remove at a farther distance, if they were assured, that a speedy settlement of things was in hand. That if, after all, the City should be seduced to take arms against the army, ruin and destruction would ensue.

The Parliament tries to divide the Army. June 11. Ruthworth, VI. p. 553.

555. Clarendon, III. p. 38. The next day, upon a false rumour of the army's near approach to the city, the Militia of London ordered all the trained-bands to be raised on pain of death. But presently after the order was revoked. However, soldiers were lifted by order of Parliament.

The Common-Council of London sent an answer to the General and Officers, wherein they said, the City intended no evil to the army, but only to defend the Parliament and themselves against any unlawful violence. That they did not take arms with intent to hinder the obtaining of the army's just demands. That on the contrary, they had presented their addresses to the Parliament for the obtaining thereof; and only requested, they would demand no more than what should be just and reasonable.

Id. p. 560. The same day, the Parliament sent Commissioners to the army (2), to know what were their desires. The General answered, in letters to both Houses, That the army offered, for a month's pay, not to draw their quarters nearer London, without first giving notice of it to the Parliament's commissioners.

Mean while, the army continued to render themselves formidable, as well by their numbers, as by their demands which daily rose higher. At first, they protested, they would not meddle in any thing not immediately relating to themselves, and that their intention was to leave the care of the Government to the wisdom of the two Houses. But when they found, the Parliament gave way, and wanted power or resolution, they advanced one step farther, and by a declaration presented to both Houses, demanded:

The representation of the Army. June 14. Id. p. 566. Whitelock.

"1. That the Houses might be purged of such members, as for their delinquency, or for corruptions, or undue elections ought not to sit there.

"2. That those persons who had appeared against the army, might speedily be disabled from doing the like; and for that purpose, might be made incapable of being the soldiers Judges, when disbanded.

"3. That some determinate period of time might be set for the continuance of that and future Parliaments, beyond which none should continue; that the members of the House might not have the temptation or advantage of an unlimited power to perpetuate injustice or oppression, but might be in a capacity to taste of subjection as well as rule.

"4. That Parliaments might not be adjournable or dissolvable, any other ways, than by their own consent.

1647. "5. That the right and freedom of the People to present petitions to the Parliament might be cleared and vindicated.

"6. That the large powers given to committees or deputy-Lieutenants, might be taken away, or regulated.

"7. That the Kingdom might be righted and publickly satisfied in point of accounts, for the sums that had been levied and paid.

"8. That after publick justice was first satisfied by some few examples on Delinquents, a general act of oblivion should be passed."

After these demands, the army protested, "That their design was not to overthrow Presbytery, and establish the Independent Government. But they only desired, that there might be some effectual course taken, that such who upon conscientious grounds differed from the established forms, might not for that be debarred from the common rights, liberties, or benefits belonging equally to all, while they lived soberly and innocently towards others, and peaceably and faithfully towards the State."

It was easy to perceive, the army no longer contented themselves with meddling in their own affairs, but wanted to have a share in the Civil Government. There were in the House of Commons very able men, who knew the designs of the Independents, and would have baffled them, had they been supported with power. To this end it was, they had projected the forming, out of the old, a new army for Ireland, and to cashier the rest of the forces. This project tended directly to the ruin of the Independent party. Accordingly, Cromwell and his associates used all their endeavours to countermin the artifices of their enemies, by inspiring the army with discontent, and cherishing it in the fore-mentioned manner. In short, having tried the Parliament, they thought themselves strong enough to strike a bolder stroke, in using always the army's name, which they had moulded to their purposes. To this end, they caused it to be resolved in a council of war, that the army should prefer a charge against the ablest and most powerful members of the Commons, who in a manner governed and directed the House. These were the men the Independent-party had most to fear. This resolution being taken, the army deputed some officers to carry in their name, to the Parliament, a charge against eleven members, namely, Holles, Stapleton, Lewis, Clotworthy, Waller, Maynard, Maffes, Glyn, Long, Harley, and Nichols.

The general articles of the charge were:

"1. That the persons above-named had, in an arbitrary and violent manner, infringed the Rights and Liberties of the nation, and endeavoured by indirect and corrupt practices to delay and obstruct justice.

"2. That the army being, until the middle of March last, in an orderly condition, and ready, either quietly to have disbanded, or else to have engaged in the service of Ireland, those members had endeavoured by false informations to beget misunderstandings and jealousies in the Parliament against the army.

"3. That whereas the Parliament might have had out of the army, an intire force for the reduction of Ireland, those persons had attempted to pull the army in pieces, and to put the Kingdom to the trouble and expence of raising a new force for that service.

"4. That they had diverted the forces engaged for the service of Ireland, and endeavoured to apply them to carry on desperate designs of their own in England; and had also raised new forces under pretence to guard the Parliament, and privately lifted officers and soldiers, for embroiling the Kingdom in a new and bloody war.

"5. That they had invited and encouraged divers reformado's, and other officers and soldiers, tumultuously to gather together at Westminster to assault and assault the members of Parliament."

The very next day, the army sent proposals to the Commons, wherein they desired:

"That the persons impeached might be forthwith suspended from sitting in the House.

"That there might be a month's pay immediately sent to the army.

"That if the officers and soldiers of the army who had engaged for Ireland, or those who had deserted the army and come to London, had since then received more than a month's pay, there might be so much more money sent down to the army.

"That during the debate and transaction betwixt the Parliament and the army, about raising and lifting new forces

(1) Whitelock says, fifteen miles. Mem. p. 232.

(2) Sir Thomas Widdrington, and Colonel White. Ruthworth, Tom. VI. p. 560.

7. "forces, the Parliament would not suffer any new forces to be raised within the Kingdom."

These demands extremely embarrassed the Parliament. They could not reject them without furnishing the army with a pretence to march to London, where was nothing ready to oppose them, and by granting them, they gave them occasion to make further demands. This embarrassment was the greater, as several Counties seconded the army, and pretended, it was absolutely necessary to continue them, to stop the progress of the arbitrary power assumed by the Parliament. We have already seen, that the Counties of Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, had in some measure declared for the army. Buckinghamshire and Hertfordshire followed this example, and Glamorganshire openly complained, by deputies sent on purpose, that the People were oppressed by the Parliament and by the Committees settled in the several counties (1).

Whereupon the two Houses thought proper to appease the impending storm, by giving satisfaction to the army, in order to remove all pretence of complaint; for it was easy to perceive, that was what they wanted. It was therefore resolved, that the order for lifting of forces, and the permission given to the committee of the Militia of London to augment the trained-bands should be void: That the army should have a month's pay, and the General be required to remove it forty miles from London. Some days after, a month's pay was also granted to the Forces in the North, and to let the army see there was no design to disband them, the Parliament passed an ordinance for raising sixty thousand pounds a month for the maintenance of the army, and for the service of Ireland (2). Lastly, the House of Commons writ to the General, that they were ready to receive from him any particular charge against the eleven accused members.

This concession might have produced peace between the Parliament and the army, if peace had been what the army desired. But instead of being obliged to the Parliament for this compliance, they were rather incensed at it, as being sensible, the design of it was only to break their measures, by taking away all pretence of complaint. They would have been better pleased, that all their demands had been denied, in order to have an excuse to do themselves justice. They were afraid the Parliament, by endeavouring to gain time, would privately take measures, the effects whereof would not appear perhaps till it should be too late to prevent them. Wherefore, far from being contented, they presented a Remonstrance to the Parliament, whereby they sufficiently discovered their disinclination to an agreement. This Remonstrance contained the following complaints of the officers and soldiers:

"That they had yet received no answer or resolution about the eleven accused members. This point they largely insisted upon, and pretended they could not expect they should be called to an account, so long as they continued in such power, both in the House, and in all the committees of the highest trust, as they actually did.

"That the army was commanded to forty miles distance from London, and his Majesty's person demanded immediately to Richmond House (3), within eight miles of London, to put his Majesty within reach of those men's power.

"That it was industriously published, that his Majesty was kept a prisoner in the army, and barbarously and uncivilly used; but all suggestions of that sort were most false.

"Lastly, after many complaints of publick and private grievances, they said, that they should be enforced, by the Parliament's affected delays, to take extraordinary courses to put things to a speedy issue, unless by Thursday next they received assurance and security on the following articles:

1. That the declaration inviting men to desert the army, be recalled and annulled.

2. That the army may be presently paid up, equally to those that have deserted it.

3. That his Majesty's coming to Richmond may be suspended; and in the mean time, no place may be appointed for his Majesty's residence any nearer to London, than the Parliament will allow the quarters of the army to be.

(1) It was strange (says Whitlock) to see, how several Counties, and the citizens of London began to make all their application to the General and the Army, omitting the Parliament, and all looked upon the Army in the chief place, and were afraid of doing any thing contrary to them. Ibid. p. 254.

Mr. Hales continued in Brussels till the Restoration. Whitlock, p. 256.

(5) It was chiefly carried on by the eleven Members and their friends. One Coleman, Alderman of Newcastle, was employed to negotiate with the Scots. Whitlock, p. 257.

4. That the members charged may be forthwith suspended the House.

5. That those that have deserted the army may be instantly discharged, and receive no more of their arrears till the army be first satisfied.

6. That both Parliament and City may be freed from those multitudes of reformado's, and other soldiers, that flock together about London.

7. That all liftings, or raisings of new forces may be effectually suppressed.

8. That the perplexed affairs of the Kingdom, and those concerning the army, may be put into some speedy way of settling and composing (4).

It was visible, the army sought a pretence to quarrel, and as it was their interest to break very soon, for fear secret measures might be taken against them, so was it the Parliament's business to gain time. To that purpose, they empowered the commissioners in the army to treat with them upon all the points in dispute.

Mean while, the Commons voted, "That by the law no judgment can be given to suspend the eleven members from sitting in the House, upon the papers presented from the army, before the particulars be produced, and proofs made." But an expedient was found to soften this refusal, namely, that the parties accused should, of their own accord, desire leave to absent themselves from the House, which was granted, and the army remained satisfied (5).

About the same time, the army drawing a little nearer London, probably, with design to awe the Parliament, the General writ to the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen, that they had nothing to fear from the army, who had no ill-intention against the city. And indeed, it was resolved in a council of war, that there should be no farther advance of the army than to Uxbridge.

It is certain, there were many in the City and Parliament, that wished to see a breach between the two Houses and the army. Some, doubtless, imagined such a breach would be very advantageous to the King, and that one or other of the two parties would join with him, and be directed by him. Nay, the King flattered himself with these hopes. The army shewed great regard for him, and some of the officers even hinted to him, they were labouring for his restoration. For this reason the two Houses thought it very necessary to avoid a breach, which could not but produce many ill effects. Both Houses therefore voted, that they considered the army commanded by General Fairfax, as their army, and would make provision for their maintenance. It was farther ordered, that they should have a month's pay, and no officer or soldier should leave the army without license from the General; that all reformado's should remove from the city, and the King reside no nearer London than the army. These votes being communicated to the army, they seemed so well pleased with them, that they resolved to remove from London, to shew they intended to use no force upon the Parliament, and the head-quarters were appointed at Wickham.

Whilst the Parliament was endeavouring to content the army, a plot was forming in London, to compel the two Houses to take other measures, and oppose the army (6).

The Presbyterians were not pleased to see the Independents gain so much ground, and censured the Parliament for thus meanly complying with the army. The Magistrates of London came into this plot, as well as the most zealous Presbyterian members of Parliament, who had not been able to hinder the late votes for preventing a breach with the army. The Authors of this plot had sent private agents into Scotland to desire assistance. Nay, it was whispered in London, that Scotland was going to declare against the army.

The first step taken by the conspirators, was to present to the Parliament, a petition from the Common-council of London, wherein they expressed some suspicion of their conduct. This was, doubtless, in order to have a pretence to complain more openly afterwards, and to begin to lessen the people's prepossession in favour of the Parliament. In this petition, the city complained of the arbitrary power exercised by the Parliament's Committees, as well as of the ill-management of the publick money, and desired:

1. That present command be given, that no officer of war, or soldier, do enter London, under pretence of receiving their arrears.

" 2. That such officers and soldiers as are already paid, if by their usual habitation and employment have been within London, be enjoined forthwith to betake themselves to their calling; and such as have dwellings in the country, be required to depart within two days after publication.

" 3. That all who have been in arms against the Parliament, be enjoined upon pain of imprisonment, within twenty-four hours after publication, to repair to their several habitations.

" 4. That such commanders and soldiers as have come in from the army, and received their monies, may be otherwise disposed of as the Parliament shall think fit.

" 5. That all persons whatsoever that are possessed of any monies or goods belonging to the publick, may be enjoined to bring the same, within one month after publication, into some publick treasury.

" 6. That all revenues be managed under such commissions, and by such persons, as, notwithstanding any privilege of Parliament, may be held to such rules as are or shall be prescribed therein.

" 7. That the Parliament would for the present lay aside all businesses of lesser consequence, and improve their time and utmost endeavour, that such laws may be prepared for his Majesty's concurrence, as may settle the government of the Church, secure the people from all unlawful and arbitrary power whatsoever in future, and restore his Majesty to his just rights and authority, according to the Covenant.

" 8. And that the people may be the better secured to enjoy the intended effects of such laws, as shall be so made with the royal assent, that special care be taken, that all officers of State, and other ministers of justice, may be persons of honour, of considerable interest, and of known integrity.

" 9. That the Parliament would please to provide for the carrying on of the affairs in Ireland.

" 10. That by just and good means the correspondence with Scotland may be maintained and preserved.

" 11. That the House of Commons would please to give order for a speedy examination of all unlawful elections and returns of the members thereof.

" 12. That some speedy course may be taken for the deciding of all causes formerly determinable in the Court of Admiralty.

" 13. That satisfaction being made by Delinquents, an act of oblivion may be passed."

To incense the Londoners against the army, it was rumoured, that they designed to declare for the King (1). Nay, a Pamphlet was dispersed in London, entitled, Heads presented by the Army to the King's Majesty. But the army disowned it by a public declaration.

The Parliament having empowered their commissioners (2) to treat with the army, they nominated on their part, Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, Rainborough, Harrison, Sir Hardress Waller, Rich, Lambert, Hammond, and Major Rainborough, all Independents, and heads of the party in the army. It appears by Memoirs, inserted in Rushworth's Collection, that the army's commissioners would not begin to treat, before the Parliament should have granted some things they demanded, and really performed them. They complained, that the Parliament seemed indeed by their Votes to comply with the army's desires, but delayed to put them in execution. The Parliament's commissioners endeavoured on their side to avoid having these points considered as granted preliminaries, and insisted upon their making part of the negotiation.

This shows, the Parliament sought to gain time, and seemed inclined to give the army satisfaction, only because it could not be avoided. The Commons were almost all Presbyterians, and consequently were vexed to see themselves obliged to stoop to the Independents, who were masters of the army. Among the Presbyterian members, there were not a few, who, being very warm, would have gladly hazarded a breach with the army, rather than be forced to receive law from them. But the rest, being the majority, though no less enemies to the Independents, thought it more advisable to have patience, and try to amuse the army till some aid might be secured, rather than furnish them with a pretence to march to London, and ruin at once the Presbyterian-party and Parliament. Accordingly, these prevailing in both Houses, every thing seemed to tend to an agreement, which could not but be fatal to the Presbyterians; however, there was no way to avoid it. For this reason, the Parliament forbid the Reformed-officers to come into London for two months, and gave very strict orders against lifting of soldiers, which was privately transacting in the city.

Mean while, the project of raising forces in London to oppose the army still continued, though with the utmost secrecy, and the agents in Scotland caused much to be expected from the Scots, as being concerned to support the Presbyterian-party. But the authors of this project could hardly flatter themselves that the assistance of Scotland could be ready in time, since the Parliament and army were upon terms of accommodation. They found therefore, they were either to break off this accommodation, or resolve to see all their hopes vanish, and suffer Presbyterianism to be trampled upon by the Independents. To succeed in the design of preventing a peace between the Parliament and army, they found no better way than to excite the people, to force the Parliament to alter their measures. They got therefore the apprentices, and London mob, to present petitions, that the Presbyterian Government might be firmly established: The intolerance of Sectaries curbed: The army paid off and disbanded; and other things of the like nature destructive of the projected agreement.

On the other hand, the forces in the North, and the Horse quartered at Nottingham, published declarations of their adherence to the army commanded by General Fairfax.

About the same time, the Parliament, at the army's request, ordered the four regiments that came from the army, upon pretence of engagement for Ireland, but remaining still in the Kingdom, to be disbanded. They permitted likewise the eleven accused members to go beyond sea for six months, insinuating to them by this permission, that they would do well to take this course of their own accord. But, as, probably, they were deeply concerned in the plot formed at London, if not the authors, they thanked the House for this favour, without being in haste to take the benefit of it (3).

Mean while, the army hearing, something more than ordinary was contriving in London, and that succours from Scotland were talked of, sent a petition to the Parliament, with these farther demands: "That a declaration be published against the bringing in of any foreign forces: That the army be paid up equal with the deserters thereof, and put into a constant course of pay: That the committee of the Militia of London, that had been changed by ordinance of the 4th of May last, be restored, and the Militia of the city speedily returned into those hands who formerly gave large testimonies of their fidelity to the Parliament and Kingdom." Whereupon the Parliament declared, that whosoever should bring in foreign forces without the consent of both Houses, should be deemed traitors. It was voted likewise, that the Militia of London should be restored to the old commissioners, and an ordinance was passed for that purpose. To understand this article, it must be observed, that in the beginning of May last, both Houses perceiving some motions in the army, thought proper to seclude the Militia of London, and put it into such hands as they could confide in. To that end, they passed an ordinance the 4th of May, for choosing a new committee of the Militia of London, by which means none were admitted into this committee, or any office of the Militia, but Presbyterians, entirely devoted to the party. This change it was, that both Houses repealed, at the army's request, and restored the former commissioners.

The Presbyterian-party, who had great credit in the city, and possessed all the posts, could not, without extreme regret, behold the Parliament's condescension to the army, that is, to the Independents. They saw that party daily increase, and in condition to give law to the Parliament itself. For this reason, the rigid Presbyterians, seconded by the Common-council of London, formed an engagement to assist one another, and oppose the army to the utmost of their power, upon a supposition, that the army intended to subvert what had been hitherto done to settle the peace of the Kingdom. The engagement publicly subscribed in London, was as follows:

A solemn Engagement of the Citizens, Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers of the Train'd bands, and Auxiliaries, the young Men, and Apprentices of the Cities of London and Westminster, Sea-Commanders, Seamen, and Watermen; together with divers others, the Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers, within the lines of communication, and parishes mentioned in the weekly bills of mortality.

The two Houses had no sooner advice of this engagement, but they published by beat of drum, and sound of trumpet, a prohibition to sign it. On the other hand, the General loudly complained to the Parliament's Commissioners, and desired them to put a speedy stop to the agitations in London, which tended to rekindle the war. At the same time, he ordered a strict inquiry to be made in the army after all cavaliers, who had born arms for the King, or were suspected to be of his party, with a command to dismiss them forthwith.

For two or three days there was a great commotion in London: Assemblies were held, Soldiers lifted, and orders given them to be ready upon the first notice. The Common-Council received two Petitions, one from a great number of substantial Citizens, the other from the young men and apprentices (1), to desire, "That the Militia might be continued, as settled by ordinance of the 4th of May." Whereupon the Common-Council represented to the Commons in a petition, "That having taken notice of the pleasure of both Houses for constituting, by ordinance dated the 23d of July, a new Committee for the Militia of the City of London, and for determining of a former ordinance for the same, dated the 4th of May last, they could not but call to mind, how far both Houses of Parliament had formerly honoured the City, when they first established the Committee for the Militia, to take the sense of this Court before they finally resolved thereupon; which confidence the petitioners are not conscious to themselves to have forfeited. And next being sensible, what a general distemper this sudden change hath already made, and is like to make, in the City, they could not but earnestly pray, that the Militia which was established by ordinance of the 4th of May last may be restored."

The Parliament was not a little embarrassed in the present juncture, considering the impossibility of contenting at the same time, the army and the City, whose desires were diametrically opposite. It is certain, most of the Members were Presbyterians, and consequently ill-affected to the army. Had it been in their choice, they would have declared against and disbanded the army according to their intention. But since the army's approach to the City, the wisest, who were the majority, had thought it proper to comply, not seeing how the army could be opposed, if they proceeded to violence, as was very likely. But there was a good number of others who were for running all hazards rather than see the Independents triumph. Mean while, these last privately cherished the commotions in the City, imagining, the assistance they might receive from London, was sufficient to resist all attempts of the army. This was likewise the opinion of the Common-Council, the populace, and some general Officers, as Sir William Waller, Poyns, and Massey, who were removed by the new Model, and were then in London. The only point therefore was to induce the Parliament to join with them, and take vigorous resolutions against the army. But as there was no likelihood of prevailing by fair means, it was resolved to use force.

To that end, July the 26th, a great number of young men, and apprentices came to Westminster, and presented a petition to the House of Commons, desiring:

1. That the ordinance of the 23d of July for change of the Militia of London, be immediately repealed.
2. That the City may be vindicated against a late pretended Declaration, that those are traitors who shall act to get subscriptions, and that it may be revoked.
3. That both Houses do presently make an order, for calling in all absent Members, especially the eleven late accused Members, against whom there has been nothing proved to this day.

These demands were such, considering the present juncture, that it was no wonder much time was spent in debating by both Houses. But the people without, growing impatient, and perceiving, these debates were intended only to amuse them, made a great noise in the outer rooms. Some knocked at the door of the House. Others threw in stones at the windows of the House of Peers. In a word, they very plainly showed they would not suffer the two Houses to rise, before they had received satisfaction. At last, both Houses seeing it would be in vain to resist the multitude, who threatened to tear them in pieces, voted,

1. That the ordinance of the 23d of July, for settling the Militia of London, and the Declaration of the 24th of the same intent, be null and void."

This done the House of Commons adjourned till next day. But the multitude constrained the Speaker and Members to resume their places, and desired them to vote, That the King should come to London; which was done accordingly. On the morrow both Houses being met, adjourned to the 30th.

On the 28th, the Common-Council received a letter from the General, expressing his good affection and tender care of the City, but withal his great dislike of the petition, and the means used to promote it. At the same time, many young men and others attended the Common-Council, declaring their readiness to support the just privileges of the City [against all Opposers.] Whereupon a letter was sent by a messenger to the General, and six Commissioners appointed to follow the next morning. In the letter, "They declared their inclination to peace, in treating him, that the army might not advance, nor intermeddle with the rights and privileges of the City, Whitelock, conceiving that the strengthening the City for the safety thereof, was no just cause to provoke the soldiers: And as for the Petition, the Parliament had already declared their sense of it, and therefore it was needless for them to do it, and the rather for that it had never been formally presented to them."

Mean while, the Common-Council having received intelligence that the army was advancing towards London, orders were given for the trained-bands to go to their works, and for all that could bear arms to appear the next morning at several places.

Both Houses meeting the 30th of July, the two Speakers did not appear, which obliged them to chuse others in their room (2). With the Speakers, a good number of Members of both Houses were also departed from London, without any one's knowing whither. The absence of these members who were all friends to the army, rendered the contrary party so superior, that the Commons voted the same day, That the King should come to London: That the Militia of the City should have full power to raise such forces as they should think fit, for the defense thereof: That they should chuse a commander in chief to be approved by the House, and such commander to present other officers, to be approved by the Militia. After that the Committee made choice of Major-General Massey to command in chief, and ordered, that all Reformadoes and other officers should the next day appear to be listed in St. James's fields, and the forces already listed to be put into a regimental way.

The same day, the Common-Council received a letter from General Fairfax, dated the day before, wherein he spoke very sharply of the tumult of the 26th, and of the violence upon the Parliament. He said, the guard sent from the city, not only neglected their duty, but that divers of the Common-Council greatly encouraged the seditious. That they had not kept their word with the army, which, upon their assurance to secure the Parliament from any attempt, had removed to that distance from the city. That he could not but look on them as accountable to the Kingdom, for the present interruptions of the hopeful way of peace and settlement of the nation, if by their care and industry the chief actors in the late tumults were not detected and given up to justice.

On the other hand, the city published an apology by way of Declaration or Manifesto, setting forth, "The army's furnishing of the King at Holmby, without its being known by what authority, and under what pretences; and their keeping his royal person ever since, notwithstanding his surprisal was disowned by the General for himself and all the officers about him, and for the body of the army. That the privileges of Parliament had been violated by the army's causing the eleven members to withdraw, and by interposing in the Militia of London, which was subject to no other cognizance but of the King and Parliament." There were several other things in this Manifesto, which insinuated that the army's ill designs were but too evident. They concluded with protesting, that "they sincerely desire a happy and speedy Peace by the settlement of true Religion, by re-establishing his Majesty's just rights, by upholding all lawful privileges of a free Parliament, by maintaining the fundamental laws of the land, by restoring the Subject to his just liberty, and by freeing this long-oppressed Kingdom from all taxes, and the enforced free-quarters towards the maintenance of an army, which hath long had no visible enemy to encounter."

Both Houses also writ to the General, that though he had given them no account of the motion of his army, yet they understood, he had ordered his forces to march towards London, on pretence of defending the Houses from the danger of tumults; upon which account they thought fit to let him know, that as they could not but have a deep sense of the undue liberty which some apprentices and others had taken, to violate the freedom of Parliament, so they doubted not, but the sense of so great an offence would at last strike those that were accessory thereto with a detestation of any such practices for the future: And that as the Houses could not imagine, these disorders had the allowance of the city of London, so they had since received full satisfaction by the strict orders published by the Common-Council for preventing and suppressing of tumults, and by their declaration, that they should sit with freedom and security from any disturbances for the future. And therefore they saw no cause to command the army to come to their assistance, but rather judged (by the distractions raised at the news thereof) that the army's approach was like to produce great mischief, and cast the whole Kingdom into confusion. That for prevention of these dangers, they had sent him an express order to withdraw his army, requiring him to give exact obedience thereto.

The same day the Commons voted, that the eleven accused members should be received into the House; accordingly most of them came and took their places on the morrow (1).

On the 13th, the two Houses published an ordinance, enabling the committee of the Militia of London to punish such as did not repair to their colours, and to chuse a Major-General, or any other officer for the forces raised or to be raised within the City of London; and Maffey, Waller, and Poyntz were employed in forming regiments and companies.

Though the Parliament and City made great preparations, the army were under no apprehensions. They knew, that two or three days were not sufficient to discipline an army levied in haste in the city, and enable it to withstand twenty thousand victorious troops, well supplied with arms, ammunition, and ordnance. They continued therefore their march to the general rendezvous at Hounslow-Heath, within twelve miles of London. Mean while, the General delivered to the Parliament's commissioners, certain proposals to be negotiated between the Parliament and army, for settling the peace of the Kingdom. At the same time, he put into their hands a declaration by the council of war, wherein the officers said, Though the late violence done to the Parliament rendered all proceedings in the way of treaty vain and hopeless, till the Parliament should be restored to a condition of freedom, yet they had thought good to make this publick tender of proposals to the consideration of the Kingdom, wherein all men might see the integrity of their intentions, and the bottom of their desires. These proposals related entirely to the publick, without any mixture of the private views of the army.

Mean while, the two Speakers, and the rest of the members of both Houses who had absented themselves, to the number of sixty-six, came to the General, desiring his protection, and saying, that as there was no free sitting for them in the Parliament, they had quitted the Houses for fear of being torn in pieces by the mob. Nothing could be more agreeable to the army than this request, which authorized them, without their being forced to seek other pretences, to march to London to re-instate the members supposed to be driven from the Parliament by the populace. From that time, they would no more own the two Houses for Parliament, but paid to the Speakers and Members who attended them, the same respect as they would have done to the Parliament itself.

It was very strange, that zealous Presbyterians, such as Resolves of the conduct of the Speakers and the regl. were most of the absented members, should have recourse to the army's protection, against the endeavours of their brethren in both Houses and the city, to prevent the Independents from trampling upon Presbyterianism. The most probable reason of this proceeding, I think, is, that these members imagined, their brethren and the Common-council of London were taking wrong measures, and would be infallibly oppressed by the army. It was therefore very natural for men in this belief, to endeavour to avoid being involved in the ruin their party was threatened with, and to chuse rather to continue to dissemble their sentiments, as they had done for some time, than be exposed in vain to inevitable, as they thought, calamities. To this may be added, that among these members there were some Independents, who earnestly laboured to perwade the rest to this course, as we are informed by Ludlow's Memoirs, who was of this number and party. The Lord Clarendon gives another reason, which seems not so natural. He pretends, these members believed, the army designed to restore the King to all his rights, and seeing there were not forces sufficient to hinder it, they were willing to avoid the effects of his vengeance, by concurring with the army in his restoration. But, besides that the event showed, the Independents had no such intention, it is certain they had not hitherto expressed it, unless some civilities paid the King since he was in their hands, are to be considered as real proofs of this intention. Moreover, the army had just given a sensible proof, that their design was not to restore the King to all his rights, by the proposals lately delivered to the Parliament's commissioners, whereby the King's prerogatives were entirely subverted, as will hereafter appear.

However this be, the army improved the desertion of these members to justify their advance towards London, and to show that their aim was only to prevent a new war, which the Members at Westminster, and the Common-Council of London, had a mind to excite. To this purpose, they published a Manifesto, containing the reasons of their marching to London; the substance whereof was to this effect:

"That the army was formerly led, by the grounds then declared, to advance towards the city of London; but having received from the Parliament and city some hopes of satisfaction, they yielded a speedy compliance to their desires for their removal to a farther distance. And being in this secure way, and labouring after the sudden settlement of the Kingdom, they had even brought to perfection, particular proposals to be sent to the Parliament, for a final conclusion of all their troubles; but the Kingdom's enemies being most vigilant to frustrate those good intentions of theirs, had endeavoured to cast the Kingdom into a new and bloody war: And for that end had procured the under-hand lifting of several reformados, and others, and contrived a wicked and treasonable combination; as it was sufficiently manifested by a declaration passed thereupon by both Houses of Parliament the 23d of July last, for the prevention of the disturbances that were like to ensue thereupon; from which kind of disorders the city had been well preserved, during the space of almost four years, whilst the Militia was in the hands of the old commissioners, whereby it appeared, there was cause for the army to intreat the Parliament, that the Militia might be returned into the hands it was in before.

"That those old commissioners of the Militia were not only persons without all exception, but also men of whom the Kingdom had had above four years experience in the faithful discharge of their trust, and that were always most desirous of a peace. Yet, on a sudden, this trust which they had so faithfully discharged so long, was taken out of their hands, and put into the hands of others, some whereof had been very cool in the service of the Parliament; and this was pressed, and in a manner forced upon the Parliament, with the utmost importunity. These things mislived great cause of suspicion, that that alteration of the Militia was in order to make the terms of the peace, and agreement

1) It was likewise declared, That the Ordinance of the 19th of July, which put under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax all the land forces, did not extend to the Train-bands, Garrisons, &c. And this Declaration was ordered to be printed and published in London, by sound of trumpet.

1647. "with the King, more suitable to the private undertakings of some men, than to the publick welfare of the whole Kingdom. But this design discovered itself more clearly, in that at the same time that the alteration of the Militia of London was set on foot, the same persons with as much earnestness pressed for the disbanding of the army, before any thing was settled for the security and liberty of the Kingdom. At the same time, the Common-council was new modelized, a Lord-Mayor chosen that might suit with the present design, and divers persons were left out of the Common-Council and Militia of eminent deserts and fidelity, and others brought into their rooms, that had either testified an ill affection, or little affection to the Parliament and their cause. That the honour of the Parliament was continually trampled under foot, and their authority affronted by every rabble of women, apprentices, reformadoes and soldiers, till at length it was risen to the height of monstrous violence against the Parliament, that they might set themselves on work, and the Kingdom on fire again. That at length, the design appeared open-faced, and though the Militia was made the principal ground of the quarrel, yet the pressing so much the King's coming to London to confirm the same, shewed that the Militia was desired but in order to that design, and to force the Parliament to such terms of peace as they pleased.

"That the interest of the Common-Council, in their change of the Militia, was claimed as the birth-right of the City of London; but such a claim could not justly be held up against both Houses of Parliament: For then who should be master of the Parliament's freedom and resolutions? And who should be masters of the birth-rights of the whole Kingdom, when there should be no army on foot?

"That the army discerning how intimate some of the new Militia were with some of the eleven accused Members, and how forward they were to comply and act with them in their endeavours to raise a new war, found it necessary to desire, That the Militia might be put into the hands wherein it was formerly, that the army being secured by that means from danger, might with the more confidence retire further from the City. Which, according to their desire, being restored again into the hands of the old Commissioners, several petitions were presented to the Common-Council of the City of London, in the name of the apprentices and others, importing their desires, that the Militia of the City might continue in the hands of the former commissioners, according to the ordinance of the 4th of May last; Whereupon the Common-Council of the City presents their Petitions to both Houses for changing the Militia, wherein the House of Lords refuse to alter their resolutions; the House of Commons answered, they would take it into consideration the next morning; notwithstanding which, the City and Kingdom could not be ignorant, with what rage and insolency the tumult of apprentices the same day forced both Houses; they blocked up their doors, threatening them, if they granted not their desires; and in this outrageous manner continued at the House eight hours together; after which, the House rising, the Speaker, and many Members going out, they forced them back again into the House. And during the time of that violence, Westminster-Hall and the Palace-Yard, was filled with Reformadoes, and other ill-affected persons designed to back them. After that, the Houses being adjourned, the apprentices printed and posted a paper in several places of the City, requiring all their fellows to be early at the Parliament the next morning, for that they intended to adjourn by seven of the Clock, and that for a month. Thus the Speakers, with many of the Members, were driven away from the Parliament. All men therefore might judge of the justness of the cause the army had engaged themselves in. And if after so much blood and treasure spent, all that they were to hope for, and rest in, was only what the King had granted in his message of the 11th of May last, what must become of the Kingdom? &c. (1)

"Lastly, the army declared, that they would stand by all such Members of either House of Parliament, as were forced to absent themselves from Westminster, and use their utmost and speedy endeavours, that they might with freedom and security sit there again. They likewise declared against the choice of a new Speaker, and against all orders, votes, or resolutions forced from the House on the 26th of July last, and such as should be passed till those Members were restored again: That they thought themselves bound to bring to condign punishment the authors and fomenters of the violence done to the Parliament, and expected that the people of London would deliver up to them the eleven Members impeached. But if any in the City should engage themselves to protect those Members, and so put the Kingdom again into a war, the blood must be laid to the account of such persons.

"And whereas some had possessed the minds of men, that they gaped only after the plunder of the great and wealthy city of London; they declared from their hearts, that they abhorred the thought thereof: But as they were informed, that the city of Westminster, and the borough of Southwark, were brought into a hard condition, by claiming a right not to be subjected to a Militia, without their own consent, they promised to assist them for the obtaining of their just desires and immunities.

"That when these things were duly settled, they should be as ready to assure unto the King his just rights and authority, as any that pretended it never to lose."

The next day, the army being drawn together on Hounslow-Heath (2), the Common-council of London began to fear the danger to which the city would be exposed, if the army should force the lines, which was but too likely, and this apprehension caused them to take more moderate resolutions (3). So taking occasion from the army's late declaration, they writ to the General, that understanding by the declaration, that the army's intention was only to restore the absent members to their places in the Parliament, the city was ready to concur with them in their design. That accordingly, he should find all ports and passages open, and for removing all misunderstanding, they had recalled their late declaration. The General answered, That he wished all the forts on the west-side of the city were delivered to him, and he was immediately obeyed. After that, he writ to the Common-council, that the preserving of the privileges of the Parliament, and securing the members from violence, had been the sole cause of his near approach to their city.

The 6th of August, the General, preceded by some regiments of Horse, and attended by the two old Speakers, and the members who had absent themselves, came to Westminster, and alighted at Sir Abraham Williams's house in New Palace-Yard. He staid there some time, whilst the two Speakers (4), and the rest of the members repaired to their respective Houses.

Presently after, the House of Peers passed an ordinance for making General Fairfax Constable of the Tower, with power to name a deputy, to which the Commons consented. After that, the General was desired to come to the Parliament, where he received the thanks of both Houses. The same day, the Parliament ordered, that the 12th should be a day of Thanksgiving to God, for restoring the members of both Houses to their just privileges, without the effusion of blood, and that a gratuity of a month's pay should be given to the non-commissioned officers and soldiers for this great service. The following days were spent in approving and ratifying what the army had done. But this was not all. The Lords demanded two things, which the Commons very much opposed. The first was, the making null all Acts, done from the 26th of July, to the 6th of August. The Commons were ready to give their consent, provided it was without declaring them illegal. This dispute held till the 20th, when the Commons passed at length the ordinance demanded by the Peers, but with this restriction: That no person shall be impeached or punished, for his acting by, or upon, the said votes, orders, or ordinances, unless he shall be found guilty of contriving or abetting the visible force put upon the Parliament, or of entering into, or promoting the late engagement, for the bringing the King to the city, upon the terms and conditions expressed in his Majesty's letters of the 12th of May last.

The second thing desired by the Lords, was, that it should be declared, the Parliament was not free from the 26th of July, to the 6th of August, and that the members

(2) At this rendezvous were present the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, Kent, the Lords Grey of Wilkes, Warwick, Worcester, &c. and others, about fourteen Lords; the Speaker, and about a hundred Members of the House of Commons. The army, consisting of about 10,000 men, and Foot, being drawn up in battalia with muskets, the General, accompanied with these Lords and Commons, and other Gentlemen, took a view of the Army, from Regiment to Regiment, who received them with great acclamations of the Soldiers, crying, Long live the Parliament. The Prince Elector Palatine came also and viewed the Army, being received by the General with great respect. W. 263. Rapin.

(3) When a tumult came in, whilst the City Militia and Common-Council were sitting, and brought news, that the Army made a Bill to alter the Bill of the 12th of May, they agreed to send the General an humble Letter. W. 263. Rapin.

1647. who assembled at Westminster, in the absence of the Speakers, should be expelled the Parliament and punished. This question being debated a whole day in the House of Commons, was carried in the negative, but by three voices (1). The Lords insisted upon this point merely out of compliance to the army, who, by a remonstrance to the Parliament, had demanded the same thing, declaring, they could not suffer such members as sat and voted during the absence of the Speakers, to intrude themselves into the Parliament before they had given satisfaction to their respective Houses. Nevertheless, this affair was carried no farther. Only seven Lords (2), with the Lord-Mayor, several Aldermen, and some officers of the Militia were accused of High-treason for being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July, which was called, intending to excite a new war.

Whilst these things passed between the Parliament and Army, the King was not only very quiet, but even entertained great hopes from this division, and flattered himself, that the army would declare for him. Their civility and complaisance to him seemed to promise him a happier state, than when in the hands of the Parliament. Three of his chaplains (3) were allowed to come to him, and celebrate divine service, after the manner of the Church of England, and all his old servants and domesticks had liberty to see and speak with him. Berkley, Apsburnham, Capel, the Marquis of Ormond himself, who had at last surrendered Dublin to the Parliament, saw him as often as they pleased in public or private, and the two first were now in his service. The Scotch commissioners residing at London, frequently visited him, and expressed a great desire to serve him. As they knew, that the Independents were sworn enemies of their Nation, they began to perceive, it was their interest to join with the King against their common enemies. Mean while, the civilities shown the King were but the effect of the policy of Cromwell and his associates (4). They were not ignorant how the Parliament and city of London stood affected to them, and were perfwaded, that after all, the Presbyterians would chuse rather to agree with the King, than see the Independents triumph. To prevent this union it was, that they had caused the King to be removed from Holmby, without either the General-officers, or the body of the army appearing in it, to a place where his person was in their power. On the other hand, the King was extremely careful by them, and even put in hopes of a speedy agreement with the army, as well to divert him from the thoughts of uniting with the Parliament, as to deprive the Presbyterians of the hope of such an union. In every declaration and remonstrance of the army, there was always something inserted to express their desire, that the King might be restored to his just rights. But it was ever with this restriction, when the affairs of the Government should be fully settled, that is, in the manner they desired, and they knew, it would then be easy to find occasion to quarrel with the King, and retract what they seemed to promise him.

The King was deceived by this policy. As he saw himself courted by both parties, he imagined, they could not be without him, and that he should quickly be able to incline the scale to which side he pleased. Nay, he fancied for some time, that the two parties would accept him for mediator. In this imagination he expressed a regard for both, and told them by turns, though very secretly, he would be guided by their counsels. Mean while, as he mortally hated the Presbyterians, he was much more desirous to join with the army, if they would but have granted him tolerable conditions, as they made him expect. Nevertheless, he lifted to the proposals of the Scotch commissioners, to put himself under the protection of the Presbyterians and Scots, and thereby hoped to be safe, however the contentions between the Parliament and army might end. In the mean time, he suffered himself to be amused by Cromwell, and Ireton, who, on pretence they were suspected by both Houses, seldom visited him; but however, acquainted him with their intentions, by means of some officers, who could converse more freely with him, or his confidants. Though he was used very civilly, he was narrowly watched, and at the very time he thought himself arbiter of the two parties, was really a prisoner. Since his removal from Holmby, he had followed the motions of the army, and resided sometimes in a town, and sometimes at a Country-house, according as the army thought fit. At last, when the army had their rendezvous on Hounslow-Heath, in order to march to London, he was conducted to Hampton-Court (5).

The revolution, which happened within a few days, and which brought the Parliament in subjection to the army, proved fatal to the King. He had quickly cause to perceive, Cromwell and Ireton had only amused him with vain hopes. The army was no sooner master of the Parliament and city, but the King saw himself not only neglected, but even treated more hardly than ever. The same respect was no longer paid him, and his guards would scarce suffer his servants to confer with him in private. In short, he was left a long while at Hampton-Court, without mention of any accommodation, whilst his words, his actions, and the persons that came to visit him, were carefully watched. Nay, the Scotch commissioners were hindered from seeing him, of which they complained to no purpose. But before I proceed to speak of the King, and his circumstances, it will be necessary to relate what passed in the army and Parliament, whilst the King was left at Hampton-Court almost forgotten, though he served sometimes for pretence to several papers.

When the army resolved to oppose the Parliament's design to disband them, they pretended, they would meddle only in their own affairs, without concerning themselves with the government of Church or State. The demand of arrears was at first the only point whereon they founded their refusal of being cashiered. After that, finding it was not impossible to give them satisfaction upon that article, they demanded reparation for their honour, and a full vindication from the pretended crimes, on which the Parliament had grounded their declaration against the authors of the first petition. Then they required, that the Parliament should solemnly declare, it was the privilege of the Subject, and of the army in particular, to present petitions. After which, they formed the councils of war, and agitators, who not content with desiring things relating to the army, inserted in their remonstrances, sundry articles concerning the Government. Lastly, the King was removed from Holmby by the authority, as it was pretended, of the army, though the General affirmed, that neither himself, nor the other General-officers, nor the body of the army, were privy to it; and by this same authority, how civil as it appeared, was the King kept in the quarters of the army.

As soon as the army had the King in their power, they pretended to a right of settling the government of the Kingdom with the Parliament. They nominated commissioners to treat upon that subject, with those of the Parliament. In short, just as they were preparing to march to London, the General delivered to the Parliament's commissioners, propositions from the army, to settle the Government, of which, not so much as one related to the particular concerns of the army. The propositions were these:

Articles proposed by the army, to be treated on by the Parliament's Commissioners.

"I. THAT (things hereafter proposed being provided for by this Parliament) a certain provision may, by Act of Parliament, be set for the ending of this Parliament, such period to be put within a year at most, and in the same act provision to be made for the succession and constitution of Parliaments in future, as followeth:

"1. That Parliaments may biennially be called and meet at a certain day.

"2. Each biennial Parliament to sit a hundred and twenty days certain, and no Parliament to sit past two hundred and forty days from their first meeting, or some other limited number of days; upon the expiration whereof each Parliament to dissolve of course, if not otherwise dissolved sooner.

"3. The King, in the intervals betwixt biennial Parliaments, to call a Parliament extraordinary, provided it meet above seventy days before the next biennial day, and be dissolved at least sixty days before the same.

"4. That this and each succeeding biennial Parliament, at or before adjournment or dissolution thereof, may appoint Committees during the interval for such purposes

(1) The question put was, Whether it should be declared, what was done from the 26th of July to the 6th of August to be forced, and that sitting no free Parliament? Which was carried in the Negative. The other part of the question, as put by Stephens, was not debated at this time.

(2) The Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Willingby of Parham, Harlow, Marnard, Berkley, with the Earls of Lincoln and Middlesex. Whitelock, p. 268.

(3) The seven were named to come to him; namely, Dr. Selden, Morley, Sanderfon, and Hommond. See Clarendon, Tom. 3, p. 38.

(4) The ground of their civilities was, to engage him and the Cavaliers to their side, after they had made the Parliament, the Scots, and the City of London, their enemies. Ludlow, Tom. 1, p. 194.

(5) June 24, he was removed from Newmarket to Rushmore; the 26th, he came to Hayfield house in Hertfordshire; July 1, to Windsor; July 3, to Caversham, a House of the Lord Croft's, near Reading; July 22, to the Earl of Devonshire's House at Lattimer; thence to Woburn, the Earl of Bedford's; and then to Stoke-pygie and Outland's. Rushworth, Tom. 6, p. 592, 593, 603, 604, 659. Whilst he was at Caversham, July 15, his Children, now under the Earl of Northumberland's care, were permitted to dine with him at Maidenhead, and afterwards to go and stay with him two days at Caversham. Prince James had been in the Parliament's hands ever since the surrender of Oxford. This favour was denied him whilst he was at Holmby. Rushworth, Tom. 6, p. 593, 612, 613, 645.

(6) Clarendon, Tom. 3, p. 38, 43, 44. — Concerning this interview, Ludlow relates the following remarkable story. Cromwell meeting soon after Sir John Berkley, told him, that he had lately seen the tenderest sight that ever his eyes beheld, which was the interview between the King and his Children; that he (Cromwell) wept plentifully at the remembrance thereof, saying, that never man was so abused as he, in his sinister opinion of the King, who, he thought, was the most upright and conscientious of his Kingdom. Ludlow, Tom. 1, p. 299.

1647. "as are in any of these propofals referred to fuch Committees.

"5. That all Counties may have a number of Parliament Members allotted to their choice, proportionable fuperintend and direct the feveral and particular powers of the Militia laft mentioned.

"5. That the fame Council may have power as the King's Privy-Council, for and in all foreign negotiations; provided that the making of war or peace with any other Kingdom or State, fhall not be without the advice and confent of Parliament.

"6. That the faid power of the Council of State be put into the hands of truftly and able perfons now to be agreed on, and the fame perfons to continue in that power (fi bene fe gerint) for a certain term not exceeding feven years.

"7. That there be a fufficient eftablifhment now provided for the falary of the forces both in England and Ireland, the eftablifhment to continue until, two months after the meeting of the firft biennial Parliament.

"IV. That an Aft be paffed for difpofing the great offices for ten years by the Lords and Commons in Parliament; or by fuch Committees as they fhall appoint for that purpofe in the intervals (with fubmiffion to the approbation of the next Parliament) and after ten years they to nominate three, and the King out of that number to appoint one for the fucceffion upon any vacancy.

"V. That an Aft be paffed, for reftaining of any Peers, made fince the 21ft day of May 1642, or to be hereafter made, from having any power to fit or vote in Parliament without confent of both Houfes.

"VI. That an Aft be paffed for recalling and making void all declarations and other proceedings againft the Parliament, or againft any that have afted by, or under their authority in the late war, or in relation to it; and that the ordinance for indemnity may be confirmed.

"VII. That an Aft be paffed for making void all Grants, &c. under the Great Seal, fince the time that it was conveyed away from the Parliament, (except as in the Parliament's propofitions) and for making thofe valid that have been or fhall be paffed under the Great Seal, made by the authority of both Houfes of Parliament.

"VIII. That an Aft be paffed for confirmation of the treaties between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland; and for appointing Confervators of the Peace betwixt them.

"IX. That the ordinance for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries be confirmed by Aft of Parliament; provided his Majefty's revenue be not damaged therein, nor thofe that laft held offices in the fame, left without reparation fome other way.

"X. An Aft to declare void the ceffation of Ireland, &c. and to leave the profecution of that war to the Lords and Commons in the Parliament of England.

"XI. An Aft to be paffed to take away all coercive power, authority and jurisdiction of Bifhops—extending to any civil penalties upon any, &c.

"XII. That there be a repeal of all Acts or clauses in any Aft enjoining the ufe of the Book of Common Prayer, and impofing any penalty for neglect thereof, and for not coming to Church, or for meeting eliewhere; and fome other provision to be made for difcov-ering of Papifts, Priests, Jefuits, &c.

"XIII. That the taking of the Covenant be not enforced upon any; but all orders or ordinances tending to that purpofe to be repealed.

"XIV. That (the thing here before propofed, being provided, for fecuring the Rights, Liberties, &c. of the Kingdom) his Majefty's perfon, his Queen and Royal Ifue may be reftored to a condition of fafety, honour, and freedom in this Nation, without diminution to their perfonal Rights, or further limitation to the exercise of regal power than according to the particulars foregoing.

"XV. For the matter of compofition, &c.
N. B. There are under this head fix articles, which cannot be well underftood, without knowing the particulars of an Aft wherein Delinquents were placed under feveral heads or qualifications, and their compo-fition fettled accordingly. But the knowledge of that can be of no ufe at prefent.

"XVI. That there may be a general Aft of Oblivion, &c.

"That fuch of the King's party who fhall appear to have expreffed, or fhall hereafter exprefs their good affections to the peace and welfare of the Kingdom, and to hinder the embroiling of the fame in a new war, may be freed and exempted from compofitions, or to pay but one year's revenue, or a twentieth part.

"Next to the propofals aforefaid for the prefent fettling of a peace, the army defires, that no time may be loft by the Parliament for difpatch of other things tending to the welfare, eafe, and juft fatisfaction of the Kingdom, and in fpecial manner:

"I. That the liberty of the People to reprent their grievances and defires by way of petition may be cleared and vindicated.

"II. That the common grievances of the People may be fpeedily confidered of, and effectually redressed; and in particular,

"1. That the Excife may be taken off from fuch commodities, whereon the poor people of the land do ordinarily live.

"2. That the oppreffions and encroachments of Foreft Laws may be prevented for the future.

"3. All Monopolies and reftraints to the freedom of trade to be taken off.

"4. That 1647.

"4. That a course may be taken to rectify the inequality of rates lying upon several Counties.

"5. The present, unequal, troublesome, and contentious way of Ministers maintenance by Tithes to be considered of, and some remedy applied.

"6. That the rules and course of Law, and the officers of it may be so reduced and reformed, as that all suits and questions of right may be more clear and certain in the issues, and not so tedious nor chargeable in the proceedings as now.

"7. That prisoners for debt may not, by embracing imprisonment, or any other ways, have advantage to defraud their creditors: And that such prisoners for debt, who have not wherewith to pay, may be freed from imprisonment.

"8. That none may be compelled to answer unto questions tending to the accusing of themselves, or their nearest relations in criminal causes; and no man's life to be taken away under two witnessess.

"9. That consideration may be had of all Statutes, and the laws or customs of Corporations, imposing any oaths so far as they may extend to the molestation or enfeebling of religious and peaceable People, merely for non-conformity in Religion.

"11. That the large power given to Committees or Deputy-Lieutenants, during the late times of war and distraction, may speedily be recalled and made void, and such powers of that nature as shall appear necessary to be continued, may be put into a regulated way, and left to as little arbitrariness as the nature and necessity of things will bear.

"IV. That the Kingdom may be righted, and satisfied in point of accounts for the vast sums that have been levied.

"V. That provision may be made for payment of arrears to the army, and the rest of the soldiers of the Kingdom: and in the next place for payment of the publick debts and damages of the Kingdom; and that to be performed, first, to such persons whose debts or damages are great and their estates small, so as they are thereby reduced to a difficulty of subsistence: In order to all which (continue they) we shall speedily offer some further particulars, which we hope will be of good use towards publick satisfaction."

These proposals show, the army did not mean to leave to the Parliament the sole power of settling the Government, though when they were delivered to the commissioners, they had not yet subjected the Parliament and City, as they did some days after. How much more therefore should they think themselves intitled to have a share in this settlement, after they had both Houses at command? Certainly, if the army, had really desired, that the Government should be settled, according to their proposals, there could not be a fairer opportunity, and the Parliament would neither have been able nor have dared to oppose it. But, on the contrary, it is very likely, the army's design, in delivering these proposals, was only to retard the settlement by raising difficulties, which would require time to be removed. For instance, the XIth article, which supposed the restoring of the Bishops, and the XIIIth, which left every one free to take or not to take the Covenant, were directly contrary to the pretensions of the Presbyterians. It was not for the interest of the Independents that the Government should be settled in the manner they proposed: but it was for their advantage to dazzle the People, and make them believe, the army desired only the peace and safety of the publick, though in effect nothing was farther from the thoughts of the leaders and managers. This evidently appears, in that afterwards, they never troubled themselves to press the two Houses to proceed to this settlement. On the other hand, the Parliament was yet the same it had been for some time, that is, almost wholly Presbyterian, and consequently enemy of the Independents, though obliged to show the contrary. The Earl of Manchester, Speaker of the House of Lords, was Cromwell's sworn enemy, though he had been the first to apply to the army for protection. The city of London was in the same disposition as the Parliament, and, far from soliciting the settlement proposed by the army, they were very glad it should never be mentioned, in expectation that time would afford some opportunity to settle the Government without the intervention of the soldiery. It is therefore no wonder, this affair should be neglected, when neither army, nor Parliament, nor City, wished to see it accomplished. Some steps however were now and then taken to make the publick believe it was intended. But Cromwell and the other heads of the Independents were very far from being willing to leave it to the Parliament for ten years, to manage the affairs of the Kingdom as they pleased, to order the Militia by sea and land, and raise what money they should think necessary. Much less would they have cared to let the People choose every two years new representatives. All these things were only to throw dust in the People's eyes. The Independents had a mind to be superior, as they were at length, and all their proceedings, though covered with the pretence of the publick good, tended solely to that end. The design of the Presbyterians, Parliament, and City of London, was to ruin the Independent-party, and the army their supporters. But as they were not sufficiently strong to effect it, their project was to join with the King and Scotland, provided they could prevail with his Majesty to abolish Episcopacy. This is what was secretly contriving at London and Edinburgh, whilst endeavours were used to amuse the army by affected delays on their demand of pay and arrears, and whilst the City of London declined to make the necessary advances, in order to render the army odious, by obliging them to oppress the People for want of pay. The army was yet ignorant of the secret practices against them in London. They incessantly demanded their pay, and the Parliament favourably received their demands. Nay, they passed votes to grant them their desires; but some difficulty always occurred to retard the performance, or if they were paid any money it was but a small part of their arrears.

Three other affairs also employed the Parliament and Army for some time, and served for pretence to amuse. The first was, to settle what forces should be sent to Ireland; the second, how many troops were to be maintained in England; the third, to disband the supernumeraries.

Upon the first article, it was resolved to send into Ireland six thousand foot, four thousand horse, and five hundred Dragoons; and that the Parliament's Commissioners should confer with the General concerning the sending these forces, and the officers that were to command them.

Upon the second, it was ordered, there should be maintained in England, seven thousand two hundred Horse, eighteen thousand Foot, and one thousand Dragoons. It was pretended, these forces were continued in England to relieve those in Ireland in case of need. But it is likely, the army would not bear to be considerably lessened.

Upon the third, it was resolved, that all the supernumeraries should be paid and dismissed.

But these things were executed very slowly by reason of several unexpected affairs, of which it will be necessary to speak.

Since the army had thought themselves out of danger from the Parliament and city, their respect to the King was so diminished, that it was easy for him to perceive, he had nothing to expect from them, and that Cromwell had only amused him, the better to accomplish his own designs. Besides the visible alteration in the behaviour of those who had the custody of him, he had many other proofs of ill designs against him. In the first place, the army had sent him privately some propositions for peace, much worse than those presented to him at Newcastle; but he had rejected them with indignation (1), which the army very much resented. Secondly, Cromwell had very sharply reproached Ashburnham, who was then the King's confidant, that notwithstanding the army's regard for his Majesty, he had secretly treated with the commissioners of Scotland to excite that Kingdom against the army. This reproach inspired the King with the more dread, as it was true, that he had privately treated with the Scotch commissioners, though he had concluded nothing with them, and could not conceive how Cromwell came to know it. He was therefore apprehensive, the army would assassinate, or poison him, to free themselves from the fear of his agreeing with the Presbyterians. On the other hand, Major Huntington, who had been employed by Cromwell, to amuse the King with several private messages, finding at length he had been the instrument to deceive that unfortunate Prince, warned him, that Cromwell was not sincere, and would destroy him if he was not prevented. Shortly after he threw up his commission, and would serve no longer in the army. Nay, he went farther; for after quitting the service, he offered to discover to the Parliament, Cromwell's ill practices, but they would not hearken to him (2). At last, the King received private notice every day, by indirect and extraordinary ways, that his enemies had ill designs, and he ought to take care of himself (3).

All these things made such an impression upon him, that

(1) When the Proposals were sent to him, he entertained them with very sharp and bitter language.

(2) He delivered in a Paper to the House of Lords, which was produced containing resolutions, that the Army, being the Executors of the great and glorious design of Cromwell's father, should not be troubled with the business of the Kingdom, but that the Army, being the Executors of the great and glorious design of Cromwell's father, should not be troubled with the business of the Kingdom, but that the Army, being the Executors of the great and glorious design of Cromwell's father, should not be troubled with the business of the Kingdom.

(3) The Agitators suspected, that Cromwell, Irons, &c. had carried on a private Treaty with the King, and accordingly endeavoured to wrest him from Cromwell.

1647. he resolved, if possible, to escape out of the hands of the army. But it was not easy to determine where to retire. There was no safety for him in any part of the Kingdom. The Parliament and city of London were at the army's command, and though the Presbyterians had been able to protect him, all he could expect from them was, that they would not attempt upon his life. So, probably, his intention was to transport himself beyond the seas (1). Apsburnham was his only confident, for though he believed Berkley faithful, he had not so good an opinion of his discretion, as to trust him with such a secret. This resolution being taken, the King withdrew very early to his chamber, feigning to be indisposed, and about one in the morning, went out by the back-stairs, and came with Apsburnham and Legg, to the garden-gate, where Berkley waited with horses (2). They rid all night with great speed, as well to escape all pursuers, as to get out of the quarters of the army, and in the mornings, found themselves in the New Forest in Hampshire. Then the King asked Apsburnham, where the ship lay? Apsburnham riding before, as it were to get information, returned in some little time without any news of the ship; at which the King seemed very uneasy. Mean while, as it was not safe for him to stay in the high-ways, he resolved to go to Titchfield, a seat of the Earl of Southampton, where the Earl's Mother then lived with a small family. There he consulted with his three attendants, where he should go. It is said, Apsburnham was the first to advise him to retire to the Isle of Wight, and put himself into the hands of Colonel Hammond the Governor, who was reckoned a man of honour. He must however have known, that Hammond was Cromwell's creature, by whose advice he had married a daughter of John Hampden, and who had lately procured him the government of the Isle of Wight. Notwithstanding these reasons, which should have diverted Apsburnham from giving such advice, he ceased not to persuade the King, who after some objections consented to it, provided Hammond would faithfully promise not to deliver him up, though the Parliament or army should require him, but to give him his liberty to shift for himself, if he was not able to defend him. Pursuant to this resolution, Apsburnham and Berkley repaired to the Isle of Wight to talk with the Governor, who seemed very much surprized (3) when they told him, the King was escaped from Hampton-Court, and was willing to trust his person in his hands, upon the forementioned terms. His answer was, he would do the King all the service that lay in his power; but as he was an inferior officer, he could not promise to disobey his superiors in what they should please to command him. After some fruitless endeavours to obtain a promise from him, he asked where the King was? They told him, he was not very far off, and at last, after some time spent in debate, it was agreed, he should go with them to the King. So they all three went together to Titchfield, and at their arrival, Hammond staid below, and Apsburnham went up to the King's chamber, to acquaint him, that Hammond was in the house, but had not made any promise. Whereupon the King cried out, O Jack thou hast undone me! With which Apsburnham falling into a great passion of weeping, offered to go down and kill Hammond, but the King would not consent to it. In short, the King sending for Hammond, endeavoured to persuade him to promise not to deliver him up, but Hammond still persisted in his first answer. Then the King, not knowing where to go else, and considering there was now perhaps no possible way to get from him, as he had the command of the country, and could call in what help he pleased, resolved to go with him to the Isle of Wight. He was conducted to Carisbrook castle, where Hammond received him with his attendants, with all demonstrations of respect (4).

When a man considers all the circumstances of the King's flight, he can scarce forbear thinking, he was betrayed on this occasion. His design was to go beyond sea, since he asked where the Ship lay, but there was no Ship ready; which was so great an oversight, that Apsburnham can hardly be thought to commit it through negligence or imprudence. Apsburnham is not satisfied with proposing to the King to trust himself with Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, who, according to Major Huntington's information, had resolved to destroy him, but even puts him under the necessity of confiding in him, though he refused to promise him protection. And yet, the Lord Clarendon says very positively, he does not believe the King was betrayed by Apsburnham, nor did his Majesty ever entertain the least jealousy of it. All therefore that can be said in favour of this confident of the King, is, what the Lord Clarendon hints, I mean, That he was outwitted by Cromwell. It would prove for his Majesty's benefit, and his business be the sooner done, that he should withdraw to the Isle of Wight. If this were so, Apsburnham, probably, thinking himself more than the King, had a mind to serve him, whether he would or no, and not to be forced to answer the King's objections, believed to do him a service in concealing the secret, and putting him under an absolute necessity to take a course, which, in his opinion, was not the most proper. In that case, if it be not treachery, it is at least, the greatest presumption and rashness, a Subject can possibly be guilty of to his Prince. It is not easy to guess the reasons that could induce Apsburnham to imagine, the King would be safe in the Isle of Wight. It is to be presumed, he was deceived himself, and his easiness abused, to cause him to credit general promises, which signified nothing, and of which he durst not afterwards complain. Supposing no treachery in what he did, probably, his easiness to be deceived, procured him afterwards a very favorable and much lower than usual composition, which greatly contributed to increase the suspicions already conceived of him.

The Parliament was informed of the King's escape, by a letter from Cromwell, who gave the first notice of it, but without saying where the King was, though in all appearance he knew very well. He also sent a letter, which the King had left upon the table in his room, directed to both Houses. He said in this letter,

"That Liberty being in all times the aim and desire of all men, he had endeavoured to obtain his. He called God to witness, with what patience he had endured a tedious restraint, among men who changed their principles with their condition; who were not ashamed openly to intend the destruction of the Nobility, by taking away their negative Voice, and with whom the Levellers doctrine was rather countenanced than punished. That he thought he was bound, as well by natural as political obligation, to seek his safety, by retiring himself for some time from the public view, both of his friends and enemies; but should earnestly and incessantly endeavour the settling of a safe and well-grounded peace wherever he was. Finally, he desired to be heard with freedom, honour, and safety, and then he would instantly break through his cloud of retirement, and show himself ready to be Pater Patriæ."

The Parliament at first believed, the King was come to conceal himself in London, till he should find an opportunity to escape out of the Kingdom. They even gave orders to search after, and stop his person. But this uncertainty did not last long. On the 15th of November, the Earl of Manchester, Speaker of the House of Lords, received a letter from Colonel Hammond, informing him, that the King, from an apprehension of his life being in danger at Hampton-Court, was come into the Isle of Wight, to put himself under his protection.

The King, as may be observed, speaks in his letter of the principles of the Levellers, which I think incumbent upon me to explain. There had been for some time a new faction in the army, called Levellers, that is, men who declared, "That all degrees of persons should be levelled, and an equality established both in titles and estates, throughout the Kingdom" (5). This was a doctrine, much like that of Mat Tyler's followers in the reign of Richard II. This faction was grown so strong, that they began to make the general officers, and particularly Cromwell, very uneasy, who feared this new party would subvert all his projects if they were suffered to increase, though probably, this spirit was raised by himself. They consisted of private Soldiers and Agitators, whom I have already described. During the contests between the Army and Parliament, the Generals had put no restraint upon these men. They had allowed them to form a separate council, by means of their Agitators, and the opinions of this council were received as being those of the army, because they were agreeable to the sentiments of the general officers. But as soon as the Parliament was subdued, the general officers believed it proper to suppress these councils, and send the Agitators to their respective regiments. This was more easily joined than executed.

their hands. Of this Cromwell gave the King notice, who thereupon resolved to make his escape from Hampton-Court. Ludlow, Tom. i. p. 214. Escape of Cromwell, p. 60, &c. The Lord Holles says, Cromwell was afraid the King should come to an agreement with the Levellers, and so advised him to fly, upon pretence that his life was in danger. Mem. p. 185, &c.

(5) According to some, they only maintained, That no person, of whatever rank, ought to be exempted from the ordinary course of legal proceedings. Life of Cromwell, p. 65.

The soldiers refused to obey, and continued their assemblies and conferences, in spite of their officers, and the General's orders. Hence, probably, they acquired the name of Levellers, because they pretended to have as much right as the Officers and Generals to settle the Government; a principle tending to level all ranks and degrees, and consequently to breed confusion in the Kingdom. The assemblies of the Levellers produced sundry petitions; first, from the agitators of four regiments of Horse, and afterwards of seven regiments of Foot joining with them, wherein they made proposals for settling the Government according to their humour, so that the General Officers were not a little embarrassed. They were afraid the army would divide, at a time when their whole strength depended upon their union. For this reason, they at first bore in some measure with the Levellers; which only increased the evil. At last, the insolence of these men being grown to a monstrous height, Cromwell undertook with the hazard of his life, to free the army and Parliament from them. To that end, having notice that the Levellers were to meet at a certain place, he came unexpectedly, attended with a chosen guard, and asking some questions of those whom he observed most active, and receiving insolent answers, knocked down two or three with his own hand, and briskly charging the rest, so dispersed them, that he took as many as he pleased, whereof he hanged some on the spot, and sent others to London. By two or three such notable encounters, he totally subdued that party, which began to grow very dangerous, and reduced the army to entire obedience. But this was not yet effected, when the King made his escape from Hampton-Court, and therefore he mentions the Levellers in his letter, as a party subsisting (1).

When the King writ this letter to both Houses, he hoped to be quickly out of the power of the army and Parliament, and assuredly expected no answer, since he intended to keep himself concealed. Besides, this letter required no answer, as he did nothing more than express his desire of peace. But finding himself still, contrary to his expectation, in the hands of the army and Parliament, he conceived, his escape from Hampton-Court might be prejudicial to him, and interpreted as a design to hide himself, only to avoid answering the propositions for peace, the Parliament had prepared. For this reason, he resolved to send the following message to both Houses:

Charles Rex,

HIS Majesty is confident, that before this time, his two Houses of Parliament have received the message which he left behind him at Hampton-Court, the eleventh of this month, by which they will have understood the reasons which enforced him to go from thence; as likewise his constant endeavours for the settling of a safe and well-grounded peace, wherefore he should be; and being now in a place where he conceives himself to be at much more freedom and security than formerly, he thinks it necessary, not only for making good of his own professions, but also for the speedy procuring of a peace, in these languishing and distressed Kingdoms, at this time to offer such grounds to his two Houses for that effect, which upon due examination of all interest, may best conduce thereunto.

And because Religion is the best and chiefest foundation of peace, his Majesty will begin with that particular.

That for the abolishing of Archbishops, Bishops, &c. his Majesty clearly professeth, that he cannot give his consent thereunto, both in relation as he is a Christian, and a King; for the first he avows, that he is satisfied in his judgment, that this order was placed in the Church by the Apostles themselves, and ever since their time hath continued in all Christian Churches throughout the world, until this last century of years; and in this Church, in all times of change and reformation it hath been upheld by the wisdom of his ancestors, as the great preserver of doctrine, discipline, and order, in the service of God. As a King at his coronation, he hath not only taken a solemn oath to maintain this order, but his Majesty and his predecessors, in their confirmations of the great Charter, have inseparably woven the right of the Church, into the liberty of the Subjects; and yet he is willing it be provided, that the particular Bishops perform their several duties of their callings, both by their personal residence, and frequent preaching in their personal exercise, no act of jurisdiction or ordination, without the consent of their Presbyters, and will consent, that their powers in all things be so limited, that they be not grievous to the tender consciences of others. He sees no reason why he alone, and those of his judgment, should be pressed to a violation of theirs: Nor can his Majesty consent to the alienation of Church-lands; because it cannot be denied to be a sin of the highest sacrilege; as also that it subverts the intentions of so many pious donors, who have laid a heavy curse upon all such prophane violations, which his Majesty is very unwilling to undergo: And besides the matter of consequence, his Majesty believes it to be a prejudice to the publick good, many of his Subjects having the benefit of renewing leases, at much easier rates, than if those possessions were in the hands of private men, not omitting the discouragement it will be to all learning and industry, when such eminent rewards shall be taken away; which now lye open to the children of the meanest persons. Yet his Majesty considering the great present distempers concerning Church-discipline, and that the Presbyterian-government is now in practice, his Majesty, to eschew confusion, as much as may be, and for the satisfaction of his two Houses, is content, that the said Government be legally permitted to stand in the same condition it now is, for three years; provided that his Majesty, and those of his judgment, or any other, who cannot in conscience submit thereunto, be not obliged to comply with the Presbyterian-government, but have free practice of our own profession, without receiving any prejudice thereby; and that free consultation and debate be had with the Divines of Westminster, twenty of his Majesty's nomination being added unto them; whereby it may be determined by his Majesty and the two Houses, how the Church-government, after the said time shall be settled, or sooner, if differences may be agreed, as is most agreeable to the word of God, with full liberty to all those who shall differ upon conscientious grounds from that settlement; always provided, that nothing aforesaid be understood to tolerate those of the popish profession, nor exempt any popish Recusants from the penalties of the laws; or to tolerate the publick profession of Atheism or blasphemy, contrary to the doctrine of the Apostles, Nicene, and Athanasian Creed, they having been received by, and had in reverence of all the Christian Churches, and more particularly by this of England, ever since the reformation.

Next, the Militia being that right which is inseparably and undoubtedly inherent to the Crown by the laws of this nation, and that which former Parliaments, as likewise this, have acknowledged so to be, his Majesty cannot so much wrong that trust, which the laws of God, and this land hath annexed to the Crown, for the protection and security of his people, as to divest himself and successors of the power of the sword; yet to give an infallible evidence of his desire to secure the performance of such agreements as shall be made in order to a peace, his Majesty will consent to an act of Parliament, that the whole power of the Militia, both by sea and land, for, and during his whole reign, shall be ordered and disposed by the two Houses of Parliament, or by such persons as they shall appoint, with powers limited for suppressing of forces within this Kingdom, to the disturbance of the publick peace, and against foreign invasion; and that they shall have power, during his said reign, to raise moneys for the purpose aforesaid; and that neither his Majesty that now is, or any other, by any authority, derived only from him, shall execute any of the said powers, during his Majesty's said reign, but such as shall act by the consent and approbation of the two Houses of Parliament: Nevertheless his Majesty intends, that all patents, commissions, and other acts concerning the Militia, be made and acted as formerly; and that after his Majesty's reign, all the power of the Militia shall return entirely to the Crown, as was in the times of Queen Elizabeth, and King James, of blessed memory.

After this head of the Militia, the consideration of the arrears due to the army is not improper to follow; for the payment whereof, and the ease of his people, his Majesty is willing to concur in any thing that can be done without the violation of his conscience and honour.

Wherefore if his two Houses shall consent to remit unto him such benefit out of sequestrations from Michaelmas last, and out of compositions that shall be made before the concluding of the peace, and the arrears of such as have been already made, the assistance of the Clergy, and the arrears of such rents of his own revenue as his two Houses shall not have received before the concluding of the peace, his Majesty will undertake within the space of eighteen months, the pay-

1647. "ment of four hundred thousand pounds for the satisfaction of the army; and if those means shall not be sufficient, his Majesty intends to give way for the sale of Forest-lands for that purpose.

"This being the publick debt, which in his Majesty's judgment is first to be satisfied: And for other publick debts already contracted upon Church-lands, or any other engagements, his Majesty will give his consent to such act or acts for raising of moneys for payment thereof, as both Houses hereafter shall agree upon, so as they be equally laid; whereby his people, already too heavily burthened by these late distempers, may have no more preflures upon them than this absolute necessity requires.

"And for the further securing all fears, his Majesty will consent, that an Act of Parliament be passed for the disposing of the great offices of State, and naming of Privy-Counsellors for the whole term of his reign, by the two Houses of Parliament, their patents and commissions being taken from his Majesty, and after to return to the Crown, as is expressed in the articles of the Militia. For the Court of Wards and Liveries, his Majesty very well knows the consequence of taking that away, by turning of all Tenures into common Socage, as well in point of revenue to the Crown, as in the protection of many of his Subjects, being infants: Nevertheless, if the continuance thereof seem grievous to his Subjects, rather than he will fail on his part in giving satisfaction, he will consent to an act for taking it away, so as a full recompence be settled upon his Majesty and his successors in perpetuity (1). and that the arrears now due be referred unto him towards the payment of the arrears of the army.

"And that the memory of these late distractions may be wholly wiped away, his Majesty will consent to an Act of Parliament for the suppressing and making null of all oaths, declarations, and proclamations against both or either House of Parliament, and of all indictments and other proceedings against any persons for adhering unto them. And his Majesty propoeth, as the best expedient to take away all seeds of future difference, that there be an Act of Oblivion to extend to all his Subjects.

"As for Ireland, the cessation therein is long since determined; but for the future, and all other things being fully agreed, his Majesty will give full satisfaction to his Houses concerning that Kingdom.

"And although his Majesty cannot consent in honour and justice to void all his own grants and acts passed under his Great Seal since the 22d of May 1642, or to the confirming of all the grants and acts passed under that made by the two Houses, yet his Majesty is confident, that upon the perusal of particulars, he shall give satisfaction to both Houses to what may be reasonably desired in that particular.

"And now his Majesty conceives, that by these his offers, which he is ready to make good upon the settlement of a peace, he hath clearly manifested his intentions to give full security and satisfaction to all interests, for what can justly be desired in order to the future happiness of his People, and for the perfecting these concessions, as also for such other things as may be proposed by the two Houses; and for such just and reasonable demands as his Majesty shall find necessary to propose on his part, he earnestly desires a personal treaty at London with his two Houses, in honour, freedom, and safety; it being in his judgment, the most proper, and indeed only means to a firm and settled peace, and impossible without it to reconcile former, or avoid future differences.

"All these being by treaty perfected, his Majesty believes his two Houses will think it reasonable, that the proposals of the army concerning the succession of Parliaments, and that due election should be taken into consideration.

"As for what concerns the Kingdom of Scotland, his Majesty will very readily apply himself to give all reasonable satisfaction; when the desires of the two Houses of Parliament on their behalf, or of the commissioners of that Kingdom, or of both joined together, shall be made known unto him."

The Parliament took no notice of these offers. Besides that they saw only part of their former demands, they were always upon their guard with respect to the King's proposals, wherein it was but too usual to find ambiguous expressions, restrictions and conditions expressed or implied, which made it impossible to build securely upon such foundations. We have seen several instances in the King's Papers, since the beginning of his reign; and in this here, where he carries his offers farther than ever, it was easy to perceive the same method; for he was very artful, as well as his Father, in the choice of his expressions. Nay, it seems that in offering to yield the power of the Militia, during his whole Reign, an expression often repeated in these proposals, he had some secret intention, as to resign the Crown to the Prince his son. Otherwise, I do not see why he affected to substitute the term of his reign, instead of that of his life, or of twenty years, as was demanded by the Parliament. At least it is certain, if his offer had been accepted, as expressed in his words, he might, by resigning the Crown, have put the Prince of Wales, by the treaty it self, in full possession of the Militia, and nomination to the great Offices. But this is only a conjecture, tho' very probable. Be this as it will, the two Houses had long since refused to treat but upon their own proposals. Neither would they allow of his explanations, so apprehensive were they of his subtleties, which would have engaged them in discussions where they would have always had the same thing to fear. Such was the distrust the King's character had bred, which made a reconciliation between him and the Parliament ever impracticable. It must however be confessed, that on this occasion there were other reasons which hindered the two Houses from regarding the King's offers. The principal was, they were under the dominion of the army, or rather the Independents, who were not for peace upon any terms whatsoever.

During the King's stay at Hampton-Court, the Scotch commissioners, as I observed, had treated with him, and put him in hopes that the Scots would join with his party, and the English Presbyterians, to deliver him from the Independents. But they required a thing which he could not resolve, namely, the change of Episcopal Government in the Church of England into Presbyterian. This single point had prolonged the negotiation, and hindered the conclusion of the treaty. Cromwell had some intimation of it, and probably for that reason used all his industry to cause the King to retire to the Isle of Wight, where the Scotch commissioners could not have the same access to him.

When the King went from Hampton-Court, the proposals the two Houses were to send him, were all ready. But the Scotch Commissioners deferred from day to day to approve them, on pretence the interests of Scotland were not sufficiently specified, expecting to agree with the King before they should be presented. This dispute between the Parliament and Scotch Commissioners still subsisted, when suddenly the House of Lords acquainted the Commons at a conference, that having more maturely considered the King's last message, they were of opinion to admit him to a personal treaty, on condition he would give his assent to four preliminary propositions to be passed into Acts before the rest should be treated on.

1. An Act for settling the Militia of the Kingdom.

2. An Act for calling in all declarations, oaths, and proclamations, against the Parliament, and those who adhered to them.

3. An Act, that those Lords who were made after the Great-Seal was carried to Oxford, may be made incapable of sitting in the House of Peers.

4. An Act for empowering the two Houses of Parliament to adjourn as they shall think fit.

The next day (2), the Commons gave their consent to these propositions, and ordered, that the four Bills should be drawn, and dispatched to his Majesty, after which a personal treaty with him should be entered into. All this was done with so great expedition, that it was not possible for the Independents to prevent what they were not prepared against. The Scotch Commissioners, who had formed other projects, tried in vain to hinder the effect of this resolution. The Parliament wished for peace, thereby to break the measures of the Independents. The 6th of December, the King sent a fresh Message to both Houses, earnestly pressing for a personal Treaty, as being the best means for settling a peace.

The 14th of the same month, the Commons, after passing the four Bills, and approving the instructions for those that were to present them, named a Committee to carry them to the King.

Then they answered the complaints of the Scotch Commissioners, that the four Bills were not communicated to them. They said, it was contrary to the rights and privileges of Parliament, to communicate Bills to any person whatever, before they had received the royal assent, and that there was nothing in the treaty between the two Kingdoms to the contrary: That they desired the Scotch Commissioners to prepare such propositions as they should judge necessary for the Kingdom of Scotland, that the Committee might depart on the 20th.

1647. That day, the Scotch Commissioners presented to both Houses a large declaration, complaining in very high language, that the Parliament of England violated the Covenant, in labouring for peace without the concurrence of Scotland. They insisted upon a personal treaty between the King, both Houses, and themselves, that peace might be settled with mutual consent; and declared, as they could not agree to the sending of the four Bills to his Majesty for his assent, before any treaty upon the rest of the propositions, so they were unsatisfied with the matter of these new proposals lately communicated to them; and desired, that there might be a personal treaty with the King, upon such propositions as should be agreed upon, with advice and consent of both Kingdoms.

This declaration gave great offence to both Houses. Their reply to it was answerable in terms, to the language used by the Scots; and it was ordered, that the printer of the declaration should be committed to prison.

In short, notwithstanding the opposition of the Scotch Commissioners, the four Bills were presented to the King the 24th of December. The next day, the Scotch Commissioners came to the Isle of Wight, and delivered to the King a declaration of their dissent to the propositions they had lately seen, and the four Bills brought to his Majesty. After that, they had a conference with the King, wherein some things passed, which long remained secret, and which it will be necessary to relate, because on them turned the events mentioned hereafter.

Since the King had been in the power of the army, the Scots feared, he would unite with them. They knew they were mortally hated by the Independents, and consequently, this union could not but be very prejudicial to Scotland. The army's success against the Parliament and City of London increased their fear very much, and put them upon seeking means to prevent, as they thought, the impending danger. They found no proper means, than to join with the King, provided he could be persuaded to approve of the Covenant, and abolish Episcopacy in England. In their frequent conferences with him at Hampton-Court, they intimated, that when he was delivered to the Parliament, it was not with the advice of all Scotland, but only by the Marquis of Argyll's credit, who tyrannized over the Kingdom: That all the Scots were displeased with it, and ready to atone for the fault, by assisting him with all their power to recover his just rights. But they added, that to engage the Scots to employ their forces to this end, his Majesty was to give them satisfaction concerning the Covenant, and the abolition of Episcopacy in England; for, otherwise, he could not expect the assistance of the English Presbyterians, which was absolutely necessary. In a word, they made him hope, that the Scots would enter England with a strong army, which, by the junction of the King's party, and English Presbyterians, would become so superior to the army of the Independents, that he might almost be assured, nothing would be capable to oppose his restoration.

These overtures were the more agreeable to the King, as the Duke of Hamilton, after his freedom from imprisonment by the army, had declared to the King's friends, he was ready to do his Majesty all the service that lay in his power. On the other hand, the Marquis of Ormond had informed the King of his project to return into Ireland, join with the Lord Inchiquin, whom he had privately gained, and with some of the heads of the rebels, and make war upon the Parliament, affirming, that France had promised to supply him with all necessities. It was very probable, that the union between the King's party, the English Presbyterians, and the Scots, added to a diversion in Ireland, would very much embarrass the Independents, and disable them to withstand so great a force. But to execute this project, the King was to approve of the Covenant, and consent to the abolition of Episcopacy, which he could never resolve. These were the two stumbling-blocks, which hindered him from concluding a treaty with the Scotch Commissioners, before his flight from Hampton-Court. He would never grant these two points, and in expectation that by his steadiness he should induce the Scots to desist from their desires, quitted Hampton-Court, without any agreement with them. When therefore he so earnestly pressed for a personal treaty at London, with honour, freedom, and safety, it was in order to treat more commodiously with the Scotch Commissioners, and consult with his friends, what could be expected as well from his own, as the Presbyterian party; and doubtless, in case he concluded a treaty with them, his design was to prolong the negotiation with the two Houses, till the Scotch army had entered England, and his old and new friends laid all their measures (a). It was very likely, this league would find the army so much employment, that they would not be able to subdue, a second time, the Parliament and City of London. Accordingly, this was the end the Scotch Commissioners proposed to themselves, in their objections to the propositions, and in their demand of a personal treaty with the King, upon such proposals as should be agreed upon by both Kingdoms, being well assured, it would be easy for them to prolong the time, till every thing should be ready.

The method the two Houses took to procure the King's consent to the four Bills, amongst which was that of the Militia, before they admitted him to a personal treaty, convinced him, they had no design to relax upon any of the principal articles. He considered, that after passing these four Bills, he should still be forced to treat on propositions much like those presented to him at Newcastle: That, after all, what both Houses called treating, was, according to their ideas, consenting to their demands, and upon the least refusal to grant what should be proposed to him, he should be, perhaps, more closely confined, when he had passed one of the most important points in dispute: That then, he should not be able to treat with the Scots, and by passing the four Bills, should lose the present opportunity, which should never offer again. These considerations determined him to agree with the Scotch Commissioners, at a second conference with them the 25th of December. As there was no time to lose, the Parliament's Commissioners having orders to stay but four days in the Isle of Wight, the Scotch Commissioners had brought with them a treaty ready drawn, agreeable to the propositions they had made the King at Hampton-Court. This treaty was signed by the King and the Scotch Commissioners the next day, December the 26th, the King having had but few hours to resolve. Here follows the substance of the treaty, which the Lord Clarendon says was read but by very few, and which he represents as the most unjust treaty that could be imposed upon the King. This obliges me to make remarks on some of the articles.

"IN the preface, the King acknowledged, that the intentions of those who had entered into the Covenant, were real for the preservation of his Majesty's person and authority, according to their allegiance, and no ways to diminish his just power and greatness. He promised, as soon as he could, with freedom, honour, and safety, to be present in a free Parliament, to confirm the said League and Covenant by Act of Parliament in both Kingdoms, for the security of all who had taken or should take it." With this proviso however, "That none who was unwilling should be constrained to take it (1).

REMARK (1). If it is considered, that the Scots joined their forces with those of England, only in defence of this Covenant, which had been solemnly sworn to in both Kingdoms, it will not be thought strange, the Scotch Commissioners should require this promise of the King. Without this, there would have been no possibility to engage the Scots to employ their forces to restore the King to his rights, and how hard soever this condition might appear to him, it was absolutely necessary to produce the effect which he expected from his union with Scotland.

"His Majesty engaged to confirm by Act of Parliament in England, Presbyterian Government; the Directory for Worship; and the Assembly of Divines at Westminster for three years; so that his Majesty and his House should not be hindered from using that form of divine service he had formerly practised (2): And that during these three years there should be a consultation with the Assembly of Divines, to which twenty of the King's nomination should be added, and some from the Church of Scotland; and thereupon it should be determined by his Majesty, and the two Houses of Parliament, what form of Government should be established after the expiration of those years, as should be most agreeable to the word of God.

REM. (2). The Scotch Commissioners were not so stupid as to imagine, the Scots with their forces alone should be able to restore the King. They depended chiefly upon the aid of the English Presbyterians. But how was it possible for them to rely on their aid, if nothing were stipulated for them? Nay, it is astonishing they should be satisfied with an establishment which was to last but three years, considering how they themselves and the English Presbyterians, whose assistance was absolutely necessary, stood affected. The King himself did not think, doubtless, he was forced upon this point, since he had offered the same thing to both Houses, in his message of the 10th of December.

"That an effectual course may be taken by Act of

(a) This conjecture is confirmed by his Majesty's Letter to the Earl of Laurick, dated at Carlisle, November 19, 1647, wherein he says, "That his Message from thence to both Houses will, he believes, have divers interpretations, and be disliked by the Scotch Commissioners, but the end of it was to procure a personal Treaty. This he thought necessary to tell him, that he might assure his fellow Commissioners, that change of place had not altered his mind, from what it was when he last him last." Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton, p. 225.

“ Parliament, and all other ways needful or expedient, for the suppressing the opinions and practices of Antitrinitarians, Arians, Socinians, Anti-Scripturalists, Anabaptists, Antinomians, Arminians, Familists, Brownists, Separatists, Independents, Libertines, and Seekers, and generally, for the suppressing of all blasphemy, heresy, schism, and all such scandalous doctrines and practices as are contrary to the Light of Nature, and to the principles of Christianity, whether concerning Faith, Worship or Conversation, or the power of Godliness, or which may be destructive to order and Government, or to the peace of the Church and Kingdom (3).

R.E.M. (3). All these Sects mentioned in this article were no less enemies to the Presbyterians than to the Church of England. These three last articles being exactly what the King had offered in his message of the 16th of November, it cannot be said that he granted them through surprize or force.

“ The King promised, that in the next session of Parliament, after the Kingdom of Scotland should declare for his Majesty, in pursuance of this agreement, he should in person, or by commission, confirm the League and Covenant in that Kingdom; and concerning all the Acts passed in the last Parliament of that Kingdom, his Majesty declared, that he should then likewise be content to give assurance by Act of Parliament, that neither he nor his successors should quarrel, call in question, or command the contrary of any of them, nor question any for giving obedience to the same.”

After these articles concerning Religion, there was a long recital of “ the agreement the Parliament of England had made, when the Scots army returned to Scotland, that the army under Fairfax should be disbanded; and of that army’s submitting thereunto; of their taking the King from Holmby, and keeping him prisoner till he fled from them to the Isle of Wight; and since that time both his Majesty, and the Commissioners for the Kingdom of Scotland, had very earnestly desired, that the King might come to London in safety, honour and freedom, for a personal treaty with the two Houses, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, which, they said, had been granted, but that the army had, in a violent manner, forced away divers members of the Parliament from the discharge of their trust, and possessed themselves of the city of London, and all the strengths and garisons of the Kingdoms: And that by the strength and influence of that army, and their adherents, Propositions and Bills had been sent to the King without the advice and consent of the Kingdom of Scotland, contrary to the treaties which are between the two Kingdoms, and destructive to Religion, his Majesty’s rights, the privilege of Parliament, and liberty of the Subject; from which Propositions and Bills the Scottish Commissioners had dissented, and protested against, in the name of the Kingdom of Scotland.”

After this preamble and recital, they said, “ That inasmuch as his Majesty is willing to give satisfaction concerning the settling of Religion, and other matters in difference, as is expressed in this agreement, the Kingdom of Scotland doth oblige, and engage itself, first, in a peaceable way and manner to endeavour, that the King may come to London in safety, honour, and freedom, for a personal treaty with the Houses of Parliament, and the Commissioners of Scotland, upon such propositions as should be mutually agreed on between the two Kingdoms, and such propositions as his Majesty should think fit to make; and for this end, all armies should be disbanded; and in case that this should not be granted, that declarations should be emitted by the Kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of this agreement, against the unjust proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament, towards his Majesty, and the Kingdom of Scotland; in which they would assert the right that belonged to the Crown, in the power of the Militia, the Great Seal, bestowing of honours, and offices of trust, choice of the Privy-Counsellors, and the right of the King’s negative voice in Parliament: And that the Queen’s Majesty, the Prince, and the rest of the royal issue, ought to remain where his Majesty shall think fit, in either of his Kingdoms, with safety, honour, and freedom: That upon the issuing out of this declaration, an army should be sent out of Scotland into England, for the preservation and establishment of Religion, for defence of his Majesty’s person and authority, and restoring him to his Government, to the just rights of the Crown, and the full revenues; for the defence of the privilege of Parliament, and liberty of the Subject; for making a firm union between the Kingdoms under his Majesty and his posterity, and settling a lasting peace. In pursuance whereof, the Kingdom of Scotland was to endeavour, that there might be a free and full Parliament in England, and that his “ Majesty may be with them in honour, safety, and freedom; and that a speedy period be set to the present Parliament. And they undertook, that the army which they would raise, should be upon its march, before the message and declaration should be delivered to the Houses.” It was farther agreed on, “ That all such in the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, as would join with the Kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of this agreement, should be protected by his Majesty in their persons and estates; and that all his Subjects in England or Ireland, who would join with him, in pursuance of this agreement, might come to the Scottish army and join with them, or else put themselves into other bodies in England or Wales, for prosecution of the same ends, as the King’s Majesty should judge most convenient, and such Commanders or Generals of the English Nation, as his Majesty shall think fit: And that all such should be protected by the Kingdom of Scotland and their army, in their persons and estates, and where any injury or wrong is done unto them, they would be careful to see them fully repaired, as far as it should be in their power to do; and likewise when any injury or wrong is done to those who join with the Kingdom of Scotland, his Majesty should be careful of their full reparation (4).”

R.E.M. (4). When the five last articles are considered, it plainly appears, what great advantages the King received by his condescension to establish Presbyterianism in England for three years. But some mens prejudice against Presbyterianism, makes them think, the King paid very dear for the advantages he expected to reap from his union with Scotland.

They obliged his Majesty to promise, “ That neither himself, nor any by his authority or knowledge, should make or admit any cessation, pacification, or agreement whatsoever for peace, nor of any treaty, propositions, bills, or any other ways for that end, with the Houses of Parliament, or any army or party in England or Ireland, without the advice and consent of the Kingdom of Scotland; and reciprocally, that neither the Kingdom of Scotland, nor any, having their authority, should make or admit of any of these, any manner of way, with any whatsoever, without his Majesty’s advice or consent: And that upon the settlement of a peace, there should be an act of oblivion to be agreed upon by his Majesty, and both his Parliaments, of both his Kingdoms: That his Majesty, the Prince, or both, should come into Scotland, upon the invitation of that Kingdom, and their declaration, that they should be in honour, freedom, and safety, when possibly they could come with safety and convenience; and that the King should contribute his utmost endeavour, both at home and abroad, for assisting the Kingdom of Scotland, for carrying on this war both by sea and land, and all other supplies by moneys, arms, ammunition, and all other things requisite, as also for guarding the coasts of Scotland with ships, and protecting all their Merchants, in the free exercise of their trade and commerce with other Nations: And likewise, that his Majesty was willing, and did authorize the Scottish army, to possess themselves of Berwick, Carlisle, Newcastle upon Tyne, with the castle of Tinnmouth, and the town of Harlepool: Those places to be their retreat, and magazines; and that, when the peace of the Kingdom should be settled, the Kingdom of Scotland should remove all their forces, and deliver back again those towns and castles.

“ The King promised also, and undertook to pay the arrears of the Brotherly Assistance, and likewise the two hundred thousand pounds, which remained still due upon the last treaty, for return of the Scottish army, when they had delivered up the King (5).

R.E.M. (5). If the four hundred thousand pounds promised to the Scottish army, when they quitted England, be considered as the price of the sale of the King’s person, nothing could be harder, than to oblige the King to the payment of that sum. But if it was really due to the Scots for their arrears, the King approving of the Covenant of both Kingdoms, by the first article of this treaty, the Scots could urge, that he was bound to see them paid the expence they had been at in maintaining the said Covenant.

And also, “ That payment should be made to the Kingdom of Scotland, for the charge and expence of their army in this future war, with due recompence for the losses they should sustain therein, and that due satisfaction, according to the treaty on that behalf betwixt the two Kingdoms, should be made to the Scottish army in Ireland, out of the lands of this Kingdom, or otherwise: And that the King, according to the intention of his Father, should endeavour a complete union of the two Kingdoms, so as they may be one under his Majesty, and all his posterity; or if that cannot speedily be effected, that all liberties and privileges concerning commerce, traffick, manufactures, and other things

1647. "of either Nation, should be common to the Subjects of both Kingdoms without distinction; and that there be a communication, and mutual capacity of all other liberties of the Subjects in the two Kingdoms (6.)"

R. E. M. (6.) If the King could not, by his own authority unite the two Kingdoms, without the concurrence of the two Parliaments, neither could he, without the same concurrence, make the privileges of both Kingdoms common. So, probably, this article was put into the treaty only to dazzle the people of Scotland.

"That a competent number of ships should be yearly assigned, and appointed out of his Majesty's navy, which should attend the coast of Scotland for a guard, and freedom of trade of that Nation; and that his Majesty should declare, that his successors, as well as himself, are obliged to the performance of the articles and conditions of this agreement; but that his Majesty shall not be obliged to the performance of the aforesaid articles, until the Kingdom of Scotland should declare for him, in pursuance of this agreement; and that the whole articles and conditions aforesaid, shall be finished, perfected, and performed, before the return of the Scottish army; and that when they return into Scotland, at the same time, Simul & semel, all armies should be disbanded in England." The King engaged himself also, "To employ those of the Scottish nation, equally with the English, in all foreign employments and negotiations; and that a third part of all the offices and places about the King, Queen, and Prince, should be conferred upon persons of that nation; and that the King and Prince, or one of them; will frequently reside in Scotland, that the Subjects of that Kingdom may be known to them."

The King's consent by this treaty to the establishment of the Presbyterian-government in England for three years, lying heavy upon his mind, he prevailed with the commissioners, that it should be inserted under the same treaty, "That his Majesty did declare, that by the clause of confirming Presbyterian-government by act of Parliament, he is neither obliged to desire the settling of Presbyterian-government, nor to present any bills to that effect; and that he likewise understands, that no person whatsoever shall suffer in his estate, nor undergo any corporal punishment, for not submitting to Presbyterian-government; his Majesty understanding, that this indemnity should not extend to those who are mentioned in the articles against toleration."

To this the Scotch commissioners subscribed their hands, as witnesses only, as they said, and not as assentors."

T. III. p. 25. The Lord Clarendon, in his history of the civil wars of England, exclaims against the injustice of this treaty, in the following words:

No man who reads this treaty (which very few men have ever done) can wonder, that such an engagement met with the fate that attended it; which contained so many monstrous concessions, that, except the noble Kingdom of England had been likewise imprisoned in Carisbrook castle with the King, it could not be imagined, that it was possible to be performed.

I own, whatever esteem I may have for this illustrious Historian, this bare affirmation, without any explication, is not satisfactory to me. After having examined every clause of this treaty, I meet with none that to me appear monstrous. It is true, the article of settling the Presbyterian-government in England for three years, might seem to the Earl of Clarendon, and those who are of his opinion. The reader is to judge, whether this Monstrosity, if I may venture to use that term, is to be ascribed to the thing itself, or to the Historian's prepossession (1).

The King having concluded his treaty with the Scotch commissioners, delivered his answer to the commissioners of the Parliament, to this effect:

"That his Majesty had always thought it a matter of great difficulty, to comply in such a manner with all engaged interests, that a firm and lasting peace might ensue; in which opinion he was now confirmed, since the Commissioners for Scotland did solemnly protest against the several Bills, and propositions, which the two Houses of Parliament had presented to him for his assent; so that it was not possible for him to give such an answer as might be the foundation of a hopeful peace. That besides, the four Bills as they were offered to him did not only divert him of all Sovereignty, and leave

"him without any possibility of recovering it to him or his Successors; but opened a door for all intolerable oppressions upon his Subjects, he granting such an arbitrary and illimited power to the two Houses. That neither the desire of being freed from that tedious and irksome condition of life, which he had so long suffered, nor the apprehension of any thing that might befall him, should ever prevail with him to consent to any one Act, till the conditions of the whole peace should be concluded; and then that he would be ready to give all just and reasonable satisfaction, in all particulars; and for the adjusting of all this, he knew no way but a personal treaty (and therefore very earnestly desired the two Houses to consent to it) to be either at London, or any other place they would rather choose."

The King, not doubting but his answer would displease the two Houses, would have given it sealed to the Commissioners, because whilst the Parliament should take it into consideration, he intended to make his escape, having already taken some measures for that purpose. But the Commissioners (2) would not receive it in that manner, saying, "They were not to be looked upon as common messengers, and to carry back an answer they had not seen." The King fearing, their return without his answer would be attended with the worst of consequences, gave it to them open; after which they instantly departed. They were no sooner gone, than Governor Hammond [by Sir Thomas Fairfax's order] caused all the King's servants to be put out of the Castle, who till then had been permitted to be with him, and confined him so closely, that no man had liberty to go to him without express leave (3).

It was not in vain that the Governor took these precautions, since, immediately after, one Captain Burley an inhabitant of the Island, who had been [first a sea-officer, and afterwards] General of the ordnance in one of the King's armies, endeavoured to excite the people to rescue the King from his captivity (4). But he laid his measures so ill, that instead of executing his design he was apprehended, and afterwards condemned, and hanged, drawn, and quartered. Probably, the King depended upon this officer for his escape.

The King's answer being read in the House of Commons, several Members spoke against the King with great warmth. Cromwell among others said, "That the King was a man of great parts, and great understanding, but that he was so great a dissembler, and so false a man, that he was not to be trusted. That whilst he professed with all solemnity that he referred himself wholly to the Parliament, and depended only upon their wisdom and counsel for the settlement and composing the distractions of the Kingdom, he had at the same time secret treaties with the Scottish Commissioners, how he might imbroil the Nation in a new war, and destroy the Parliament. He concluded, that they might no farther trouble themselves with sending messages to him, or farther propositions, but that they might enter upon those counsels which were necessary towards the settlement of the Kingdom, without having farther recourse to the King." This advice being strongly seconded by some other Members, it was at length resolved after a long debate from morning till late at night (5), that no more addresses should be made to, nor messages received from the King.

This Declaration should be published to satisfy the Kingdom of the reason of it. This Declaration was prepared in a very short time (7). It contained all the reproaches cast upon the King in 1641, in the Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, and whatever had been complained of since that time, not without a direct insinuation that the King, when Prince of Wales, had conspired with the Duke of Buckingham against his Father's life. They charged him with having openly betrayed the interests of the Protestant Religion, by lending his ships to the King of France, who employed them against Rochel. When this Declaration came to be debated, it met with much opposition even in the House of Commons. But the contrary party to the King did what is daily practised in the Parliament. They suffered the opposers of the Declaration to talk as much as they pleased, and then called for the question, which was carried by a plurality of voices; after which the Declara-

(3) The King, after some expostulations for this usage, "asked Hammond, by what authority he did it?" He said, "By authority of both Houses, and that he supposed his Majesty was not ignorant of the cause of his doing thus." tion was sent to the House of Peers, where it passed without any difficulty.

The Scotch Commissioners, before they returned home, communicated their designs to the King's party, the Marquis of Ormond, and some leading Presbyterians, and early preparations were made for accomplishing the project which was forming in favour of the King. The project was as follows.

The Scots were to send an army into England to act against the Independents, and deliver the King: The Marquis of Ormond was to return into Ireland, where the Lord Inchiquin who commanded the Parliament's forces in Munster, had promised to declare for the King, and several heads of the Rebels who were displeased with the tyrannical proceedings of the Pope's Nuncio, and engaged to join the Marquis with a strong body of their Troops. At the same time, the King's friends in England were to rise in several Counties. The Generals and Officers, discarded by the new model, had promised to assemble what forces they could, to countenance the design. The Nobility, Gentry, and Burghers being dissatisfied that the army should govern the Parliament, and all offices be conferred on persons of their party, it was not doubted but the insurrections in several parts, would be supported and encouraged.

On the other hand, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and Sir Philip Mulgrave, who had great interest in Yorkshire and Cumberland, engaged to seize Berwick and Carlisle. The Presbyterian party being still very numerous in the Parliament and City, were preparing openly to oppose the army, as soon as they should see it employed in so many different places. Had all these projects been well managed, and executed at the same time, very probably, Cromwell, with all his art, would have been extremely embarrassed. But of all those who should have acted at the same time, some were too hasty, others too slow, and by that means, the army crushed them with ease one after another. But before I relate how these several projects were attempted to be executed, I think it absolutely necessary to show the interests and views of the different parties, otherwise it would be very difficult to understand what will be said hereafter.

The Independents designed to be masters of the Kingdom, as they were already of the Parliament and City of London. But as they found, it would not be easy to succeed in this undertaking, by the same means they had employed to subdue the City and Parliament, their aim was to make use of the Parliament and govern in their name. It was therefore their interest, that the power they had acquired over the Parliament should not be too visible, for fear of causing both Houses to lose their authority, which they meant to make use of. For this reason they were very careful to manage the two Houses, knowing, that whilst the army subsisted, they would have a regard for them, for fear of incensing them. And in case they should think of taking too much liberty, they knew how to reduce them to a greater compliance. Though they had dissembled their sentiments with respect to the King, after his removal from Holmby, they were his mortal enemies, and bent to oppose, with all their power, his restoration on any conditions whatever, because they considered it as entirely destructive of their party. Oliver Cromwell, who privately directed their affairs, had found means, as I said, to keep his post in the army, and his seat in Parliament, though he had been the chief promoter of the Self-denying ordinance, whereby the rest of the Members were excluded from all offices military and civil. Moreover, since the conclusion of the war, he had brought into the House many more of his faction, besides those who had been there from the beginning of the Parliament. Hence the Independent party was grown very considerable in the House of Commons, as well by their number as by the junction of several other Members, who through fear, or want of judgment, suffered themselves to be led by the Independents, on some occasions where their artifices were not easy to be discovered. But their principal strength was the support of the army, of which they were secure on occasion. So, when any leading Independent spoke with warmth in the House, he seldom met with opposition, because he was considered as the mouth of the army.

But what was the end the Independents proposed? The event showed, their principles were inconsistent with Monarchy, with Episcopacy, and with Presbyterian Government, and that their aim was to establish a Commonwealth in the State, and abolish Ecclesiastical authority in the Church. Nothing was more opposite to this design than the Hierarchy, especially, as it was known by experience to have supported the Monarchy, not only in its just rights, but also in its most exorbitant pretensions. Presbyterianism, as established in Scotland, and as intended to be established in England, was no less contrary to their designs. They pretended it was inconsistent with the civil Government, and to admit it would be to admit a sort of Commonwealth in the Church, which would aspire to an Independency on the State, and besides, the Presbyterian Clergy were as much against Toleration as the Episcopal. This they proved by the example of Scotland, where under colour of Religion and Godliness, the General Assemblies of the Kirk pretended to intermeddle in all important affairs of the State, and not only to assist the civil authority, but to be bound to it in conscience on certain occasions. Besides, if the Bishops had persecuted those who refused to conform to the Church of England, the Presbyterians, since they were superior, exercised no less tyranny upon those who would not submit to their Government. Thus the principles of the Episcopals and Presbyterians being directly contrary to those of the Independents, these last were equally enemies to both, and equally laboured their ruin. To execute their designs, they had at first joined with the Presbyterians, on pretence of establishing Presbyterianism, but in reality to destroy the King. And when it was out of the King's power to hurt them, they laboured to destroy the same Presbyterianism, for the establishment of which, they had shown more zeal than the Presbyterians themselves.

Such were the views of the Independents: as for Cromwell's in particular, it cannot be said when he began to form the project of his advancement. He had spent the two first years of this Parliament in the House of Commons as member for the town of Cambridge, without being very remarkable. Tho he was above forty years old before he exercised the profession of arms, he suddenly grew so expert, and showed such undaunted courage in all the actions where he was present, that he was soon made Lieutenant-General of the army, commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax. It can hardly be doubted, that since the battle of Naseby, where he acquired fresh laurels, he had begun to think of raising himself higher. But I dare not affirm, he then thought of what he afterwards accomplished. I should rather believe, he had only some general views, and was led by the events and situation of affairs to form more ambitious projects (1).

I come now to the Presbyterians. The war was ended to the King's disadvantage: but he was still alive though a prisoner, and had several children. It was the general sense of the nation, or at least of those who were not blinded by a spirit of party, that the King should be restored, but upon such terms however as should hinder the constitution of the Government from being liable to the same danger as before this Parliament. It can't be doubted, this was the sentiment of all honest Englishmen, when it is considered, that even those who had nothing less in view than the King's re-establishment, did however publicly declare, they desired it, for fear the contrary opinion should deprive them of the People's favour, which was absolutely necessary for them. This appears in all the Papers published since the beginning of the war and the King's imprisonment. And indeed, nothing was more just and reasonable. The nation's interest did not require that Royalty should be abolished, or the King reduced so low as to be disabled from executing the Laws and protecting his Subjects. But the interest of the Independents required the first of these two things, and that of the Presbyterians, the second. Herein consisted the difficulty of the King's restoration. He was very willing to consent, that the ordering of the Militia, and the nomination to the great offices, should be left to both Houses of Parliament for some time. This was sufficient for the interest of the nation in general, since the People would have been freed from their fears, with respect to the Government for the future. If the Presbyterians had only intended the good of the publick, they would doubtless, have been satisfied with the King's offers. But they had another interest, no less dear to them, and which distinguished their party from the rest of the nation, namely, the abolition of episcopal Government, which was their greatest concern. Nay, very likely, if they had applied themselves at first to procure the good of the nation, by endeavouring to humble the regal Power, it was only to effect the more easily their secret designs, to change the Government of the Church. At the juncture I am speaking of, they had not altered their projects. They knew how zealous the King was for episcopal Government, and how averse to the Presbyterian. They could not there-

1 Some Authors relate, that Cromwell privately stipulated with the King, if his Majesty closed with the army's proposals, Cromwell should be made Earl of Essex, Knight of the Garter, first Captain of the Guards, and even advanced to the degree of Viscount, as the Lord Cromwell was, under Henry VIII. But the King, who would do nothing without the advice of his Queen, writ her word, "That though he assented to the army's proposals, if by assenting to them he could procure peace, it would be rather than to take off Cromwell, than now he was the head that governed the army." This Letter was intercepted by Cromwell, who thereupon resolved to ruin the King. R. 646, p. 323. Life of Cromwell, p. 71.

1647-8. fore, without running the hazard of losing the fruit of their labours, leave their pretensions undecided, and their affairs in such a state, that it should be in the King's power to demolish what they had raised, and the King refused to give them any assurance in that respect. On the contrary, he plainly intimated, it was with reluctance that he granted them any thing, and even for a very short time. Besides, they had no confidence in his promises.

But on the other hand, they had other enemies who were no less formidable. These were the Independents, who had great advantages over them: 1. They had the King's person in their power. 2. They were supported by the army now at the gates of London. 3. The army directed, in great measure, the determinations of the Parliament. Thus, the Presbyterians were extremely embarrassed, since, whichever of the two parties, the King's or the Independent, prevailed, their ruin was inevitable. Mean while, as the danger from the Independents was the most imminent, as soon as they were informed of the resolution taken by the Scots to send an army to the King's relief, they thought fit to suspend their quarrel with the King, and join their endeavours with those of the Scots, to deliver him from the Independents. Not that they intended to restore him with terms: nothing was farther from their thoughts. But they hoped, with the assistance of the Scots and the royal party, to destroy the Independents and army, and that then the Parliament would be perfectly free. In that case, they flattered themselves that their party would be sufficiently powerful in both Houses, to require of the King such conditions as they should think proper for their designs. That is to say, they pretended to free the King from the captivity in which he was held by the Independents, by means of his own friends, to put him under another, which would have been no less grievous to him; in a word, to put him into the power of a Parliament by which he had always been opposed. Chimerical project, if ever there was one! It must be observed, the Presbyterians no longer prevailing in the Parliament, since the 6th of August, their principal strength lay in the assistance they could expect from the city, and the Generals, Officers and Soldiers, who were cashiered by the new model, and very ready to act against those who had robbed them of the fruit of their labours.

The Scots had the same interests and views with regard to the King. They knew, the King considered the favours he had granted them, as extorted at a time when he could not deny them without great inconveniences. On the other hand, they had not confidence enough in him, to believe he would be punctual to his promises, in case he remounted the throne of England with all his prerogatives. It was their interest therefore to hinder the King from becoming too powerful in England, and this had induced them to assist the Parliament. But as for the Independents, Scotland does not seem to have been so much concerned to oppose the superiority they had acquired in England. Indeed, it would have been more advantageous to Scotland, if there had been no Independent-party in England, if the Presbyterian had prevailed, and if the Covenant had been strictly observed. But since affairs had taken another course, and the Independents had gained the advantage, it does not appear what mischief could thence accrue to the Scots, since they were no less secured from the King's power, whilst he was in the hands of the Independents than when he was in those of the Presbyterians. The resolution of the Scots to assist the King can be ascribed but to one, or perhaps all, of these causes; 1. To the fear of an union between the King and Independents; but this fear was groundless, the principles of the two parties being diametrically opposite: 2. To the desire of being revenged on their sworn enemies, the Independents, who had often mortified the Scotch commissioners: 3. To their extreme desire of firmly establishing the Presbyterian Government in the Church of England: 4. and lastly, To their hopes of preserving, by means of this new war, the advantages procured them by the Covenant. The question is to know, whether these three last causes were sufficient to engage them indispensably to undertake a war against England? I say against England, for they could not doubt that the Parliament, directed as it was by the army, would consider their entrance into the Kingdom as an invasion.

On the other hand, the Royalists, though overthrown, being still very numerous, there was great danger, that though the Scots, by their union with them, should destroy the Independent party and their supporters the army, this advantage would turn more to the benefit of the King than of the Presbyterians. At least, it cannot be denied, that by uniting with the Royalists, they would, though contrary to their intention, enable them to hold up their heads, and by their own successes give new strength to their ancient enemies. These were reflections which occurred to many in Scotland, where the intended new war was far from being universally liked. The King's party appeared very active, which was a sign, their hopes were not confined to the freeing of the King from the Independents, in order to put him into the hands of the Presbyterians. The commissioners had signed the treaty of the Isle of Wight, without being authorized by the Parliament of Scotland; and the execution of that treaty, on the part of the Scots, was entirely founded upon the hopes, the commissioners had given the King, of causing it to be ratified. But they had ventured to impart it only to a few friends, and some leading Presbyterians in England, knowing, it contained not before was affirmed, the new war, which preparations were making in Scotland, was rather the work of some particular persons than of the nation in general, as will plainly appear in the sequel.

The design of the Royalists was not, as I said, to deliver the King out of the hands of the Independents, to leave him at the mercy of the Presbyterians. They knew, that when the Parliament should be entirely free, the King's condition would not be much better. And therefore, in jointly labouring with the Presbyterians and Scots, their aim was to restore the King to his former state, without subjecting him to the terms already proposed. Indeed there were among them some who would not have scrupled to consent to a toleration of the Presbyterian religion, rather than hazard the King's restoration. Nay, some there were who, had they been consulted, would have advised the King to submit to a change introduced against his consent. Though they were persuaded that Episcopal was more perfect than Presbyterian Government, they did not think the difference between them material enough, to hinder the sincere union of the two parties, which they considered as the sole means of restoring the King to his rights. And this was what some had proposed to the King, before he withdrew to the Scotch army. The Queen and the Court of France were of this opinion: but the King was not. He was so possessed with the necessity of Episcopacy, that nothing could move him. Unfortunately for him, he had none about him but men, who, like him, believed Episcopacy so essential to Religion, that without Bishops neither the ordination of Ministers, nor consequently the administration of the Sacraments, could be valid. It must not therefore be thought strange, that the King had great scruples upon this point, since, according to his Principles, he could not consider the Presbyterians as members of the Christian Church. For how could they be Christians, if their Baptism was invalid? It cannot be denied, this was the opinion of the Court and of many Church-of-England men. If therefore the Royalists had fully known the contents of the Isle of Wight treaty, very likely, their zeal for the King's service would have cooled. It has been remembered, how much it displeased the Earl of Clarendon. It is very easy to conceive, that men of such sentiments did not mean to labour for the interest of the Presbyterians. What therefore could be expected from the union of the Royalists with the Presbyterians and Scots, since they all acted with different or rather opposite views, and, though their common design had succeeded, they must have therefore dissipated, and begun a new war?

As to the King's particular views, they can only be conjectured. He was like a man that is drowning, and catches at whatever he thinks able to save him, or at least, retard his fate. His accepting the service of the Scots and Presbyterians of England, was not because he expected much from their condescension. He had too often experienced their injustice to him, to imagine they would seriously think of restoring him, without imposing upon him intolerable terms. But as necessity obliged them to offer him their assistance, so necessity forced him to accept it, if not in expectation of obtaining his desires, at least, in hopes of delaying his ruin as long as possible. For Ludlow, he was told, and by one that was present, that in a council of Officers at Windsor, it was moved to take away his life. He hoped, very likely, by the aid of the Scots and English Presbyterians, so to strengthen his own party, that they would be in condition to act alone, when once the Independent army was dispersed, and by that means he might be freed and enabled to make a peace upon more tolerable terms than those hitherto offered. Thus by a strange blindness, the King pretended to use the Scots and Presbyterians to recover his rights, and these last pretended to make the King and his party subservient to their own designs. The King might have another view in setting the Presbyterians and Independents at variance, namely, that the weakest party would join with him without terms rather than see their enemies triumph.

The Parliament consisted of Presbyterians and Independents, and, notwithstanding the efforts of Cromwell and his

The Parties and men's Views his

1647-8. his Party, the Presbyterians were still the majority. But this party was considerably weakened by the absence of eleven of their chief members driven from the House of Commons by the army. From that time, the same vigour as formerly no more appeared in that House, because it was not directed as before the exclusion of these members. Besides, this example deterred the boldest Presbyterians. So, the Independents were maiters; and though the Parliament was Presbyterian as to number, they acted however like Independents, because they could not do otherwise. As the army was near London, Cromwell had opportunity to be constantly in the House, where his presence alone made the balance incline to which side he pleased, in the debates where his party was concerned. The Lords were under no less constraint than the Commons, nor less exposed to the violence of the army, which had caused seven Peers to be impeached by the Commons of High-Treason, under colour of their being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July. The transactions therefore of both Houses from the 6th of August 1647, and till June 1648, are to be considered as directed by the army, that is, by the leading Independents. It may be imagined, the Presbyterian members were extremely troubled to be forced, notwithstanding their majority in both Houses, to do things manifestly tending to the destruction of their party. But there was no remedy but patience, till time should afford some opportunity to free themselves from this slavery. This opportunity was of course to offer itself the next spring. Though the Scotch commissioners had not thought proper to impart to the leading Presbyterians the particulars of their treaty with the King, they had however intimated to them, that they were going to endeavour to raise an army in Scotland, to free England from the yoke of the Independents, and that the King's party was to join with them, or at least favour their progress by insurrections in several parts of the Kingdom. So the Presbyterian members impatiently expected the happy time, when the army would be indispensably obliged to remove from London, to oppose so many enemies, particularly, in the North. They resolved therefore to be ready to act in the Parliament at so favourable a juncture, and in the mean while, to give no offence, for fear of being prevented by the army, who carefully watched all their proceedings. This dissimulation was necessary, because otherwise they ran the risk of being ruined to no purpose, and of disabling themselves from supporting their friends on occasion.

Of the City of London. It remains to speak of the city of London, which was no less concerned in what passed, than the rest of the Kingdom, and could be of great service to the party they espoused. In this great city were men of all sects and parties; but in general, it was Presbyterian, and the Common-council was of the same party. The army had done what lay in their power to lessen the number of their adversaries in that council, by causing the Lord-Mayor, some Aldermen, and several Common-council-men, to be accused and imprisoned, for the tumult of the 26th of July: but however, the Presbyterian-party was still superior in number. In expectation of the opportunity to declare openly against the army, and the Independents, the Presbyterian-party so managed, that great difficulties constantly occurred, when it was proposed to advance money for the army. The city itself was very much in arrears, with respect to the sums laid upon them for the payment of the troops. They did not want excuses to delay these arrears: but the true reason was, they thereby obliged the army to take free quarters, which made the people wish to be rid of them. The expectation of the revolutions, which the entrance of the Scots into the Kingdom might produce, caused the Magistrates of London to continue the same conduct, being ready to do, on all occasions, whatever was in their power to be revenged of the army.

Of General Fairfax. I should willingly add something concerning the character of the Lord Fairfax (1), General of the army, and the ends he might propose to himself; but own, I have met with little information. He was Presbyterian, and yet, suffered himself to be guided by Cromwell, the head of the Independents. What can be said in his favour, is, that he kept the command of the army to avoid a greater mischief, for fear, if he resigned his commission, it should be given to Cromwell, as it would certainly have been.

I thought it necessary, before I proceed to the great revolution in 1648, to show the views and interests of the principal actors, believing this digression would conduce very much to the understanding of what will hereafter be said.

Since the two Houses had resolved to present no more addresses to the King, nor receive any messages from him, there seemed to be a strict union between the Parliament and Army. The council of war had consented, that all the supernumerary forces, not upon the present establishment, should be disbanded. The Parliament on their part gave the army sufficient security for their arrears, and published a declaration, containing the reasons, why the army ought to be continued, though the war was over. In short, the army desisted from their pretension, to meddle with affairs of State, and left the Parliament free to settle the Government as they should think fit. Thus the vote for no more addresses seemed to produce such an union between the Parliament and army, that they appeared to have the same views and interests, though hitherto they had been jealous of each other. This clearly shows, what were the designs of the army, with regard to the King. As for the Parliament, though the Independent members were devoted to the army, it is certain, the rest, who were the majority, only dissimulated their sentiments. Mean while, the Independents, who met with no more opposition in the two Houses, being willing to be still more assured of the Parliament, caused it to be ordered, that the General should be desired to take care and guard the Parliament. Pursuant to this request, the General sent a regiment of Foot to Whitehall, and another of Horse to the Mews, where the King's stables stood. This was to hinder the Londoners from thinking again of using violence to the two Houses.

Though the Scotch commissioners departed not from London till the 24th of January, they had however, by their letters, promoted their affairs, as soon as their treaty with the King was signed, so that it was now resolved at Edinburgh, the committee of Estates should meet the 6th of February, and the Parliament the 10th of March. This resolution was taken, notwithstanding the Marquis of Argyll's opposition, who, though Presbyterian as to Religion, was of the same principles with the Independents as to the Government of the State, and had contracted a fast friendship with Cromwell and Vane. But though he ruled in great measure the rigid Presbyterians, that is, those who would not depart from one single point of the Covenant, the combination was so strong, that it was not only resolved to call a Parliament, but that also the elections of the members were agreeable for the most part to the wishes of those who were for levying an army. The Parliament of England, or rather the Independent-party, by whom the two Houses were directed, doubted not that the aim of those who had procured this resolution, was to support the Presbyterians of England, who were upon the brink of ruin. Wherefore they resolved to send commissioners to Scotland (2), as well to endeavour to content the Scots, as to observe what should pass in the Parliament, and try to strengthen the party of those who were against war (3).

At the opening of the Parliament of Scotland, studied speeches were made by several of the members, to excite the people against the English. They represented, that the army of England kept the King in captivity, and the Parliament in such subjection, that nothing was done but what the army pleased. That, contrary to the tenour of the Covenant between the two nations, the Parliament had refused to debate with the Scotch commissioners, the propositions sent to the King for peace, and rejected their protestation, as if Scotland had no interest in the King: That they had in reality deposed the King by divesting him of all his prerogatives, by voting he should be no more addressed, and by hindering the Scots from having access to his person, though he was as much King of Scotland, as King of England: That it was a manifest breach of the right of the Scots, and of the Covenant between the two Kingdoms, and that Scotland ought to resent this affront, or resolve to become subject to England: That for these reasons, their advice was, that speedy means might be devised to send an army into England, which should no sooner enter that Kingdom, but all the English, except the army, would join with them, and by that means the Parliament being restored to freedom, would reunite with Scotland, and the Covenant be punctually observed.

The Parliament thought not proper to take this important motion so speedily into consideration. But to facilitate the execution of what had been resolved before their meeting, a committee of twenty-four members was appointed, with power to provide for the safety of the Kingdom, in case it should be in danger. For this reason, they were called the Committee of Danger, in which care was taken, that the number of those who were for war, should be superior to those of the contrary party, and to make Duke Hamilton President.

This committee having examined the state of the Kingdom, found it to be in danger, and that it was necessary to raise an army of forty thousand men, to put it in a posture of defence. It was not possible for the Marquis of Argyll, who was of the committee, to prevent this resolution. But he found means to acquaint the commissioners of the General-assembly of the Kirk, who some days after presented to the Parliament certain demands, proper to prolong the affair. The Parliament answered these demands, and the commissioners replied. As this affair will be better understood, by comparing the demands, answers, and replies, I think it necessary not to divide them. This will be of use, as it discovers the obstacles which occurred in Scotland, to the raising of the army that was to act in England. Herein also will appear, what authority, the General-assembly of the Kirk of Scotland assumed to themselves, since their commissioners thought they had a right to oppose the Parliament to their face.

“ 1. DEMAND. That the grounds and causes of undertaking a war may be cleared to be so just, as that all who are well affected, may be satisfied in the lawfulness and the necessity of the engagement, and that nothing be acted in reference to a war, before the lawfulness of the war, and the state of the question be agreed upon.

ANSWER. The Estates declare, That the grounds and causes of undertaking of wars, shall be cleared to be so just, as that all who are well affected may be satisfied in the lawfulness and necessity of the engagement.

“ REPLY. They conceive, that notwithstanding any thing expressed in their Lordships answer, there may be an acting in reference to war, before the lawfulness of the war and the state of the question be agreed upon, which is the very thing they desire to be avoided.

“ 2. DEMAND. That as the breach of the Covenant, by the prevalent party of the sectaries in England are evident, so we desire and hope, that, according to the treaty, it may be condescended upon, and declared by the Parliament, what are those breaches which they take to be a ground of war, and that reparation thereof may be sought.

ANSWER. They think it fit, that the breaches of the Covenant and treaties be presented; and the seeking of reparation, and the best time and manner thereof, considered.

“ REPLY. They neither find any breach of peace between the Kingdoms, which may be a ground of war, nor any positive resolution of Parliament to seek reparation.

“ 3. DEMAND. That there may be no such quarrel or ground of the war, as may break the union between the two Kingdoms, or may discourage or disoblige the Presbyterian-party in England, who continue firm in adhering to the League and Covenant.

ANSWER. They declare, that this Kingdom will be so far from making any war against the Kingdom of England, that any engagement they shall enter into, shall be for strengthening the union between these two Kingdoms, and for encouraging the Presbyterians, and well affected in England.

“ REPLY. Instead of that clause of the desire, The Presbyterian-party in England, who continue firm in adhering to the League and Covenant; change of expression in the answer is, the Presbyterians and well affected in England; which may intimate, that there are some well-affected in England, which are not of the Presbyterian-party, nor do adhere to the League and Covenant.

“ 4. DEMAND. That if the popish, prelatical, or malignant party shall again rise in arms, this nation and their armies, may be so far from joining or associating with them, that on the contrary, they may oppose them, and endeavour to suppress them, as enemies to this cause and government upon the one hand, as well as sectaries on the other.

ANSWER. They agree to the substance and matter thereof; and remit to those who are to be upon the conference for stating the question to explain the same.

“ REPLY. For not joining with the popish, prelatical, or malignant party, we cannot conceive wherein it needs explanation, unless there be now more favorable and friendly intentions towards malignants than formerly.

“ 5. DEMAND. Seeing your Lordships undertakings should be in the first place for Religion; we desire, that his Majesty's late concessions and offers concerning Religion (as they have been by the Church, so may be by the Parliament) declared unsatisfactory; whereby your Lordships may give further evidence of the reality of your intentions for the good and safety of Religion.

ANSWER. They declare, that upon the agreement on the No. 71. Vol. II.

whole matter and state of the question, they will declare his Majesty's concessions concerning Religion, not to be satisfactory.

“ REPLY. His Majesty's concessions being so prejudicial to the cause and Covenant, they desire the Parliament to declare against them both positively, without any condition, and presently without delay.

“ 6. DEMAND. That your Lordships may be pleased not to fix and settle upon any such state of a question, as doth not contain security and assurance to be had from his Majesty, by his solemn oath, under his hand and seal, that he shall, for himself and his successors, consent and agree to acts of Parliament, enjoining the League and Covenant, and fully establishing Presbyterian-government, Directory of Worship, and Confession of Faith, in all his Majesty's dominions; and that his Majesty shall never make any opposition to any of these, or endeavour any change thereof; and that this security be had from his Majesty before his restitution to the exercise of his royal power; which we desire for no other end, but because we cannot see how Religion (which has been, and we trust shall be, the principal end of all the undertakings of this nation) can be otherwise secured; but that without this security it shall be left in very great hazard.

ANSWER. That since Religion hath been, and they trust ever shall be, the principal end of all their undertakings; so they will be careful, that the present question to be stated shall contain security and assurance from his Majesty, by his solemn oath under his hand and seal, that he shall for himself, and for his successors, give his royal consent to pass Acts of Parliament, enjoining the League and Covenant, established by Presbyterian Government, the Directory of Worship, and Confession of Faith, in all his Majesty's dominions; and that his Majesty shall never make opposition to any of these, or endeavour any change thereof.

“ REPLY. As there is much said in the first part, for security of Religion to be had from his Majesty; so that clause, viz. That this security be had from his Majesty, before his restitution to the exercise of his royal power is laid aside, and they are left unsatisfied in that which is the main of that desire.

“ 7. DEMAND. That the same end in securing Religion (which is professed to be the principal cause of engagement) and for securing all other ends of the Covenant, such persons only may be entrusted by your Lordships to be of your committees and armies, as have given constant proof of their integrity and faithfulness in this cause, and against whom there is no just exception or jealousy, that so we may the more confidently encourage our flocks and congregations to follow the cause of God in their hands, and not to doubt of the fidelity of those, who shall be entrusted by your Lordships.

ANSWER. That they will be careful that none shall be employed in the command of their armies, nor in their committees, but such as are of known integrity and affection to the cause, and against whom there is no just cause of exception.

“ REPLY. Concerning such as are to be intrusted in armies and committees, doth admit of some of the qualifications expressed in the desire, viz. Such as have given constant proof of their integrity and faithfulness in this cause, and against whom there was no just cause of jealousy, that so we may the more confidently encourage our flocks to follow the cause of God in their hands, and not to doubt of their fidelity.

“ 8. DEMAND. That there be no engagement without a solemn oath, wherein the Church may have the same interest which they had in the solemn League and Covenant, the cause being the same.

ANSWER. They declare, that to the grounds of their engagements and undertaking an oath shall be subjoined, wherein both in the framing of it, and otherwise, the Church shall have their due interest. And the Estates of Parliament desire the Commissioners of the Church to appoint some of their number, to meet with such of the committee of Parliament of twenty four, as shall be appointed by the same committee, for the conference and stating of the question, for agreeing upon the grounds of an engagement, and drawing up such a state of a question, as may unite this Nation in an unanimous undertaking of such duties as are requisite for the reformation and defence of Religion, the safety, honour, and happiness of the King and his posterity, and the good of this Kingdom.

“ REPLY. Instead of that clear expression used, namely, That the Kirk may have the same interest in any oath for a new engagement, which they had in the solemn League and Covenant, they find this doubtful and uncertain expression, That both in the framing the oath and otherwise, the Kirk shall have their due interests.

"And upon these and the like considerations, they conceive that their desires, unto which they still adhere as just and necessary, are not satisfied by their Lordships answer."

Sundry Propositions

Rushworth,

The opposition of the Kirk Commissioners was not the only storm the resolution of levying an army drew upon the Committee of danger. Eighteen Lords and forty other Members of Parliament, entered a solemn protest against this vote, affirming, the Committee had exceeded their power, which they did not in any manner consent to give them. There were moreover two other difficulties to surmount, before the Parliament could positively order the levying of an army. The first related to the General, who was to have the command. Naturally this post belonged to General Lesly [now Lord Newark,] who had commanded the last army, and of whom there was no occasion to complain. But he was not fit for their purpose who were for a war. That party's scheme was to make Duke Hamilton General, because he had privately declared for the King, and it was conceived he would be more proper than Lesly, to unite the royal party in England, with the army of Scotland. This difficulty was at length removed, Lesly being artfully prevailed with to quit his pretension, under colour of age and infirmities. Which done, Duke Hamilton had no other rival (1).

The second difficulty was much more considerable. Before the Scotch Commissioners left London, they had intimated to several Officers and others of the King's party, that when the Scotch army should enter England, they should be welcome to the Scots, and with them make but one body and party, for the deliverance of the King out of the hands of the Independents. They had given the same assurances to Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and Sir Philip Mygrave, and by that induced them to promise to seize Berwick and Carlisle. Upon these hopes a great number of Royalists repaired to Edinburgh, to join with the Scots, or be employed in their army. Moreover, a troop of horse commanded by Captain Wogan, which was to have been disbanded, had retired into Scotland, to join the forces of that Kingdom; and this troop, by the junction of several horse-defectors, was become four hundred strong. Duke Hamilton had put Langdale and Mygrave in hopes that when the Scotch army should be in England, there would be no more said of the Covenant, and the Royalists might join with them and make but one body. But it was not in the power of those who made these promises to perform them. The Marquiss of Argyle, and the rigid Presbyterians strongly represented, both in publick and private,

"That under colour of acting against the Independents in England, the Royalists, that is, the mortal enemies of Scotland and of all Presbyterians, were going to be effectually restored. That this was the design of those who were so eager for a war, might easily be perceived, both by the activity of such Scots as had never heartily adhered to the Covenant, and by the extraordinary concourse of Royalists into Scotland. That even men were sent for to Edinburgh, who were most attached to the King's party, and most inveterate against the Covenant, such as Langdale, Mygrave, Glenham, Fleming, and others, who daily conferred with their friends, whereof the Parliament of England had complained to no purpose. That the junction with the King's party consisting of Papists, Episcopalians, and other disaffected persons, was a more manifest breach of the Covenant, than what the English were charged with. That, in short, by these proceedings the Covenant, which was the basis and foundation of the union betwixt the two Nations, would be destroyed, whilst it was pretended to raise an army to support it, and even whilst there was no other pretence to carry the war into England." These representations joined to the endeavours of the Parliament of England's Commissioners, who spared neither solicitations nor money to second them, made such impression on the people, that the Parliament could not help ordering, that those who had not taken, or should refuse to take, the Covenant, should not be received into the army, or joined with it at their entrance into England. After this declaration, it seemed to be out of Duke Hamilton's power to perform what he had promised the Royalists. But he found means to evade in some measure this order when he came into England, as will hereafter appear.

Clarendon,

Delays in Scotland.
Rushworth,
VI. p. 1100

These and other obstacles, daily raised by the Marquiss of Argyle, and the rigid Clergy, were the reason the Parliament could not be so speedy as the authors of the project had expected. As the people of Scotland were strongly prepossessed in favour of the Covenant and union with the English Presbyterians, the Parliament was obliged to publish a Declaration to satisfy them upon that head. But the contrary party pretended, there was no sincerity in this Declaration, full of ambiguous expressions, which discovered the ill designs of those who were for a war. So, though the party who had caused the raising of forces to be ordered, was superior in the Parliament, no soldiers could be levied till the middle of May, and the army was not ready till the beginning of July, though the Scotch Commissioners had assured it should be in condition to act by the beginning of May. Moreover this army, which was to consist of forty thousand men, was not above half that number, even after the junction of the English Troops. But before I speak of the success of these mighty preparations, it will be proper to see what passed in England.

Wales was the place where the first scene was opened. In that Country were three Colonels, namely, Langborn, Pewell, and Poyer, who had faithfully served the Parliament during the war, but unhappily found themselves by the new establishment, in the number of the supernumeraries who were to be disbanded, with which they were extremely dissatisfied. Having communicated their discontent to each other, they resolved all three to declare for the King, as soon as the Scotch army should enter the Kingdom. Langborn even sent a confidant to Paris, to acquaint the Queen and Prince of Wales with this design, desiring a commission, with supplies of money and ammunition. The commission was readily granted, but the circumstances of the Queen and Prince, allowed them not to send the desired supplies. Though these three officers had resolved not to declare before the Scots had entered England, they were however obliged to it sooner. Poyer, being Governor and Mayor of Pembroke in South-Wales, saw Colonel Fleming unexpectedly arrive with the General's commission to take the Government of the Castle. As this alteration could not but break the measures of the three Colonels, Poyer refused to obey, under colour it was unreasonable to deprive him of his Government, without paying him his arrears (2). The Parliament was inflamed when they heard of this disobedience, and declared Poyer a traitor, if he did not deliver the castle within four and twenty hours after the first summons. Poyer contemned this ordinance, and even defeated Fleming, to whom some troops had been sent to put him in possession of Pembroke Castle. As the particulars of this affair are not absolutely necessary, I shall content my self with saying, that it became of greater consequence than the Parliament had imagined. Not only Langborn and Pewell joined with Poyer, but all South-Wales declared for the King, whilst the Lord Byron was labouring to draw North-Wales and the parts about Chester into a revolt.

During these transactions in Wales, there were commotions in Kent no less dangerous to the army. The King had always many friends in that County, but the neighbourhood of London and the army kept them in awe. Mean time, some Gentlemen of the country having early information of the design of the Scots, took care to sow the seeds of revolt, in hopes of producing fruit in due season. The disposition of the people of Kent began to show itself in a great riot at Canterbury, the 25th of December 1647, [about keeping of Christmas-Day.] The multitude wounded and abused the Mayor and others of the Magistrates, and at last the cry was, For God, King Charles, and Kent. The tumult being appeased, and some of the mutineers apprehended, the Parliament had a mind to punish them with death. But they found too many obstacles, that it was May before they sent down a commission to try them. The Grand Jury refused to find the Bill, to the great affrontment of the Commissioners. There were at that time commotions forming in the County, in which the Grand Jury were doubtless concerned, and that was the reason of their not finding the Bill against their accomplices.

Though the directors of the affairs for the King had resolved to delay the Kentish insurrection till the army was marched against the Scots, it was not in their power to defer it so long. Roger L'Étrange a Norfolk-man (3) being in Kent, at the House of Mr. Hales a young Gentleman who was Heir to a great estate, persuaded him to undertake something in favour of the King, and to found the Gentry and people of the country that frequented his house. Matters were so ordered in the County, that about the middle of May, the people rose, took arms, and owned Hales for their General, in which they committed two very great errors. The first, in putting themselves under the conduct of

648. an unexperienced young man without authority. The second, in rising before the army was removed to some distance from London. As the General knew, the Scotch army was not yet ready, he detached Cromwell with part of his forces to reduce the Welsh to obedience, and then to march against the Scots at their entrance into England. For himself, he remained near London, as well to be ready to march against the Kentish men, as to prevent the like insurrection in London, which the army dreaded of all things. Besides that, he had no inclination, as it afterwards appeared, to act against the Scots.

The number of the male-contents in Kent being greatly increased, they were headed by [George Goring] Earl of Norwich, and Sir William Waller, and, in expectation that London would not fail to declare for them, advanced towards Black-Heath. Then Fairfax speedily passed the Thames with his army over London bridge, to give them battle. The Londoners being too wise to declare at such a juncture, the revolvers thought fit to retire, some to Rochester, and others to Maidstone. General Fairfax attacked these last so vigorously, that he carried the town by storm, slew many of them, and took a great number of prisoners. At the first news of this defeat, those at Rochester quitted the City, and posted themselves on Black-Heath, hoping still that London would send them assistance, or receive them into the City. These two refuges failing, and hearing, moreover, that a detachment of the army was approaching, they took to flight, and were dispersed; but however, a great many were made prisoners. The Earl of Norwich found means to pass the Thames at Greenwich in boats, with five or six hundred men, and join his friends in Essex, who were upon the point of passing into Kent, if Fairfax had not been so diligent.

The County of Essex was in the same disposition as Kent. There had been for some time in that County men, who were earnestly labouring to excite the people against the army, and only waited an opportunity to appear openly, as soon as the army should march to the North, not questioning but the approach of the Scots would oblige them to it. Of this number were Sir Charles Lucas, Lieutenant-Colonel Farr, Sir Bernard Gaspaign; and at the same time, the Lord Capel, one of the managers of the insurrections, was labouring the same thing in Hertfordshire. Though the Kentish insurrection had been unsuccessful, the Essex Royalists were not discouraged. They still hoped, either that London would declare for the King, or the Scotch army make so great progress, that the army of England would not be able to withstand so many attacks from all quarters. For there was scarce a County, but what was to have some insurrection, those especially, where the King's party prevailed during the war. So the Parliament having sent a general pardon into Essex, for such as should lay down their arms, most refused it by the influences of Sir Charles Lucas, who was the most active Royalist in those parts.

The General remained in Kent no longer than was necessary to raise the siege of Dover undertaken by Waller, and quiet the country, to which he granted very advantageous terms, considering their present circumstances. This done, he repassed the Thames and marched into Essex (1), where the number of the revolvers was increased by the junction of the troops brought out of Hertfordshire by the Lord Capel. Nevertheless, as they found themselves unable to keep the field before a victorious as well as a stronger army, they resolved to retire to Colchester. This was an open unfortified town: but they speedily cast up such works before the avenues, that they did not fear being stormed. Here they resolved to defend themselves, and wait the event of affairs in the other counties, and particularly in the North.

The principal men, who were in Colchester, were the Earl of Norwich (2), the Lord Capel, Sir George Lisle, Sir William Compton, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir Bernard Gaspaign, Lieutenant-Colonel Farr, and several other good officers, with a garrison of three thousand men, all bent to sell their lives dearly. This furnished the General with a reason, or perhaps a pretence not to attack the town in form, but to block it up, and reduce the besieged by famine. I say, this might be a pretence: for it seems, in such a juncture, when all the Kingdom was in a flame, and the Scotch army expected every moment, it was not proper for the General to be employed in a blockade, which probably would last some time, whilst he left the rest of the Kingdom defenseless, and was in great danger from the City of London. But as he might have good reasons to run no hazard, it is not my business to censure his conduct. All that can be said is, that his whole proceedings showed his unwillingness to fight with the Scots, tho' he always acted vigorously against the King's friends. May I venture to make one conjecture? Fairfax was a zealous Presbyterian, but hitherto had suffered himself to be guided, or rather deceived, by Cromwell. Perhaps having discovered the artifices and ill designs of this friend, he would not have been sorry to see Cromwell defeated, in expectation that if he were slain, or lost his reputation, it would be easier to make peace, which he found to be impracticable so long as Cromwell could oppose it. According to this supposition, the blockade of Colchester enabled the General to wait, without any hazard, the event of the war preparing in the North. However this be, he applied himself to the blockade, which began the 10th of June, and lasted till August (3).

The revolted Kentishmen, as I said, had twice advanced towards London, in hopes the city would declare for them. This hope was not altogether groundless. Besides that the city was known to be very much displeased with the army, the common people had, in the beginning of April, shown their readiness for any undertaking. Some persons playing and sporting on a Sunday in Moorfields in contempt of the ordinance of Parliament, the constables of that quarter would have dispersed them: but it was not in their power. The obstinacy of the mob went so far, that a party of the trained-bands were forced to be sent for. But before the party arrived, the number of the rioters was grown so great, that they fell upon and dispersed the trained-bands, wounding and killing several. This success so inflamed the tumult, that the mob came from all quarters to join with the mutineers. Some seized Newgate and Ludgate; others went to the Lord-Mayor's house, who seeing them coming, ran away to the Tower, whilst others made towards Whitehall, but were repulsed by the regiment of Horse posted in the Meuse for a guard to the Parliament. In the night the tumult still increased: The cry was every where, For God and King Charles. The General, who was then in London, with only the two regiments at Whitehall and the Meuse, immediately called a council, where it was debated, whether they should stay for more forces, or attack the mutineers with these two regiments. The last was judged most advisable, whilst the seditious were yet acting with great confusion, and had no leader to conduct them. They were therefore vigorously attacked when they least expected it, and thought themselves masters of the city, and though they made an obstinate defence, were at length dispersed. The Parliament, having received the circumstances of this commotion, believed it to have been very dangerous, and ordered publick thanks to be given to God in all the Churches of London for its being happily appeased. When I say the Parliament, I mean the Parliament still directed by the Independents, who dreaded nothing so much as to see London declare against the army. But as the army was not yet removed, the magistrates were too wise to declare so unseasonably.

I have already mentioned two of the projects against the army; the insurrection in Wales, which kept Cromwell employed till the beginning of July; and that of Kent, which by too great a precipitation, miscarried; and lastly, of the tumult in London, which probably had been raised by some rash and inconsiderate Royalists, who knew nothing of the projects that were formed. I must now speak of some others which were executed about the same time, that is, whilst preparations were making in Scotland to send an army into England, and which were attended with no better success.

The first was the Duke of York's escape, the King's second son, from St. James's palace, where he was under the Earl of Northumberland's custody, and his retreat into Holland, to his Sister the Princess of Orange. Thus to have his two eldest sons out of the power of his enemies, was no small advantage and satisfaction to the King (4).

Some days after, Langdale possessed himself of Berwick, and Musgrave of Carlisle. The Parliament had received some intelligence of the design to surprize these places, and might have prevented it by putting garrisons there. But as, by the late treaty with Scotland, they were to be left to the care of the inhabitants, the two Houses were unwilling by seizing them, to give the Scots so just an occasion to complain, at a time when they wanted pretences to send an army into England. They contented themselves therefore with ordering the Mayors, to take care and provide against a surprize, which however they either could not or would not prevent.

As soon as Langdale was master of Berwick, all the Royalists in Yorkshire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland came and joined him. By this means, he quickly formed a body of three thousand Foot and one thousand Horse, which enabled him to go in quest of General Lambert, who commanded in those parts for the Parliament. But he received very express orders from Edinburgh not to engage in any action, what advantage soever he might thence expect, but to retire about Carlisle till the arrival of the Scotch army, which he obeyed. The reason of this order was, that as the rigid Presbyterians of Scotland were extremely jealous, that the progress made in England for the King, would obstruct the levying an army in Scotland. And indeed, it was publicly said, the army was intended for the King's rather than for the service of the English Presbyterians.

The loss of Berwick and Carlisle was followed soon after with another, which seemingly should have embroiled the affairs of the Independents. I mean the revolt of part of the Fleet about the end of May. The Parliament having ordered eight men of war to guard the seas during the summer, these ships lay in the Downs to take in provisions, which was done but slowly, because there was not much to be feared from the Sea. While this part of the Fleet lay in the Downs, some Kentish Gentlemen, the King's friends, frequently came on board (1). Whether they found in the sailors an inclination to mutiny, or raised it themselves by conversing with them, it happened shortly after, that the service was not performed in the Fleet with the same submission as before. The Sailors took the liberty to contradict their officers, and obey them no farther than they pleased. The officers perceiving this great alteration, acquainted the Parliament with it, and immediately Vice-Admiral Rainsborough, who was to command this Squadron, was ordered to repair to the Fleet, and inquire into the causes of this disobedience. Rainsborough, being naturally very severe, began to make strict inquiry on board the Admiral's Ship; upon which the men all rose against him, and seizing on him, put him with some more of the officers into the boat, and sent them on shore. This was no sooner known to the rest of the ships, but they followed their example, and used such officers as they did not like, in the same manner. As the Fleet was not yet well victualled, they were obliged to stay some days longer in the Downs, during which the Royalists supplied them with necessaries in the best manner they could. After that, they sailed for Holland, and came to an anchor at the Brill, in order to put themselves under the command of the Duke of York, who was designed by the King to be Lord High Admiral, as soon as he should be of fit age for that post.

The Duke of York repairing to the fleet, then at Helvoet-Sluis, was received with great acclamations. He declared the Lord Willoughby of Parham, his Vice-Admiral (2), and appointed some other officers in the several Ships, the sailors having kept very few above the rank of a Boatwain or Mate (3). As soon as the Prince of Wales, who was at Paris with the Queen his Mother, heard of this revolt, he resolved to command the fleet himself, and employ it to the best advantage. But want of money detained him longer than he wished, Cardinal Mazarin not being very forward to supply him, no more than the Earl of Ormond, who waited in vain at Paris, for the performance of his promises concerning Ireland. The news that the Duke his Brother was preparing to sail with the fleet, made him repeat his endeavours to procure money upon loan, and succeeding at last, came to Calais, and from thence by sea to Helvoet-Sluis. He was received by the fleet with all the respect and joy that could be desired, and having provided what was wanting, by the Prince of Orange's assistance, sent back the Duke of York to the Hague, it not being proper to venture both at one time. His design was to seize Yarmouth, whether to go from thence and head the Scotch army, when it should be in England, or to secure an entrance into the Kingdom, when there should be occasion. In failing to Yarmouth, he took a ship of London, bound for Rotterdam, laden with cloth by the company of Merchant-adventurers. It was said this ship was worth forty thousand pounds. He ordered the goods to be sealed up, and continued his course. But he succeeded not at Yarmouth as he expected, the town refusing to admit him, though great part of the inhabitants were for the King. Wherefore he resolved to enter the Thames, as well to intercept all outward and homeward-bound ships, as to support the King's party, and that of the Presbyterians in the Parliament and City; for he was not ignorant of the projects that were formed. Besides, the Queen his Mother had enjoined him to court the Presbyterians, conceiving it was only by their means, that the King could be restored.

For this reason also, he afterwards released the Cloth ship for twelve thousand pounds.

Whilst the Prince lay in the Thames, where he seized some other Merchant ships, the Earl of Warwick, being well assured of the fidelity of the rest of the ship at Portsmouth, and elsewhere, assembled a fleet, and anchored in sight of the Prince; so that in all appearance the two fleets would not part without an engagement. But though the Prince seemed inclined to it, he was advised to avoid it if possible, and not without reason. His ship were fewer, and much smaller than the Earl of Warwick's; besides, the Earl expected others from Portsmouth every moment, which arriving the next day, rendered him very superior. So the Prince sailed back to Holland, and secured his fleet at Helvoet-Sluis. The Earl of Warwick and his fleet appeared before that port, but to no manner of purpose.

Thus ended the Prince of Wales's expedition with the ships revolted from the Parliament. The money he received for the prizes he had taken, was not sufficient to pay his fleet, and provide it with necessaries, so that it procured him more trouble than advantage. Before I leave this subject, it will not be improper, briefly to explain some circumstances in the Lord Clarendon's History.

Whilst the two fleets lay in sight, and seemed to prepare for battle, the Prince sent Harry Seymour to the Earl of Warwick, with a letter to invite him to return to his allegiance. The Earl answered, that he advised his Highness to put himself into the hands of the Parliament. Notwithstanding this discouraging answer, the Prince sent Mr. Crofts to the Earl, who had married his Aunt, imagining, he durst not venture to discover his sentiments to Seymour. But Crofts returned with much the same answer. Hence it appears, the Prince thought he had some room to rely on the Earl of Warwick, as the Lord Clarendon insinuates, and the ground of his hope, which was properly the effect only of his, or rather of the whole Royal Party's, prepossession, was briefly this. The Scotch commissioners, as I said, did not acquaint the leading Presbyterians with the particulars of their treaty with the King in the Isle of Hight. They only told them, an army would be raised in Scotland to deliver the King out of the hands of the Independents, and that it was necessary the Royalists and Presbyterians should second their endeavours. This proposal being accepted, the Royalists and Presbyterians prepared, as I have said, to countenance the designs of the Scots by insurrections in several parts of the Kingdom. Matters standing thus, [Henry Rich] Earl of Holland, who had acted an ill part in the late war, had a mind on this occasion, to reconcile himself to the King, by labouring his restoration. To that end, he received a commission from the Prince of Wales, empowering him to raise forces for the King's service, and his brother the Earl of Warwick promised to assist him in his designs. This is what the Prince knew, and what made him believe the Earl of Warwick was in the same disposition with his brother. But there was a wide difference between the views of the Royalists, and those of the Presbyterians. These last, of whom the Earl of Warwick was one of the heads, did not pretend to restore the King without terms, but only to free him out of the hands of the Independents, to make conditions with him afterwards, which they called settling the peace of the Kingdom. But the Prince, and the King's whole party would not understand this difference, and preposterously imagined, that all who had promised to act against the Independents, had thereby engaged to serve the King without terms. Herein lay the mistake. It is therefore evident, the Earl of Warwick, who was a Presbyterian views, could not believe it to be his interest to deliver the fleet to the Prince, since, notwithstanding the present occasion which induced the Presbyterians to be in a readiness to act against the army, they still considered the Royal party as their real enemies.

In the beginning of June, the King's friends found means to surprise Pontefract castle in Yorkshire, and put a garrison there. Shortly after Scarborough castle revolted from the Parliament, and declared for the King.

The Scotch army being at length upon the point of entering England, General Fairfax being still employed in the blockade of Colchester, and Cromwell in the siege of Penbrake, and as there were but two regiments in London, [Henry Rich] Earl of Holland, thought he could not have a fairer opportunity to execute his design in favour of the King. This design was so far from being a secret, that it was become the common talk of the city. It was known beforehand, what day the Earl of Holland would depart, and the Parliament did not seem to regard it. It was not for want of information; but the scene of affairs was much altered since the army's removal from London. The Independents prevailed no more in the Parliament, and the Presbyterians began to hold up their heads. For this reason, the Independents did not think proper, at such a juncture, to take any steps that might induce the City of London to declare openly. On the other hand, the Presbyterian members were far from endeavouring to prevent the Earl of Holland's design, which they considered as flowing from the general combination for the delivery of the King out of the hands of the army. So, the Earl publicly departed from London, with about one hundred Horse, and came to Kingston upon Thames, where [George Villiers] the young Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Francis Villiers his brother, [Henry Mordaunt] Earl of Peterborough, [and the family of the Earl of Northampton] met him with some troops (1). As soon as they were joined, they sent a letter to the Lord-Mayor and Common-Council of London, declaring their intention was to join the forces of Surrey, Suffolk, and Middlesex, to release his Majesty's person, to bring him with honour to his Parliament, and to settle peace in the Kingdom: And desired their assistance no farther than their designs were really for the good and happiness of the King, Parliament and Kingdom, according to the Covenant. These last words, according to the Covenant, seemed necessary, because they knew the Presbyterians wished for nothing so much as the confirmation of the Covenant. But the Magistrates of London thought not fit to chuse for leaders, the Earl of Holland, who was in no great repute, or the Duke of Buckingham an inexperienced youth, who had only the King's service in view, without any regard to the publick, or the Covenant; or in short, any of these Lords, whose principles were by no means agreeable to those of the Presbyterians. So, without answering this letter, they sent it to the Parliament, who immediately voted the Lords that had signed it to be traitors, [and their estates to be sequestrated.]

The same day the letter was writ, Colonel Levesey, with some companies of the two regiments that were quartered in Westminster, met these Lords near Kingston, and entirely routed them. But, Levesey's Foot which was left behind, not being yet arrived, and the Lords having sent theirs to Kingston, to secure their retreat, the Horse only, on both sides, were engaged. Levesey briskly pursued them to Kingston, where the Foot stood their ground, and hindered the enemies Horse from entering the town. That same night they quitted Kingston, and retired to St. Albans, with about four hundred men.

Mean while, General Fairfax hearing of this Insurrection, sent from the blockade of Colchester, Colonel Scrope with a regiment of Horse, to the assistance of the Parliament's troops. Scrope coming to Harlow, was informed, that the Lords who had been defeated at Kingston, were at St. Neot's in a negligent manner. Upon this intelligence, he marched thither in the night, and surprised them in that little town, killing some of their men, taking above a hundred prisoners, and dispersing the rest. The Lord Francis Villiers was slain (2). His brother the Duke of Buckingham, found means to escape, and the Earl of Holland was taken, conducted to London, and afterwards sent prisoner to Warwick Castle. This ended this ill concerted enterprise, managed by persons of no experience or skill in the art of war.

At last, Duke Hamilton entered England at the head of the Scotch army, the 9th of July. The eleven of the same month, Pembroke Castle surrendered to Cromwell, who immediately dispatched a body of Horse to re-inforce the army in the North, commanded by Major-General Lambert. He departed himself three days after, with the rest of his forces, which were already very much fatigued by the late siege, and of which the greatest part wanted shoes and stockings, though they undertook a long march, which probably, would be followed with a battle. These difficulties discouraged not Cromwell. He pursued his march with all possible diligence, and yet could not join Lambert till the middle of August. We must now see what Duke Hamilton was doing, whilst Cromwell was marching towards him.

The design of those who had prevailed for the raising an army in Scotland, seemed to be to assist the English Presbyterians, to free the Parliament from the yoke of the Independents, and to deliver the King out of the hands of the army. These at least were the most plausible things that were urged to induce the Parliament of Scotland to consent to this extraordinary expedition. But it may very justly be doubted, whether this was the design of all the leaders of that party. Some, among whom were Duke Hamilton, and his Brother the Earl of Lanerick, probably, sought only to restore the King without terms, or at least without any other condition than what he had himself offered;

namely, his promise to observe the ancient Laws. They did not much concern themselves about maintaining the establishment of Presbyterianism in England, or the Covenant between the two nations. Others, as the Earls of Loudon, and Lauderdale, who had been commissioners in England, really intended to serve the King, but upon these two conditions, that the Presbyterian-government should be established in the Church of England, and the Covenant punctually observed. As they thought, they had taken sufficient care of these two points, by the Ips of Wight treaty, they little regarded the other conditions required of the King by the Parliament of England, concerning the Militia, nomination to the great offices, &c. But very likely, their design was to deceive one another. These last meant to make use of the King's party to procure the execution of the Ips of Wight treaty, and the King's party, feigning to agree to what the others desired, intended to make use of them to enable the King not to be forced to receive any terms. The Duke of Hamilton's conduct after his entrance into England, seems to me a very strong evidence, that he designed not to act in favour of the Presbyterians. If he had such an intention, he should not, it seems, have lost, as he did, forty days in the northern Counties, but have marched directly to London. Lambert would not have been able to hinder his march, being much weaker than he. Cromwell was yet employed in Wales, and Fairfax in the blockade of Colchester. Probably, if, without losing time, he had marched to London, he would have arrived before Cromwell and Lambert could have joined forces, and if Fairfax had quitted the blockade of Colchester, in order to throw himself into London, very likely, the inhabitants would have shut their gates against him, since they would have been supported by the army of Scotland. At least, in case Fairfax had risen from before Colchester, that town, the whole County of Essex, and doubtless, Suffolk, and Norfolk, would have joined with the Scots. In a word, if the Scotch army had marched towards the centre of the Kingdom, there would, doubtless, have been in many places, insurrections, which would have greatly distressed the army of the Independents; and if Duke Hamilton could have reached London, certainly the City and Parliament would have openly declared against the army, and expelled out of both Houses, the Independent members. It will hereafter appear; these are not bare conjectures, considering what passed in the City and Parliament, whilst it was expected, the Scotch army would take the course, I have been speaking of.

But Duke Hamilton had doubtless other views, since he staid above a month in the north, without any necessity. The Lord Clarendon conjectures, the Duke's intention was, to afford time to the English army to defeat those forces which were up in several parts of the Kingdom for the King, that they might not be so united as to obstruct the Presbyterians design. But, whatever regard I may have for that noble Historian, I cannot be of his opinion, for two reasons which to me seem very strong. The first is, that Duke Hamilton was not a zealous Presbyterian. On the contrary, though he had taken the Covenant, he was Episcopal in his heart, as he had sufficiently discovered whilst he could do it without danger. The second is, that he was the man who had most courted and drawn into Scotland the Royalists, whilst the voting of an army was in question. I should rather think, he had a quite contrary aim to what the Lord Clarendon imputes to him; that instead of designing to countenance the Presbyterian party, he rather feared to render them too powerful, by approaching London, knowing, when the King should be in the hands of the Presbyterians, his condition would not be much happier. Very likely, his long stay in the north, was only to give the King's friends in those parts opportunity to join Langdale's forces, and thereby render the King's party superior.

However this be, not to dwell too long upon conjectures, as soon as Duke Hamilton entered England, he marched to Carlisle, from whence he drew out the English, placed there by Musgrave, and put in a Scotch Garrison. Some days after, Langdale joined him with about four thousand English Foot, and seven or eight hundred Horse (3). But these troops remained separate, and in the marches, Langdale was always a day before the Scotch army. This was to evade in some measure the order of the Parliament of Scotland, that the English who should refuse to take the Covenant, should not be received into the army, nor act in conjunction with the Scots. Nevertheless the English and Scots made but one army, under the command of Duke Hamilton, from whom Langdale received orders. Lambert who was posted near the place where the two armies joined, or at least approached each 1648. other, retired in such disorder, that probably he would have been defeated, had he been pursued; but Duke Hamilton did not think fit to improve this advantage. He continued some days at Carlisle, after which he marched to Kendal in Westmoreland, where he rested again, till finding not wherewithal to subsist his army, he was forced, as it were, to proceed to Lancashire with part of his army, leaving the rest at Kendal. At length, he advanced to Preston, where he halted, the reason whereof is not known, unless it was to stay for Monroe, who was coming with three thousand men out of Scotland.

Mean while, Cromwell having reached Yorkshire, Lambert instantly joined him, and they marched together directly to Preston, where Duke Hamilton lay. Langdale who made the van of the Duke's army with his English troops, sent him notice that Cromwell was approaching with a resolution to give him battle, and consequently it was necessary to keep his army together. But the Duke regarded not this intelligence, believing it to be only some detachment of Cromwell's army. In short, Langdale was attacked by the enemies Horse, who drove him to Preston, where he brought with him some prisoners, who averred, that Cromwell's whole army was near. Whereupon the Duke sent him back to his troops, promising to send him assistance; but disappointed him. So Langdale being attacked, was forced to maintain a very unequal fight, which lasted however five or six hours; but at last he was entirely routed. Immediately after, Cromwell's Horse marched directly to Preston, where all was in such confusion that nothing was thought of but flight. The Duke himself found it proper to retire by the bridge, which he in vain attempted to hold. The following letter was sent by Cromwell to the Parliament, the 20th of August, containing a particular account of what passed between the two armies, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of August.

“After the conjunction of that party which I brought with me out of Wales with the northern forces about Knaresborough and Wetherby, hearing that the enemy was advanced with their army to Lancashire, we came the 6th instant to Holder-bridge over Ribble, where we had a council of war; and upon advertisement the enemy intended southward, and since confirmed, that they resolved for London itself, and information that the Irish forces under Monroe, lately come out of Ireland, which consisted of twelve hundred Horse, and fifteen hundred Foot, were on their march towards Lancashire to join with them, it was thought, to engage the enemy to fight was our business; and accordingly marching over the bridge that night, quartered the whole army in the fields. Next morning we marched towards Preston, having intelligence that the enemy was drawing together thereabouts from all his out quarters; we drew out a forlorn of about two hundred Horse, and four hundred Foot; these gallantly engaged the enemy's Scouts and out-guards, until we had opportunity to bring up our whole army. So soon as our foot and horse were come up, we resolved that night to engage them if we could; and therefore advancing with our forlorns, and putting the rest of the army into as good a posture as the ground would bear, (which was totally inconvenient for our Horse, being all inclosure and miry ground) we pressed upon them through a lane, and forced them from their ground, after four hours dispute, until we came to the town; then we sent our troops of my Regiment first entered; and being well seconded by Colonel Harrison's regiment, we cleared the enemy's out-guards, and cleared the town, and the enemy was put into disorder, many men slain, and many prisoners taken; the Duke with most of the Scots Horse and Foot retreated over the bridge; where after a very hot dispute betwixt the English and Scots, of my Lord General's and them being at push of pike they were beaten from the bridge, and our Horse and Foot following them, killed many, and took divers prisoners; and we possessed the bridge over Derwent, and a few houses there, the enemy being drawn up within musquet shot of us, where we lay that night, we not being able to attempt further upon the enemy, the night preventing us. In this posture did the enemy and we lie most part of that night; upon entering the town, many of the enemy's Horse fled towards Lancaster, in the chase of whom we had divers of our Horse, who pursued them about ten miles, and had possession of them, and took about five hundred Horse, and many prisoners: We were also in the possession of the enemy's ammunition; I believe they lost four or five thousand arms; the number of the slain we judge to be about a thousand, the prisoners we took near about four thousand.

“I then let the enemy pass away, seven or eight thousand Foot, and about four thousand Horse; we followed them with about three thousand Foot, and about two thousand five hundred Horse and Dragons; and in this prosecution that worthy Gentleman Colonel Thornhaugh, pressing too boldly, was slain, being run into the ivy, till he was killed. Our Horse still prosecuted the enemy, killing and taking divers all the way; but by that time our army was come up, they recovered Wigan before we could attempt any thing upon them. We lay that night in the field close by the enemy, lying very dirty and weary, where we had some skirmishing, &c. We took Major-General Van Druske, Col. Harrey, and Lieutenant-Colonel Lewis.

“The next morning the enemy marched towards Warrington, made a stand at a pass near Winwick; we held them in some dispute until our army was come up, they maintaining the pass with great resolution for many hours; but our men, by the blessing of God, charged very home upon them, beat them from their standing, where we killed about a thousand of them, and took (as we believe) about two thousand prisoners, and prosecuted them home to Warrington town, where they possessed the bridge. As soon as we came thither, I received a message from Lieutenant-General Bailey, desiring me to capitulate; to which I yielded, and gave him these terms: I that he should surrender himself and all his officers and soldiers prisoners of war, with all his arms, ammunition, and horses, upon quarter for life; which accordingly is done. Here are took about four thousand complete arms, and as many prisoners: And the rest of the army retired.

“The Duke is marched with his remaining Horse (which are about three thousand) towards Nantwich, where the Gentlemen of the county have taken about five hundred of them; the country will scarce suffer any of them to pass, but bring in and kill divers as they light upon them. I have sent post to my Lord Grey and Sir Edward Rhodes, to gather all together with speed for their prosecution: Monroe is about Cumberland, with the horse that ran away, and his Irish horse and foot; but I have left a considerable strength, I hope, to make resistance till we can come up to them.

“Thus you have the narrative of the particulars of the success, I could hardly tell how to say less, there being so much of God; and I was not willing to say more, lest there should seem to be any thing of Man; only give me leave to add one word, shewing the disparity of the forces of both sides; that so you may see, and all the world acknowledge, the great hand of God in this business. The Scots army could not be less than twelve thousand Foot well armed, and five thousand Horse; Langdale not less than two thousand five hundred Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse; in all twenty one thousand: in ours, in all, about eight thousand six hundred, and by computation about two thousand of the enemy's slain, betwixt eight and nine thousand Prisoners, besides what are lurking in hedges and private places, which the country daily bring in, or destroy.”

To finish, in a few words, the relation of the unfortunate end of Duke Hamilton and his army, I shall add, to what is said in Cromwell's letter, that the Duke retiring to Nantwich, and finding himself pursued by Lambert with a strong party of Horse, marched to Uxeter [in Staffordshire], where Lambert was almost as soon as he, and where the Scots made not the least shew of resistance. In a word, the Duke was taken with all the officers about him; and of the whole army, the Horse only escaped, who went and joined Monroe in Cumberland. To this came the great effort of Scotland in favour of the King. I lay in favour of the King, for it is certain, most of the authors of this enterprise intended the King's restoration, though they covered their design with other pretences.

The defeat of the Scots army was followed, within few days, by the taking of Colchester, the blockade whereof had lasted above two months. The besieged having been forced to surrender at discretion, the General called a council of war, where it was determined, that Sir George Lisle, Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir Bernard Gasseigne (who should be shot to death. The two first were executed, but the General hearing, Sir Charles had saved his life, for fear the Grand-Duke should revenge his

The Prince of Wales was at the Hague, when the news of Duke Hamilton's defeat arrived there. On the morrow, [John Maitland] Earl of Lauderdale waited on him with a letter from the Parliament of Scotland, inviting him to come into their Country, and head their army in England. But the news he had received the day before being confirmed, he did not think fit to hazard his person to no purpose, though the Earl of Lauderdale pressed him extremely to depart. So, the Earl was obliged to return all alone.

The State of the Parliament and City.
The Independents prevail in the Parliament.

After the recital of the fruits of the several commotions raised by the King's friends in the last seven or eight months, it will be necessary, before we proceed, to speak of what passed the mean while in the Parliament and City.

Since the two Houses had voted no more addresses to the King, there was a perfect union between the Parliament and the army. The army no more pretended to meddle in State-affairs. They contented that the supernumerary troops, that is, such as were not upon the late establishment, should be disbanded by Companies, as money was raised to pay them. They promised to retire to the Towns and Garrisons as soon as the Parliament should settle the necessary funds for their regular pay. This concession or rather submission to the Parliament, proceeded from the Independents power in both Houses, no resolution being taken but by their direction, or at least that was contrary to their views. On the other hand, though the Presbyterians were not sorry, there were insurrections in the Kingdom capable of keeping the army employed, and obliging them to remove from London, they were in danger however that the King's party would grow too powerful before the Scotch army should enter England. Upon this army it was that they founded their hope of becoming once more masters of the Parliament and Kingdom. But they perceived, that before the arrival of the assistance expected from Scotland, it was not their interest to second the endeavours of the Royalists, whose views were very opposite to theirs, for fear of enabling them to renew the war by their own strength. On the other hand, they would have acted very imprudently, if they had openly declared against the army, whilst it was about London, without having sufficient forces to resist it. The assistance of Scotland only could enable them to hold up their heads. For which reason the votes of both Houses were always unanimous to condemn the insurrections in Wales, Kent, Essex, as well as those of the Earl of Holland and the Duke of Buckingham. This was also the reason, that the Independents met with no obstacle in causing the eleven Members accused by the army to be declared incapable of serving in Parliament, and the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen of London, and the seven Peers to be prosecuted with the utmost rigour for being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July.

The Presbyterians rely upon the assistance of Scotland.
Policy of the Presbyterians.

These were the resolutions of a Parliament yet governed and directed by the Independents. But when once Cromwell was engaged in Wales with part of the army, Fairfax employed at the blockade of Colchester, and when the surprisal of Berwick and Carlisle had made it necessary to send some Regiments into the North, the face of affairs began to change. The Independent Members found themselves obliged, in their turn, to dissemble, and consent to things which they would doubtless have opposed, had the army been near to support them.

They get up arms in the Parliament.
Petition from the City.
April 27.
Rushworth, VII. p. 1073.

The 27th of April, before the army removed from London, upon information, true or false, brought to the Parliament (2), that some officers had plotted to disarm, and then plunder the City, the Common-Council presented a Petition to the House of Commons, desiring, that the chains of the City, which had been lately pulled down, might be set up again; the army removed to a farther distance from London; and Major-General Skippon appointed to command within the lines of communication, and the weekly bills of mortality. It is evident the Common-Council had a mind to have it in their power to act when the Scotch army should enter England. For they could not imagine the Scots had other thoughts than to support the Presbyterian party in England. The House granted two of their requests, and took time to consider of the removal of the army.

The next day the House of Commons having taken into consideration the affair of settling the Government, voted :

- " 1. That the Government of the Kingdom should be still by King, Lords, and Commons.
- " 2. That the ground-work for this Government should be the propositions last presented to the King at Hampton-Court.
- " 3. That any Member of the House should have leave to speak freely to any votes, ordinances, or declarations concerning the King, &c.

These Votes were directly contrary to the designs of the Independents, who meant to abolish regal power, and establish a Commonwealth. But as their intention was yet a secret, or at least they had not declared it, they did not think proper to discover it too openly, by opposing these Votes.

Some days after, sundry of the Inhabitants of London presented a petition to the Common-Council, praying, that the Lord-Mayor and Sheriffs of London might be put on the Committee for the Militia of the City, and that the rest of the Committee might be chosen by the Common-Council.

Upon this, the Lord-Mayor and Common-Council presented a Petition to the House of Commons, shewing, " That the General having by letter informed the House of Commons of his design to raise two Regiments that were at Westminster, they conceived, that there was an expectation, the Parliament should be guarded by the forces of the City, which they were ready to do, provided they were put into a capacity to perform the same, by settling the Militia of London, and being authorized so to do.

" That the Lord-Mayor and Common-Council might, by ordinance of Parliament, be authorized to nominate and present to both Houses of Parliament a Committee for the Militia of the said City; whereby Commanders and soldiers might be the better united and encouraged to perform their duties, for the safety and preservation of the Parliament and City.

" That the command of the Tower of London might be put into the hand of such a person as should be nominated and presented to both Houses of Parliament by the Lord-Mayor and Common-Council.

" That the Soldiers there remaining might be removed."

All this was granted against the interest of the Independents, who, for a few months before, had ordered the contrary, because they knew the Londoners were not for them. Thus the City endeavoured by degrees, under divers pretences, to put themselves in condition to act, when the season was ripe.

It appears also by a declaration of the House of Commons of the 5th of May, how much the Presbyterians began to be superior in the Parliament. This declaration ran: That the House is resolved to preserve and maintain the solemn League and Covenant, and the Treaties between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland: And that they will be ready to join with the Kingdom of Scotland in the propositions agreed upon by the two Kingdoms, and presented to his Majesty at Hampton-Court. This was a tooth to unite themselves with the Scots, as soon as they should enter the Kingdom. Probably, the Commons believed them to be more ready than they were, and moreover, were yet ignorant, that the aim of those who had promoted the raising of an army in Scotland, was rather to serve the King, than support the Presbyterian-party in England. But they soon perceived, the Royalists intended not to maintain the Parliament's interest. If the Cavaliers, for so the King's party were called, had behaved with a little more policy, and less passion and heat, they might have done the King signal service. But they so openly showed, that their design was to restore the King without terms, that they obliged the Presbyterians to be upon their guard, and even to oppose them, instead of acting jointly with them, as the Cavaliers expected. This passion, or, if you please, extreme zeal for the King's service, was always the distinguishing character of that party, and often baffled their designs. Some of this party, inhabitants of the County of Surrey, could not contain themselves so long as would have been requisite for the King's interest. They assembled in great numbers, Horse and Foot, and came to Westminster, where they presented a petition to the Lords, and another to the Commons, worded in such high and strong terms, that they seemed to believe themselves supported by the whole Kingdom. They demanded :

They held out so long, that all the dogs and cats, and most of the horses were eaten. Petition from Sir in behalf
the King.

“ That the King might be reſtor'd to his due honour,
 “ and juſt rights, according to the oaths of Allegiance and “ Supremacy : That he might be forthwith eſtabliſhed in “ his throne, according to the ſplendor of his anceſtors :
 “ That he might for the preſent come to Weſtmiſter with “ honour and ſafety, to treat perſonally for compoſing “ differences : That the free-born Subject of England “ might be governed by the known Laws and Statutes in “ force in the Kingdom : That the war beginning might “ be prevented ; and that the ordinances for preventing “ free-quarrel, might be duly executed, and ſpeed made “ in diſbanding all armies, having their arrears due paid “ them.”

Nothing could be more unfeasible than this petition in such a juncture, when the business was to foment the division between the Presbyterians and Independents, whereas the petition tended to unite them against the Royalists. The Lords answered, "They were now upon the confidence of the settling of the Kingdom, and doubted not to satisfy all." Whilst the Commons were debating on the petition, some of the Surrey-men (1) quarrelled with the Parliament's guard, disarmed two or three of the soldiers, and killed one. Whereupon, to hinder them from carrying their violence any farther, more Horse and Foot were sent for from the Muske and Whitehall, who slew and wounded several, before they could be dispersed.

Union between the City and Parliament.

Whitelock.

This attempt, and an information brought to the House of Commons, that soldiers were privately lifting in London, and a plot contriving by the Royal Party to ruin both Parliament and City, Presbyterians, and Independents, caused the Parliament and City to enter into a strict union together. It was equally their interest to guard against the Royalists, who hated the city no less than the Parliament and army, and to take measures to hinder the execution of the Cavaliers designs. Thus the impetuous zeal of the Cavaliers was extremely injurious to the King; whereas had it been well managed, it might have procured him great advantages. If they could have resolved to conceal their sentiments, and suffer the Presbyterians to believe, that their sole design was to deliver the King out of the hands of the Independents, and to act against the army, they would have, doubtless, considerably strengthened their party; and the Presbyterians, instead of hurting, would have assisted them. This was, probably, Duke Hamilton's project, and theirs, who laboured to procure him the command of the Scottish army. But the rash and impetuous zeal of some particular persons, to whom it was not thought proper to impart the secret, caused the Presbyterians to be as much upon their guard against the Cavaliers, as against the Independents. So in all the insurrections in several parts of the Kingdom, whilst the Scottish army was expected, the Presbyterians were wholly unconcerned, except in Kent, where some general officers and reformado's were willing to engage. But after that disappointment, they lay still, in expectation of the Scots, on whose assistance they relied very much, though, as I before observed, without any foundation.

Mean while, the Presbyterians were greatly embarrassed. The Scotch army was not yet come, and they were in no less danger from the King's successes, than from the army's. They could therefore join with neither of the parties, without labouring their own ruin. The designs of all three were so opposite, that whichever should prevail, the other two would be infallibly ruined. The Presbyterians therefore resolved at length to take advantage of the army's absence, of the number of their voices in the Parliament, and of the assistance of the city, to conclude a peace with the King. But in order to this peace, it was necessary, the King should consent to three conditions, without which they could not resolve to be reconciled to him. The first was, That the Militia of the Kingdom should, for such a number of years, be put into the hands of both Houses. This point having been the immediate cause, or at least the pretence of the war, they could not depart from it, without evidently shewing, the war had been undertaken without an absolute necessity, which would have rendered them odious to the whole Kingdom. For to what purpose had so much blood been spilt, and so much treasure consumed, if a peace could be made without this security? Besides, in neglecting this article, they would, as I may say, have put themselves in the King's mercy, whom they had mortally offended. The second condition was, That the Presbyterian Government should be established by authority of King and Parliament. This condition was no less necessary. It was one of the strongest motives of their undertaking and continuing the war, wherein they had been crowned with success, the advantages of which they were not disposed to relinquish. What would they have gained by the war, if by a peace they were to be liable anew to the jurisdiction of the Bishops, and episcopal Clergy, their mortal enemies? The third condition was, That the King should call in all his proclamations and declarations against the two Houses. The necessity of this condition is evident, for the King having declared the members of both Houses rebels, they could not treat with him as such, without renouncing all their rights and pretensions.

The resolution of treating with the King being taken by the leading Presbyterians, the question was, to put it in execution. General Fairfax departing from Windsor the 22d of May, to march into the North, tho' within a few days he was forced to take the Kentish rout, the next day, the Common-Council of London presented a petition to both Houses of Parliament, wherein they said:

“ That they thankfully acknowledged the favour of the “ House, in granting their desires concerning the Tower,
 “ and Militia of London; and in communicating to them
 “ several votes of both Houses of Parliament, wherein it “ was resolved, not to alter the fundamental Government “ of the Kingdom, by King, Lords, and Commons; to “ preserve inviolably the solemn League and Covenant, “ and the treaties between the Kingdom of England and “ Scotland; and to be ready to join with the Kingdom “ of Scotland, in the propositions agreed upon by both “ Kingdoms. They further desired, that the Aldermen,
 “ the Recorder, and the rest of their fellow-citizens, then “ in the Tower, might be discharged and restored; and “ that in prosecution of their said votes, they would be “ pleased to improve all good opportunities in perfecting
 “ the speedy settlement of the peace of both Kingdoms.”

This petition was the first step taken by the city of London, to give the Parliament occasion to endeavour a peace. The members, as I said, were for the most part Presbyterians, and yet the Independents prevailed, because they were supported by the army. So, from the 6th of August 1647, to the end of May 1648, the Parliament must be considered as Independent, because the votes were directed by that party. But since the army's removal from London, the Presbyterians had exerted themselves, and no longer fearing the army, passed such votes as were most agreeable to their interest. From that time, therefore, the Parliament is not to be considered as Independent, but rather as Presbyterian. This remark is absolutely necessary for understanding the reason of the difference between the proceedings of this Parliament, of which we are going to speak, and those from the 6th of August the last year.

The petition above-mentioned being read in both Houses, they ordered the Recorder, and all the other prisoners to be released, except the three Aldermen, who had been impeached in form, but who nevertheless were also discharged after some days. They farther ordered, that the soldiers posted in the Tower to reinforce the garrison, should return to their regiments.

On the morrow, the Commons voted, notwithstanding the opposition of the Independent members, That, after his Majesty's assent to the three bills, which should be offered to him, a treaty should be had with him upon the rest of the propositions presented to him at Hampton-Court. These three bills were for settling the Militia, the Presbyterian-government, and recalling all his declarations against the two Houses. These bills were ready the 30th of May, and sent to the Lords for their concurrence. The same day, the General having drawn out the troops that were in the Tower, at Whitehall, and the Muske, to employ them in his expedition against the Kentish-men, the House empowered the Militia of London, to fend guards to the Parliament, from time to time as occasion should require.

The Presbyterians were very much at ease, since they were no longer curbed by the army. But they still wanted one thing, of which they resolved to take care. Whilst the two Houses were governed by the Independents, the Scots thought to have cause to complain, and on that pretence they were levying an army to march into England. For this reason, the Parliament, now become Presbyterian, believed it necessary to remove all occasion of complaint by giving them satisfaction, and to shew, they meant to proceed in a different manner from what they had done whilst checked by the Independents. They now declared they intended to maintain the Covenant, and the treaty between the two Kingdoms; and to convince the Scots the House of Commons voted, that the three bills to be presented to his Majesty, should be communicated to the Parliament of Scotland for their approbation. It is easy to perceive, that the aim of the two Houses was to secure the assistance of Scotland, and indeed it seems to have been Scotland's interest to unite with the Parliament of England, since it was become Presbyterian. But, as I observed, those by whom the Parliament of Scotland was then managed, sought not so much the good of the Kingdom, as the

(i) They were almost drunk, and had been animated, as they came through Windsmeier Hall, by some of the Royalists. The quarrel began, by some of the Courtiers asking the guards, Why they Road there to guard a company of rogues; meaning the Parliament. Windsmeier, p. 306. See T. Herbert ibid., p. 310. The Scots had also at the time, been told that, if they did not go, they would be taken care of. ibid.

King's advantage; but of this the Parliament of England was yet ignorant, or perhaps would hardly believe. There was moreover in the fore-mentioned resolution, one great inconvenience, namely, loss of time. It was the Presbyterians intent to hasten the treaty with the King, whilst the event of what was preparing, was yet doubtful. But on the contrary, delay was advantageous to the Independents, who, as will hereafter appear, failed not to use that method to break their enemies' measures.

The next day, the Commons ordered, that the eleven members of their House, and the seven Peers accused by the army, should be fully discharged, and Glyn (1) member for Westminster, who had been expelled, was received into the House.

As the two Houses perceived, that the several Insurrections in the Kingdom were wholly in favour of the King, they prohibited, on pain of death, to take arms without their authority. They imagined to have no farther occasion for such friends to defend them against the Independents. Mean while, as they had no army to protect their adherents against the attempts of the Cavaliers, it was moved to raise forces, and oblige the officers to take the Covenant. But after some debates, this last point was ordered to be laid aside for the present. It was also proposed to remove the King to Windsor. But nothing was determined. Probably, the House knew not how to compel Hammond, in case he refused to deliver the King.

Though the vote to present the three bills to the King passed the 2d of June, it was the 26th before the two Houses appointed a committee to debate upon the manner and place of treaty with the King, and their report was made the 30th. In the mean time, the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-council of London, presented a petition to the two Houses, desiring,

"That a personal treaty might be obtained betwixt his Majesty and both Houses, in the city of London, or some other convenient place.

"That the Scots might be invited to the treaty. That, according to the duty of their allegiance, protestation, solemn League and Covenant, his Majesty's royal person, honour, and estate, might be preserved, the power and privilege of Parliament maintained, the just rights and liberties of the Subjects restored, Religion, and government of the Church in purity established, all differences might be the better composed, and a firm and lasting peace concluded, &c."

To this it was answered by both Houses, that they were now employed in considerations of peace, and doubted not but what they had done, and should do therein, would be satisfactory to the city of London, and all others, that desired to see the troubles of the Kingdom ended in a safe and just peace.

The report of the committee appointed to consider of a personal treaty with the King, was:

"1. That the vote of the 3d of January 1647, forbidding any addresses to be made to, or received from his Majesty, should be made null.

"2. That the three propositions sent into the Kingdom of Scotland, and to be presented to his Majesty before a personal treaty be had, should not be insisted upon.

"3. That his Majesty be removed to some of his houses within ten miles of London."

The same day, the Lords acquainted the Commons, that they approved of the propositions reported by the committee, and desired their concurrence. But the Commons were not so expeditious as the Lords. They could not resolve to begin a negotiation with the King, without being first secure of the three conditions which were to be the foundation of the peace. I have already mentioned the reasons. Mean while, both Houses continuing in their respective opinions, it was almost a month before this dispute was ended.

The Lords urged, [at a conference,] that the three bills should not be insisted on. 1. That there may be no delay in the thing, a speedy personal treaty being so much desired and petitioned for. 2. Because it is the desire of the Parliament of Scotland. 3. The agreement upon the treaty will be the more authentic. 4. It is probable, the King, having no army in being, will condescend to that which at Uxbridge and Oxford he refused. 5. It is not the way of treaty to confirm any particular, before all is agreed, especially those of most concernment, and which will be chiefly insisted upon.

The Commons answered, "That the disaffected party in or near London is so great, that if the King grants not the Militia before he comes, there will be no safety for the Parliament, nor is the treaty like to proceed; for many will endeavour to bring in the King without any agreement, and even with destruction to the Parliament. 2. If the Presbyterian government be not decreed; all things will grow into confusion in the Church, and the present Mistaken be great sufficient. 3. If the declarations be not recalled, the Parliament is not in capacity to treat, having been declared rebels and traitors, and no Parliament, but a pretended one, which was never done by any of the Kings of England. And whereas it may be objected, these things breed debate; it is answered; the King is not ignorant of the full demand of these particulars, they having been over and over presented to him; and to the two first he hath declared a willingness; nor yet is he obliged to pass them as bills, unless all other things are agreed upon; and if no agreements, (his being at liberty) a new war is like to ensue."

To these reasons the Lords replied, "That they could not imagine, nor was it probable, that the party about London who had petitioned for a treaty, would put it on to the disadvantage of the Parliament. 2. They did not apprehend any prejudice to the Parliament's party during the treaty. 3. His Majesty had declared, he would consent to all together; and not to any before all was agreed. And that in case there was no agreement, they were in state as before."

The Commons being by no means satisfied with these reasons, answered (2), "There was no doubt but those in the parts about London, would put forward the treaty, to the disadvantage of the Parliament and Kingdom; being such who had not only petitioned the re-establishment of the King without conditions, but had taken up arms, and were now in arms for no less (as they say at Colchester) than to oust the Parliament into a treaty. 2. For his Majesty's saying, he would not pass any before all were agreed; it seems not; for he pretends to be willing to pass these only upon conditions, or in any way, as that de facto, he will; and de jure, the power shall be declared in him; which were, for the Parliament to part with that, which will be their irreparable loss and destruction. And besides, as to security, what appears, unless the grant of these propositions? For it is supposed the treaty will be in or near London. And what is said, how his Majesty shall be? Who shall be with him? How the disaffected shall be ordered? Moreover if this be not, why may not things settled by law be revived? Episcopacy again set on foot? All the Ministers turned out for scandal re-enters? Others of honest life put to seek their livings? How then, in case no accord be made, can it be thought that the Parliament will be in state as before?"

This dispute held till the 28th of July, the Independent members heartily joining with the Presbyterians in whatever could retard or obstruct the treaty. But it was not upon this point only that they endeavoured to spend the time to no purpose.

Whilst this contest between the two Houses still lasted, the city of London having presented a petition, declaring, they did concur with the desire of a personal treaty contained in another petition of the military officers, it was ordered that a committee of Parliament, and another of the Common-Council should meet together and examine this affair. In the frequent conferences between these committees, the Independents used several artifices to prolong matters. The Presbyterians concurred with them in the same design, for, as I said, they were against treating with the King before he had consented to the three Bills. The committee of Parliament put several questions to the committee of the Common-Council, which these last were not prepared to answer; and as they had no instructions about them, they were forced to desire time to consult those by whom they were appointed. By this means the conferences were multiplied without any thing done, for no sooner was one demand answered, but another was made, and so the time passed in vain.

At last, the Common-Council perceiving, these questions were designed only to amuse them, ordered it to be declared to the committee of Parliament, that it was the desire of the city, that a treaty should be entered into with all expedition. They ordered likewise, that the engagement last year [to guard the King and Parliament against all force] which had brought the army to London, should be subscribed by all the inhabitants, either by calling them together, or by carrying it from house to house to be signed. They were not contented with this; for they so managed, that the Watermen and others presented also petitions, that the personal treaty might be hastened. In short, they plainly showed, what they could not obtain by fair means, they would have by force. Whereupon Major General Skippon was privately ordered by the Commons, to lift soldiers in the city, and be ready to guard the Par-

1648. liament in case of any violence. The Common-Council complained of these levies which were making in the city, without the privity of the committee of Militia. But the House approved of them, under colour the city was in danger from the Cavaliers. Nay, they imparted to the Common-Council, certain intercepted letters, in one of which was inclosed a declaration from the Prince of Wales. Another was writ from London to one at Edinburgh, intimating that the King's party was very powerful in London: that there was no danger from any but Skippon, who was raising troops; but however they were nothing in comparison of those who were secretly lifted for the King. That it should be so ordered, that Skippon should soon be deprived of his post, and expelled the City.

Several Royalists mix with the Presbyterians.

It is certain, in the present situation of affairs, the Royalists conceived great hopes. Nay, many Cavaliers scrupled not to pass for Presbyterians, and mixed with them, to strengthen the party of those who intended to force the Parliament to a peace. Hence arose this sort of contest between the Commons and city of London. Among the Presbyterians many were apprehensive, that by a too long delay, the opportunity of treating advantageously with the King would be lost. They flattered themselves, that in such a juncture, the King would refuse nothing of what should be desired, and they did not see the necessity of losing time in requiring things beforehand, which in their opinion could not but be granted in a treaty. This opinion, entertained by the Lords and Common-Council of London, was solely founded in a false imagination, that the King could not but think his case desperate, if the Scotch army should once enter England, and consequently would grant every thing to get out of this difficulty; wherein they were much mistaken, as we have seen. But the Commons still insisted upon the three Bills, as absolutely necessary for the security of the Kingdom. Whilst the Presbyterians thus differed among themselves, the time passed away without any effectual endeavours for a peace. The blockade of Colchester was just at an end; Cromwell was upon the point of finishing the siege of Pembroke castle, and going to join Lambert; and Fairfax, after the taking of Colchester, was about to come once more and awe the Parliament. Besides this, the King's party was daily increasing in the North, where Langdale, whose forces were now above four thousand men, was preparing to join Duke Hamilton.

The uncertain state of affairs in July.

The affairs of England were then in a terrible confusion. The wisest and most experienced could not form any probable conjecture on what was to happen, each of the parties having almost equal reason both to hope and to fear.

Interests of the Independents.

Indeed the Independents were no longer masters in the Parliament, but were however sufficiently numerous, to obstruct, by sundry artifices, or at least to retard, the peace, or prolong the negotiation. Moreover they were supported by three armies, which, though remote from London, inspired their enemies with terror. Nevertheless they saw, it was intended to take advantage of the absence of these armies to conclude a peace with the King, which could not but ruin them, if made before their forces were re-joined. They knew themselves to be equally hated by the Scots, the Presbyterians, and the Royalists. They were therefore in danger that these three parties would unite against them, as indeed it was projected, and then the Independents would have been too weak to resist so many enemies at once. It was therefore their interest to hinder this union as much as possible, till the events of the war which was going to rekindle, should unravel the affairs of the Kingdom. They confided much in Cromwell's valour and capacity, and impatiently expected, that the end of the siege he had undertaken, would enable him to join Lambert in the North, and oppose the Scots, who were ready to enter England.

Extreme distress of the Independents.

The Presbyterians had no army at all. Their whole reliance was on the city of London: but their leaders were extremely troubled to see the magistrates pursuing wrong methods, whether by the artifices of the Cavaliers, or by a too earnest desire of peace. They hoped however, the King, in his present circumstances, would immediately grant their demands, in order to free himself out of the hands of the Independents, and unite the whole Kingdom against them. But they built upon no solid foundation. Had there been a treaty at the time I am speaking of, the King, who knew the Scotch army was not designed against him, would have granted at most but what he was obliged to by his treaty with the Scotch commissioners, which would not have been sufficient to content the Presbyterians, as the sequel will show.

Refuge of Duke Hamilton's intentions.

As for the Royalists, the leading men being informed of Duke Hamilton's intentions, they must have entertained great hopes. They flattered themselves, that the Scots and Presbyterians would equally assist in delivering the King from captivity, and that when he should be free, and the Independent party subdued, he would be able to withstand the Presbyterians and renew the war, in case unreasonable terms were insisted upon. They saw however with great concern their designs ruined in Kent, in Essex, and by the ill success of the Earl of Holland's and Duke of Buckingham's attempt. Certainly they were in an ill situation, between the Presbyterians and the Independents, what hopes soever they had entertained of deceiving the Presbyterians, and engaging them to serve the King, under colour of acting against the Independents. Their whole refuge therefore lay in the progress to be made by Duke Hamilton and Langdale, and in the expectation of inducing the city to force the Parliament to conclude a hasty peace to the King's advantage.

At last the so long expected army of Scotland entered England, as hath been said, about the beginning of July. When the raising it was resolved, it was designed against the Parliament of England, then under the direction of the army and Independents. But when the Scots came into England, the face of affairs was changed, and the Parliament not only become Presbyterian, but had taken several steps to show, they intended to preserve an union and good correspondence between the two Kingdoms. Mean while, though the Committee of the Parliament of Scotland was not ignorant of what passed in England, they had not given new instructions to Duke Hamilton, or expressed any desire to join with the Parliament, now freed from the Dominion of the army. Thus Duke Hamilton entered England as enemy to the Parliament, since there was no alteration in his orders. He pretended, indeed, a design to maintain the Covenant. But the Parliament had also declared, they had the same intention. What then could hinder the Duke from making some advances to the Parliament, to demonstrate, he was sent into England to promote that design? At least, when he entered a foreign Kingdom with an army, he should, one would think, have published a Manifesto to declare the intentions of his masters. But he only writ to Major-General Lambert, "That the Committee of the Estates of Parliament had commanded him to enter England with an army, for maintaining the Covenant, settling Religion, delivering the King from his base imprisonment, freeing the Parliament from the constraints put upon them, disbanding the armies, whereby the Subjects might be free from the intolerable taxes and quarter which they had so long groaned under, and for procuring a solemn peace and a firm union betwixt the Kingdoms under his Majesty's Government." But if what passed before be considered, it will be easy to perceive, this army was designed to restore the King without conditions, or at least upon terms very different from those that were pretended to be laid on him. Though I have touched upon this subject in several places, I believe it will not be amiss briefly to sum up the reasons, which invincibly prove that the Scotch army was solely intended for the King's service.

1. The Scotch Commissioners had treated with the King without being authorized by their Parliament. They had treated for the affairs of England without receiving any power from the English.

2. They had engaged to endeavour to restore the King to the Throne of England, without any other condition than the confirmation of the Presbyterian Government for only three years. As for the Covenant, they had indeed obliged the King to promise, he would confirm it, for the security of those who had taken it; that is, that they might not be prosecuted on that account: but with full liberty to every one not to subscribe it. They had engaged to maintain the rights of the King and Crown with respect to the Militia, the Great-Seal, nomination to offices, choice of Privy-Councillors, negative voice in the Parliament. Moreover, they had concealed the contents of this treaty from the leading Presbyterians, and at the same time communicated them to the King's principal friends.

3. These same Commissioners had engaged Sir Marmaduke Langdale and Sir Philip Mulgrave to raise forces for the King and seize Berwick and Carlisle.

4. These two Gentlemen had repaired to Edinburgh, where they had often conferred with Duke Hamilton and others of the King's party, and when the Commissioners of England complained of their being suffered at Edinburgh, they were only concealed, and the conferences with them continued.

5. Duke Hamilton, before his departure from London, had declared, he would do the King signal service, and this Duke was placed at the head of the army.

6. The same Duke had entered into an engagement with Langdale, that as soon as the Scotch army was in England, there should be no more mention of the Covenant, and all the King's friends should be received into the army without distinction. It is true, he was afterwards restrained by a decree of the Parliament of Scotland. But Duke Hamilton's behaviour here entered England.

He wrote to Lambert, and so forth.

Proofs of the Scotch army being solely designed for the King's service.

III. p. 98.

1648. he found means to evade it, by causing Langdale to march one day before him, as if Langdale had not acted by his orders. But the contrary plainly appeared, when he was defeated by Cromwell.

7. The Parliament of Scotland was called by the credit of Duke Hamilton and the Commissioners who had treated with the King, and the Members were elected by the cabals of the same party.

8. When the levying an army came to be debated in the Parliament, it was strongly opposed, as well by several Lords, as by the General-Assembly of the Kirk. It was solidly proved, that at least the grounds of the war ought to be declared before it was resolved. Protections were also made against it; but they were evaded, of which there can be no other reason given, but that the army was designed for the King's service, though it was not thought proper to declare it.

9. Finally, when the Duke had entered England, he took not the least step to intimate he was come to support the Presbyterian party. Instead of marching directly to London, whilst Cromwell was at a distance, though he might be sure the Parliament and City were very desirous to join him, he spent above a month in the northern Counties without any necessity. This conduct therefore shows, his design was not to assist the Presbyterians, though he intended to act against the Independents.

What has been said clearly proves, the Scotch army came into England with design to restore the King without terms, under colour of delivering him from the Independents. It is no wonder, that the Parliament, where the King had few friends, should declare his army enemies of the Kingdom, as soon as their entrance was known. Nevertheless, as the Presbyterians were yet perfwaded, the Scots were come to support them, it was with great struggle that this Declaration passed the House of Commons. Fourscore and ten Presbyterian Members opposed it to the utmost of their power, so far were they from imagining, the Scots had taken arms for the King's interest. But it was not long before they were undeceived.

The 28th of July the Commons agreed at last, that the King should be treated with [upon the Hampton-Court propositions] without being obliged to sign the three Bills before-mentioned. In all likelihood the Presbyterians were at length sensible, that by deferring the treaty, they were labouring for the Independents, who fought only to waste the time, till Cromwell, who was in the midst of his march, should have joined Lambert. But it was not possible to advance so far as would have been necessary to finish or even begin the treaty, before the revolution caused by Duke Hamilton's defeat. The formalities which must be observed in a Parliament, several unexpected affairs, the arrival of the Prince of Wales before Yarmouth, and afterwards in the Thames, afforded the Independent Members frequent occasions to prolong the treaty. On all these occasions, they affected to make tedious Speeches, which wasted many days sitting. When they saw it was not in their power to set aside the treaty, or oblige the House to insist upon the three Bills, they feigned to consent freely to the negotiation: but withal, perpetually found means to delay it. In a word, to know what were the fruits of these artifices, it need only be considered, that the Commons first resolution to treat with the King was on the 24th of May; but they did not desist from the three Bills till the 28th of July; that it was the 18th of September before the negotiation began, and consequently this affair held four months, without reckoning the time spent in the treaty. So, before the conferences began, Cromwell had defeated Duke Hamilton, and was marching into Scotland to hinder the Scots from returning to disturb England. On the other hand, General Fairfax having taken Colchester, was posted with his army within twenty miles of London to awe the Parliament. It is therefore certain, when the negotiation begun, affairs were far from being in the same state as when the treaty was resolved. The good success of the army made the Presbyterians more timorous, and the Independents more bold. But on the other side, the King, losing all hopes of assistance both from the Scots and the Royalists, found himself indispensably obliged to yield in a treaty what he would never have granted, if the face of his affairs had not been changed. These are considerations which I thought requisite, before I proceeded to what passed the five last months of the year 1648.

Since the Commons had consented to treat with the King, without obliging him to sign the three Bills, five days more had passed before the manner, place, and time of the treaty could be settled (1). The King required that all persons might have access to him as when at Hampton-Court: That the Scots should be invited to assist at the treaty, and appointed the town of Newport in the Isle of Wight for the place of conference. The Commissioners who had been sent to him, having reported his desires to the Houses, the Lords, who were willing to dispatch this affair, two days after passed the following Votes:

1. That the votes of both Houses of Parliament, as gained no farther address and application to his Majesty, be recalled.
2. That such persons as his Majesty shall send for, of necessary use to him in the treaty, be admitted to wait on him: And that his Majesty be in the same estate of freedom, as he was last in at Hampton-Court.
3. That such servants as his Majesty shall appoint, be sent to wait on him.
4. That the place for the Treaty be in Newport, in the Isle of Wight.
5. That the Scots be invited to treat with his Majesty.
6. That his Majesty be admitted to invite them.
7. That the instructions given from both Houses of Parliament, to Colonel Hammond Governor of the Isle of Wight, be recalled.
8. That five Lords and ten Commoners be chosen Commissioners, to treat with the King.
9. That it be referred to the Committee of Lords and Commons for peace, to prepare all things in readiness for the speeding of the treaty.

These Votes being sent to the Commons, they did not think proper to pass them without some amendments.

The first was admitted.

As to the second, the Commons ordered, That his Majesty should be desired to send to the Houses the names of such persons as he should conceive to be of necessary use about him during the treaty; they not being persons excepted against by both Houses of Parliament from pardon, or that were then under restraint, or in actual wars against the Parliament by sea or land; or in such numbers, as might draw any just cause of suspicion; and that his Majesty should be in the same freedom, honour, and safety, as he was in when he was at Hampton-Court.

Upon the third, they concurred in the vote for his Majesty's attendants, provided they were such as were not in any of the former qualifications.

The fourth was approved of.

As to the fifth and sixth, the question, whether the Scots should be invited by the Parliament, to send commissioners to treat with his Majesty upon the propositions presented to him at Hampton-Court, it was carried in the negative. But it was ordered however, p. 1237, That if the King should think fit to send for any of the Scotch nation, to advise with him concerning the affairs of the Kingdom of Scotland only, the Houses would give him a safe-conduct.

Concerning the seventh, it was resolved, That before the recalling of Colonel Hammond's instructions, they should send again to his Majesty, to let him know, how far they had proceeded, as to a treaty, and to have his Majesty's approbation.

The eighth and ninth were admitted without any difficulty.

The next day the Commons ordered new instructions to Colonel Hammond, viz.

That the King be removed to Newport, and be in the same condition and freedom there, as he was at Hampton-Court.

That no person in the first exception out of mercy, nor under restraints of the Parliament, nor of late actually in arms against the Parliament, be admitted to the King.

That no person that hath been in arms against the Parliament, &c. or of whom there is just cause of suspicion, be admitted into any fort or tower in the Isle of Wight.

That no person of any foreign nation be admitted to come into the same Isle, without leave of the Parliament.

If the Kingdom of Scotland send any to treat with his Majesty, they shall have a pass from both Houses, and be admitted.

That his Majesty pass his royal word, not to go out of the Island during the treaty, nor twenty-eight days after, without the advice of both Houses of Parliament.

The next day, advice was brought of Duke Hamilton's defeat. The Independents therefore hoped, they should hinder the conclusion of the treaty (2), and the Presbyterians that the King would grant every thing, since he had lost

(1) Both Houses agreed, August 2, to treat with the King in the Isle of Wight; and the Earl of Middlesex, Sir John Hippesley, and Mr. Bulkeley, were sent, August 4, to his Majesty, with the Votes of the two Houses. See Rushworth, Tom. 7. p. 1214, 1216.

(2) Cromwell wrote to his friends, That it would be a perpetual ignominy to the Parliament, if they should recede from their former vote of, No further Address to the King, and conjured them to continue firm in that resolution. Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 141.

1648. the assistance he depended upon, and was without any resource. Thus, this event, though of the greatest importance, caused no alteration in the disposition of the parties to treat. A few days after they received also news of the taking of Colchester.

The King having sent a list of the persons he desired to be present, the Parliament excepted against three, whose names were Asburnham, Legg, and Devereux, who were then in custody.

It was not only upon this point, but several others, where difficulties occurred, that they were forced to send commissioners to the King. The commissioners for the Parliament departed not from London for Newcastle, till the 13th of September, and the conferences began not till the 18th. It was agreed, they should continue forty days only.

Whilst preparations were making for the treaty, the Prince of Wales, who lay in the Down with his fleet, sent a letter to the House of Peers, wherein he took notice of the progress made towards a personal treaty, and farther expressed his desire,

1. That the treaty should be in such place and manner, as might consist with the honour, freedom, and safety of his Majesty his Father; so that the agreement might not be blemished with any face of restraint.
2. That the treaty might be between the King, and his two Kingdoms of England and Scotland.
3. That during the treaty, there should be a general cessation of arms.
4. That a moderate subsistence, during the treaty, might be agreed upon, for all armies and forces then on foot, and particularly the Scots army in England.
5. That a course might be taken to content him, and his ships in the Down, with money and provision.

It does not appear, the Prince made no mention, that it should be communicated to the Commons.

The same day the Lords received this letter, a petition was presented to both Houses from the Common-council of London, desiring,

1. That the King's Majesty might be free from restraint.
2. Invited to a treaty.
3. That all acts of hostility by sea and land, might, by command of King and Parliament, cease.
4. That the government of the Church might be settled according to the Covenant.
5. That distressed Ireland might be relieved.
6. The people of England, by disbanding all armies, eased; the liberty of the Subjects restored; the laws of the land established.
7. The members of both Houses enjoined to attend the House for the service of the Kingdom.
8. That the self-denying ordinance might be effectually observed.
9. And speedy consideration had of the condition of such merchants, who by reason of the war were distressed, those with the Prince; and that some expedient might be thought of, for discharge of all ships, that trade be not destroyed.

The Reformado-officers presented the same day a petition of the like import; praying moreover, that all officers and soldiers (without exception) might be paid their arrears.

The Commons returned in answer to the Common-council of London, that it was their intention to treat with the King, that they had acquainted his Majesty with it, and that there was no room to question but the King was in the same disposition. Then they communicated to the Council the Votes that were passed in the House on that occasion.

All this passed before the defeat of the Scotch army. But after the news of that great event, and the taking of Colchester, the Independents in and about London, who had been quiet since the removal of the army, and before any decision, began to hold up their heads. The 11th of September, two days before the departure of the commissioners for the Isle of Wight, they presented a petition to the Parliament, subscribed by several thousands, openly complaining of the Commons proceedings, which they said, flowed from the corruption of most of the members. They also gave them the reasons, why they first assisted them in this war with their persons and purses, and let them know, they expected other ways from them than a treaty with the King, and particularly,

1. That they would make good the Supremacy of the People from all pretences of negative voices either in the King or Lords.
2. That they would have made laws for election of representatives yearly, and of course, without writ or summons.
3. That their time of sitting exceed not forty or fifty days at the most, and to have fixed an expressed time for the ending of this present Parliament.

4. That they would have exempted matters of Religion and God's worship from the compulsive or restrictive power of any authority.

5. That none be forced or pressed to serve in war.

6. That they would have made both Kings, Queens, Princes, Dukes, Earls, Lords, and all persons, alike liable to every law of the land.

7. That all Commoners be freed from the jurisdiction of the Lords in all cases; and to have taken care, that all trials be only of twelve sworn men; and no conviction but upon two or more sufficient known witnesses.

8. That none be examined against themselves, nor be punished for doing of that, against which no law hath been provided.

9. That the proceedings in law be abbreviated, mitigated and made certain, the charge thereof in all particulars.

10. That all trade and merchandizing be made free from all monopolizing and engrossing, by companies or otherwise.

11. That the Excise and all kind of taxes, except subsidies, be taken off.

12. That you would have laid open all late inclosures of fens, and other commons, or have enclosed them only or chiefly to the benefit of the poor.

13. That they would have considered the many thousands that are ruined by perpetual imprisonment for debts, and provided to their enlargement.

14. Have ordered some effectual course to keep people from begging and beggary, in so fruitful a nation, as through God's blessing this is.

15. That they would have proportioned punishments more equal to offences, that so men's lives and estates might not be forfeited upon trivial and slight occasions.

16. Have removed the tedious burthen of tythes, satisfying all impropriators, and providing a more equal way of maintenance for our poor Ministers.

17. Have raised a stock of money out of confiscated estates, for payment of those who contributed voluntarily above their abilities, before those that disbursed out of their superfluities.

18. Bound themselves and all future Parliaments from abolishing propriety, levelling mens estates, or making all things common.

19. That they would have declared, what the duty or business of the Kingly office is, and what not; and ascertained the revenue past increase or diminution; that so there might never be more quarrels about the same.

20. That they would have rectified the election of public officers for the city of London, of every particular company therein; restoring the commonalty thereof to their just rights, most unjustly withheld from them, to the producing and maintaining corrupt interests, opposite to common freedom, and exceedingly prejudicial to the trade and manufactures of this nation.

21. That they would have made full and ample reparations to all persons that had been oppressed, by sentences in High-Commission, Star-Chamber, and Council-board; or by any kind of monopolizers or projectors, and that out of the estates of those that were authors, actors, or promoters of so intolerable mischiefs, and that without much attendance.

22. That they would have abolished all Committees, and have conveyed all businesses into the true method of the usual trials of the Commonwealth.

23. That they would not have followed the example of former tyrannous and superstitious Parliaments, in making orders, ordinances, or laws, or in appointing punishments concerning opinions, or things supernatural, stifling some blasphemies, others heresies.

24. That they would have declared what the business of the Lords is, and ascertain their condition, not derogating from the liberties of other men; that so there might be an end of striving about the same.

25. That they would have done justice upon the capital authors and promoters of the former or late wars.

26. That they would have provided constant pay for the army, and given rules to all Judges, and all other public Officers throughout the land, for their indemnity; and for the saving harmless all that have any ways assisted them.

27. That they would have laid to heart the abundance of innocent blood that hath been spilt, and the infinite spoil and havoc that hath been made of peaceable, harmless people, by express commission from the King.

1648. "King; and seriously to have considered, whether the justice of God be likely to be satisfied, or is his yet continuing wrath appealed by an act of oblivion."

Though the petitioners did not call themselves Independents, the principles of that party were but too visible in these articles to doubt from what quarter they came.

The same day the masters and commanders of ships presented the like petition, complaining of the tyranny of the Parliament.

The Parliament thought not proper to answer these Petitions (1), though two days after, the first presented another to desire an answer [to every part of their Petition.] It was no proper juncture to provoke the Independents, by such an answer as this petition deserved.

Before I enter upon the particulars of the treaty at Newport, it is absolutely necessary to relate what passed in the North of England, and in Scotland.

Monroe who was leading from Scotland three or four thousand men (2) to Duke Hamilton, had entered a good way into England, when the Scotch army was vanquished and dispersed. After this victory, Cromwell, without losing time in pursuing the rest of the army which was not in condition to do any mischief, left Lambert with some troops to finish their destruction, and immediately marched in quest of Monroe. The English that were with this Scotch General used their utmost endeavours to persuade him to give Cromwell battle: But it was not possible to prevail with him. He chose rather to retire northward, and always kept at so great distance, that there was no overtaking him. Nevertheless Cromwell continued his march, and hearing that Lambert had entirely destroyed the Scotch army, sent him orders to march to Carlisle, where Mulgrave still remained with some troops, and after clearing those parts, to come and join him in order to enter Scotland together. When Cromwell came near Berwick, he wrote to the Committee of Estates to require them to call home Monroe, and deliver Berwick and Carlisle, otherwise they were to expect a war. A few days after he pursued his march towards Scotland, having left some Regiments to block up Berwick.

Duke Hamilton's defeat, and Cromwell's threats, entirely changed the face of affairs in Scotland. The Marquis of Argyll, who had not been able to prevent the raising of an army, and had been forced to submit to the opposite party, became superior again, and was supported by all who were against the war. The Committee of Estates daily lost their authority, and were seconded only by Monroe, who was at length returned into Scotland. So, the Marquis of Argyll being assured of the approbation of most of the people, levied three or four thousand men to oppose Monroe, whom the Earl of Lanerick had joined, with some new-raised troops. They had secured Sterling bridge, which hindered the Marquis of Argyll from making any progress, though his forces had been more numerous. But Cromwell broke all their measures, by not staying at Berwick, but marching directly to Edinburgh. He thereby forced the Committee of Estates to fly from thence, and disperse, for fear of being inclosed between the English, and the Marquis of Argyll's forces. Then the Earl of Lanerick, and Monroe, being unable to continue the war, came to an agreement upon the following terms:

1. That both the armies should be disbanded.
2. That a Parliament should be called to sit before the 20th of January.
3. That the settling of Religion be referred to the determination of the General-Assembly, and all civil questions to the determination of Parliament.
4. That a new Committee of Estates be appointed, to consist only of such Members as protested in Parliament against the late engagement: And in case any of the forces under Monroe should continue in arms, that then the said Committee should raise forces to suppress the same.
5. That none who had been accessory to the late engagement, should be challenged to take away their lives and estates, &c. provided they did declare under their hand-writing, to the Lord-Chancellor, or President of the Committee of Estates, that they accepted of, and submitted to the present engagement.
6. That all persons taken in war, since the second of August, be released.

The face of affairs being thus changed, and the King's party dispersed, Cromwell repaired to Edinburgh, where he was received with great respect. He obtained the restitution of Berwick and Carlisle, and having concerted proper measures with the Marquis of Argyll, returned triumphantly into England. He left Lambert, however, in Scotland, with three or four Regiments, at the request of the Scots, who believed they should want them, to awe those who might desire to raise new commotions.

Whilst Cromwell was in quest of Monroe in Scotland, and three days before General Fairfax came to St. Albans, the conferences for peace began at Newport (3). Though the two Houses had desisted from the condition, that the King should sign the three bills before the treaty, they had not relinquished the thing itself. The very first day, the Commissioners presented to the King, the draughts of the three bills. By the first, the Presbyterian government was established for ever in the Church of England, Episcopacy abolished, with the whole Hierarchy, and the sale of Bishops lands appointed. By the second, the King left the power of the Militia for thirty years in the hands of both Houses. By the third, all the King's proclamations and declarations against the Parliament, or their adherents, were recalled. The last of these bills began with these words, Whereas the Parliament have been necessitated to make and prosecute a war in their just and lawful defence, &c. The King scrupled not to agree to the substance of the bill, but objected against the preamble, which charged him indirectly with having made war upon the Parliament, and desired it might be omitted, to which the Commissioners would never consent, because they were, by their Instructions, not to depart from a title of what was contained in the three bills. This dispute held seven days, and it was the 25th of September, before the King consented at last to pass the bill, with the preamble. But it was on condition, that nothing should be binding, unless the whole were agreed on, and the treaty signed. This article being thus dispatched, they proceeded to the rest, on which were great debates, and particularly concerning Religion. As the King saw the Commissioners would not, or could not yield any thing, he hoped to shorten the negotiation, by shewing the two Houses, how far he could comply with regard to the most important articles. He sent therefore a message to explain his intentions, and make them the following offers.

Concerning Religion. "His Majesty will consent, that the calling and sitting of the assembly of Divines at Westminster be confirmed for three years by act of Parliament, and confirms for three years the Directory, and the form of Church-government, to be used for the Churches of England and Ireland, and Dominion of Wales; provided that his Majesty, and those of his judgment, or any other, who cannot in conscience submit thereto, be not in the mean time obliged to comply with the same; and that a free consultation and debate, be had with the Assembly of Divines at Westminster in the mean time, twenty of his Majesty's nomination being added to them, whereby it may be determined by his Majesty, and his two Houses of Parliament, how the said Church-government, and form of public worship, after the said time, and how Religion may be settled, and the articles determined, and care taken for the ease of tender consciences."

2. Concerning the Bishops lands and revenue. "His Majesty will consent to an act or acts of Parliament, whereby legal estates for lives, or for years, not exceeding ninety-nine, shall be made for those lands, towards the satisfaction of the purchasers, and to others to whom they are engaged, whereby they may receive satisfaction; provided that the propriety and inheritance of those lands, may still remain to the Church, and the rest that shall be referred to be for their maintenance."

3. His Majesty will give his royal assent for the better observation of the Lord's-day, for suppressing of Innovations in Churches and Chapels, in and about the worship of God, and for the better advancing of the preaching of God's holy word in all parts of this Kingdom; and to an act against enjoying pluralities of benefices by spiritual persons, and non-residency; for regulating and reforming both Universities, and the Colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eaton; for the better discovery, and speedy conviction of popish Recusants, for the education of the children of Papists, by Protestants, in the Protestant Religion, for levying penalties against Papists: To an act to prevent the practices of Papists against the State, and for putting the laws in execution, and for a stricter course to prevent hearing, and saying of Mass.

4. As to the Covenant, his Majesty is not yet therein satisfied, that he can sign or swear it, or consent to impose it on the consciences of others; nor

"5. Touching the Militia, his Majesty will consent to an act of Parliament, to be in the Parliament's hands for ten years."

"6. Touching Ireland, after advice with his two Houses, he will leave it to their determination, and give his consent accordingly."

"7. Touching public debts, his Majesty will give his consent to such an act, or raising of moneys by general and equal taxations."

"8. He proposeth, that he may have liberty forthwith to come to Westminster, and be restored to a condition of freedom and safety, a thing which he shall never deny to any of his Subjects, and to the possession of his lands and revenues; and that an act of oblivion and indemnity may pass, to extend to all persons, for all matters relating to the late differences, which being agreed by his two Houses of Parliament, his Majesty will be ready to make these his concessions binding, by giving them the force of laws by his royal assent (2)."

Remark

If these offers concerning Religion are considered, with respect to the King's private opinion, they may be said to be great concessions, perhaps greater than his conscience allowed, since it was his real belief, there was no true Church without Bishops. But if these same offers are considered, with regard to the Presbyterians and Independents, of whom the Parliament consisted, they will be found to be by no means satisfactory. They were only a sort of interim, which tended to make them lose the present opportunity to abolish Episcopacy entirely.

I cannot forbear making another remark on this occasion. The King artfully endeavoured, so to order it, that his own propositions should be treated upon, which the Parliament had ever refused, so apprehensive were they of the usual ambiguities and restrictions in the King's papers, and of which there is even here a fresh instance, in the first article concerning Religion. But he was disappointed now, as well as before. The Parliament, without taking notice of his offers (3), ordered the Commissioners to proceed fully according to their instructions.

VII. p. 1285.

Whereupon the King delivered a paper to the Commissioners, containing the reasons why he could not consent to the abolition of Episcopacy, which, he said, he conceived to be of Apostolical Institution. That as to the sale of Church-lands, he affirmed it to be real sacrilege, besides, that at his Coronation, he had sworn to maintain the rights of the Clergy. All these reasons, with many more that might have been added, signified nothing to the Commissioners, who had no power to relax on any point. All they could do, was to send them to the Parliament, and expect their orders. But, this delayed the conclusion of the treaty, and consumed the time which the King and Parliament ought equally to have improved.

F. 242.

Some days after, the King being desirous to gain the good-will of both Houses, and some concession in favour of Episcopacy, which was the principal, and, as I may say, the only point that hindered the conclusion of the treaty, declared to the Commissioners, "that he consented for the settling the Militia by sea and land, in the Parliament's hands for twenty years, and for confirming for three years by act of Parliament, the form of Church-government, and Directory for worship presented to him. But he added, that he was not satisfied in his conscience, or could be content to the utter abolishing of Episcopacy; the substance whereof he conceived to consist in the power of ordination and jurisdiction, as they were exercised by the Apostles themselves, and others, by authority derived from them, superior to Presbyters and Deacons in the primitive times. His resolution being to comply with his two Houses, for the alteration and regulating of his present Hierarchy and Government, so as Episcopacy reduced to the primitive usage, might be settled and continued in the Church of England, and if his two Houses should so advise, his Majesty would be content to lessen the extent, and multiply the number of the Dioceses."

"As to the exception, that his Majesty had not expressed his consent for settling of Bishops lands upon trustees, and for the sale of those lands; it was true he had, not to alienate the inheritance of those lands, and herein he believed he had the concurrent opinions of many Divines, that in other points differed much among themselves: But his former answer containing a large offer of satisfaction to all those that had purchased or disbursed monies upon those lands, he hoped that answer would be satisfactory to his two Houses."

"For the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines, his Majesty would assent as was desired."

"That his Majesty would confirm the publick use of the Directory in all Churches and Chapels, as was desired in the proposition, and would consent to the repeal of so much of all Statutes, as only concerned the book of Common-Prayer, and also the taking the same away out of all Churches and Chapels, provided that the use thereof might be continued in his Majesty's Chapel for himself and his household: And that the same should be confirmed by Act of Parliament for three years, provided only that a consultation in the mean time be had with the Assembly of Divines in such a manner, and for the purposes as were in his former answer expressed."

"Touching the articles of Religion, his Majesty professed, he had not had time since they were delivered unto him, to look into them with that deliberation which was requisite, before he bound himself up and his subjects in matter of Faith and Doctrine; and therefore desired, that part of the proposition might be repited by his two Houses. But he would consent to an Act for better observation of the Lord's-day; as also to prevent the saying of mass."

"Lastly, concerning the Covenant, and the ordinance concerning the same, his Majesty's answer was, that he not being satisfied to take it or impose it on others, he conceived his two Houses would not insist upon it at that time, and the rather, because the ends thereof would be obtained by the agreement if happily concluded."

Some days after, the two Houses received advice from their Commissioners, that the King had fully consented to the proposition concerning Ireland.

By a letter which came the 17th of October, they heard, the King had agreed to the propositions concerning the public debts, and for taking away all honours and titles conferred since the 20th of May 1642.

By another of the 18th, that concerning Delinquents, his Majesty offered,

"That all persons who had any hand in the plotting, designing, or assisting the rebellion in Ireland, should expect no pardon, as was expressed in the first branch of the proposition. As to all the rest of the propositions his Majesty could not consent thereto, as was proposed, otherwise than in the following manner: viz. As for all other persons comprised in the said first branch, his Majesty, for satisfaction of his two Houses, would give way, that they might moderately compound for their estates, and desired they might be admitted to the same; and for removing of distrust and interruptions of the publick settlements, his Majesty would consent as followeth. That such of them as the two Houses of Parliament would insist on, should not be admitted to his councils, and be refrained from coming to Court, at such distance as both Houses should think fit, and should not have any office and employment in the Commonwealth, without the consent of both Houses of Parliament; or should absent themselves out of the Kingdom for some time, if both Houses of Parliament should think fit. That all other persons in that proposition should submit to a moderate composition, and for the space of three years should not sit, or serve as members, or assist in either House of Parliament, without consent of both Houses."

The time fixed for the continuance of the treaty being almost expired, and nothing settled on the article of Episcopacy, which was properly the only point on which difficulties occurred, the two Houses found an expedient to prolong the negotiation a week, by ordering, that the Sundays and Fast-days should not be accounted part of the forty days allowed for the conferences.

The 21st of October the King sent a fresh message to both Houses concerning Episcopacy. Cromwell was on the road to join the army, and it was to be feared, if the treaty was not concluded before his arrival, he would raise invincible obstacles to it. The King sufficiently knew him, to believe there was no good to be expected from him. He believed therefore, that to hasten the conclusion of the treaty, to which the affair of Episcopacy was the grand obstacle, he ought to make some farther concessions on that point. Wherefore he acquainted the two Houses, by this message:

"1. That he consented to the abolishing of Archbishops, Chancellors, Deans and Chapters, &c. and the whole Hierarchy, except Bishops."

"2. That for three years no other but Presbyterian

(1) This was to avoid incensing the Independents, who were entirely against submitting to the Covenant. Rasin.

(2) More than this (say Whitehead) could not be obtained of the King, though most earnestly begged by some of the Commissioners (great part of them, and on their knees; particularly as to the proposition touching Religion. Whitehead, p. 340.

(3) They voted them unsatisfactory. See Rashworth, Tom. VII. p. 1285. Whitehead, p. 340.

1648. " Government should be used, and the exercise of episcopal Government should be wholly suspended during that time.

" 3. Whereas episcopal Jurisdiction, if no other had been agreed upon in the mean time, might have risen up after the three years, he now expressed his consent, that none should be exercised after that time other than Ordination, which was refrained to the counsel and assistance of Presbyters, but such, and in such manner as should be agreed by him and his two Houses; whereby by until such agreement, or if it were not otherwise agreed, episcopal Jurisdiction was wholly laid aside."

His Majesty also that day consented to the following propositions:

" To that for nomination of the great Officers of the Kingdom, to be by both Houses during the term of ten years.

" To those concerning the city of London, and the great Seal.

" To that concerning the Court of Wards, &c. a recompence being assured to his Majesty of one hundred thousand pounds per Annum to him, his heirs and successors, in lieu of the Court of Wards."

The Commissioners acquainting the King that his answer concerning Episcopacy would not be satisfactory to the two Houses, and earnestly pressing him to give them a fuller, he told them in writing, he could not absolutely relinquish Episcopacy. He repeated his offers on that head, adding only, that if in the space of three years he was convinced, that the function of Bishops was not agreeable to the word of God, or that Christ commanded any other Government, he would most cheerfully embrace it: but till he was so convinced, he believed himself bound in conscience to maintain Episcopacy.

The Commons spent four or five days in debates upon the King's offers and answers, and voted them unsatisfactory, as to the point of Episcopacy, the Lords concurring with them.

The same was voted concerning the King's answer about taking the Covenant, and abolishing Popery, for that he desired to have it tolerated in the Queen's Chapel and Family. The Houses were likewise dissatisfied with the answers about alienating Bishops lands, and sale of Deans and Chapters, and concerning Delinquents. Thus, the peace seemed more remote than ever, especially, as the Lords concurred with the Commons in the alienation of Churchlands.

As the time limited for the conferences was about to expire, these resolutions were speedily sent to the commissioners, with orders to demand the King's final and positive answer, and by a special message the Commons also desired of the King, that his Majesty would be pleased to declare expressly against the Irish rebellion, and the cessation concluded with the rebels, and forbid the junction of the Marquis of Ormond's forces with the Irish Papists to make war upon the Protestants. But as there remained only three days, which was not a sufficient time to receive the King's answer, the Lords prevailed with the Commons to prolong the treaty a fortnight, and the rather, as the King had desired to confer with Dr. Usher Archbishop of Armagh, and the Bishops of Worcester and Rochester, upon the affairs of the Church. But as much was not to be expected from this delay, the commissioners were allowed to return to the Parliament, leaving three of their number to receive the King's final answer (1). Twelve of the commissioners coming to London, reported to the Parliament the King's final answer, which had been delivered to them the 9th of November, and was to this effect:

" That his concessions had been misapprehended, and that he did not intend to make any more new Bishops during the term of three years.

" That whereas it might be objected, That in the end of three years the power of Ordination should be practised in the old manner as formerly, that is, the Bishops should be at liberty to call what Presbyters they would to assist in ordaining, but were not bound to their counsel or consent, his Majesty did now intend and consent, that Bishops should not receive any into holy Orders without consent of a limited number of Presbyterians to be chosen in such manner as should be agreed on by his Majesty and his two Houses for that purpose.

" That his Majesty did not intend, that after the end of three years no certain way should be settled concerning Ecclesiastical Government, for that his Majesty did purpose during the three years, to have a consultation with the Assembly of Divines, twenty being added of his nomination, which if his two Houses should resolve to entertain, it could not well be doubted, but upon the debate, such a Government would be agreed on by his Majesty and his two Houses, as should be best for the peace of the Church, and most proper to prevent those distractions which his two Houses apprehended might ensue.

" As to that part of the proposition concerning the book of Common-Prayer; for the satisfaction of his two Houses, that he would not insist upon any provision for continuance of the same in his Majesty's chapel for himself and his household: Nevertheless his Majesty declared, that he intended to use some other set form of Divine Service.

" As to their request, that an Act be passed for a stricter course to prevent the saying and hearing of mass in the Court, or any part of the Kingdom, or in Ireland, his Majesty would consent thereto.

" As to all other particulars mentioned in the Parliament's paper, he referred himself to his former answers.

" Concluding, that since he had by his concessions brought all differences concerning the Church into so narrow a compass, that the chief visible obstruction was, that wherein really in conscience he was not satisfied, he hoped his two Houses would not put farther pretences of so tender a nature upon him."

All this was not capable to induce the Commons to desist from the least of their pretensions. They voted, that his Majesty's answers concerning the Church, form of Prayer, hearing and saying Mass, were unsatisfactory; and ordered the three Commissioners attending the King to inform him of these Votes, and press him for his final answer.

As the Parliament had not hitherto taken any notice of the King's propositions or desires, the House of Commons at length took them into consideration, and passed the following Votes:

" 1. That his Majesty's coming to London shall be with freedom, safety and honour, so soon as the concessions of the treaty are concluded and agreed.

" 2. That his Majesty shall have his lands and revenues, what is legally his, made good to him, according to the laws of the Kingdom.

" 3. What his Majesty shall pass away of his legal rights, he shall have allowance in compensation thereof.

" 4. That an Act of Oblivion be presented to his Majesty, to be passed with such limitations as shall be agreed on by both Houses of Parliament.

It is certain, there was never any difficulty either about the King's return, or the restitution of his revenues, or the abolition of the Court of Wards, instead of which he was to have a hundred thousand pounds a year. These three articles were considered as a natural consequence of the conclusion of the treaty. But as to the act of oblivion, the King and Parliament did not agree. The Parliament insisted upon excepting from pardon such a number of Delinquents, that is, of those who had served the King, and were considered as the authors of the troubles. They intended to confiscate their estates, and banish them the realm. In short, after long debates, the number of excepted persons was reduced to seven, about whom the two Houses did not agree (2). Nay, as to those that were to be included in the pardon, the Parliament pretended to inflict a pecuniary punishment on them, and had ranked them under several classes, according to which, some were to forfeit one half of their estates, others a third, others a fourth, and had assigned the money thence arising towards the payment of the publick debts. The King, on the contrary, pretended, that all without exception should have the benefit of the act of oblivion. He consented only that some of those whom the Parliament termed Delinquents, that is, his faithful servants, should be liable to a moderate composition, a general expression, on which there would have been many disputes, had it come to be discussed. However it be, this article, which was considerable, was not yet settled: but it was not impossible to find expedients to satisfy the King and the Parliament, if the difficulties concerning Religion had not hindered the conclusion of the treaty, upon which I cannot forbear making two remarks.

The first is, that if the Commons insisted so long upon the signing the three Bills, it was because they knew how inflexible the King was in the point of Episcopacy, and depaired of concluding a treaty with him, unless he previously granted this article, upon which they were no less inflexible than he, as plainly appeared in the con-

1648. several parts of the Kingdom infused these violent resolutions into the people and officers, to hinder the conclusion of a treaty which could not but ruin their party. Very likely, the Presbyterians fully perceived the designs of the Independents, and these petitions were but too apt to convince them of the same. But they hoped to amuse them till the treaty was ended, not doubting, the King would at last consent to the abolition of Episcopacy. As for the other articles which were not yet settled, probably, they would have chosen rather to yield them to the King, than retard the conclusion of the treaty, which to them was so necessary. Affairs being in this situation, it was not proper still more to provoke the Independents, by answers which would not have pleased them. On the other side, they could not think of agreeing with the King, without obtaining the abolition of Episcopacy, not thinking themselves safe so long as the very name of Bishop subsisted. In short, it was not proper to attempt a resistance of the army by force. In all appearance, their preparations would but have hastened the execution of the army's resolutions, whereas it was their interest to amuse them only for some days. All their hopes therefore were grounded upon the King's compliance, which they hardly questioned, considering the manifest danger to which his obstinacy would expose him. For it is not likely, he was ignorant of the petitions presented against him, or was not soon informed of the army's remonstrance, since every one had free access to him.

Three days after the Parliament had received the remonstrance, letters came from the commissioners at Newport, with his Majesty's answer concerning the Marquis of Ormond, and the Bishops lands; namely, that he could not give any orders to the Marquis before the treaty was signed, but then would do as both Houses desired; and if the Marquis refused to obey, would take such measures against him as should be satisfactory to the two Houses. That as to the Bishops lands, he persisted in his former offers. This answer afforded no great hopes of a speedy accommodation. However, as it was delivered the 16th of the month, two days before the presenting of the army's remonstrance, it was hoped, the next news from Newport would be more satisfactory. But on the 25th, the Parliament was informed, by letters from the commissioners, that the King had positively refused to add any thing to his former answers (1).

This was not all. They were acquainted at the same time, that the General had required Colonel Hammond to attend him at the head-quarters, and sent Colonel Ewers to take the command of his Majesty in the Isle of Wight, who kept the King under very strict custody. Thus the precautions taken by the Parliament, to hinder the King from coming to treat in person at London, for fear he should meet with too many friends, were the cause that they could not be master of his person, when it would have been most necessary. Two days after, the Commons received a letter from Colonel Hammond, with the General's order to him to repair to the army, and resign his command to Colonel Ewers. Whereupon the Commons voted, that Colonel Hammond should be required to stay in the Isle of Wight, and the General be acquainted with this vote. But Hammond was now gone to the army, and had resigned the custody of the King to Colonel Ewers. Notwithstanding all this, the Parliament seems not to have despaired of agreeing with the King, since the Commons deferred the consideration of the army's remonstrance, till the first of December, in order to be better able to answer it when they should know the King's final resolution. The same day, the General received petitions from the forces in the North, and in Wales, agreeable to the army's remonstrance.

After the General had thus made himself master of the King's person, without the privacy of the two Houses, it was not very likely, he should be disposed to receive their orders. Nevertheless, the Commons told him in a letter from their Speaker, that his orders to Colonel Ewers were contrary to their resolutions, and Colonel Hammond's instructions, and that it was the pleasure of the House, he should recall his orders, and suffer Colonel Hammond to attend his charge in the Isle of Wight. But the General, and council of war, took no notice of this order.

The next day, the King, by command of the General, was removed [by Lieutenant Colonel Cobbet] to Hurst castle in Hampshire, situated on a narrow piece of land, running into the sea, over against the Isle of Wight, and the Parliament was not informed of it till three days after (2).

Mean while, the army was not idle, being resolved to run all hazards to prevent the conclusion of the treaty. The same day, November the 30th, they published a Declaration or Manifesto, wherein they clearly discovered their designs, and which was to this effect:

"That the army being full of sad apprehensions concerning the danger and evil of the treaty with the King, and of any accommodation with him, or restitution of him thereupon, they did, by a remonstrance, make their application thereby to the House of Commons. That they took this course out of an earnest desire, that those matters of highest concernment to the publick interest of the nation might be pursued and provided for if possible, by those whose proper work and trust it was: But to their grief they found, that instead of any satisfaction, or reasonable answer thereunto, they were wholly rejected, without any consideration of them. For they were laid aside till the Monday following, by which time the treaty, as then supposed, would have been concluded; but that failing, and two days more being added to the treaty, the consideration of their remonstrance in the day appointed was waved and laid aside; the treaty the mean while going on in the former way and terms, and like to be concluded the very next day. The army therefore having received no answer to their former propositions, they could not but remain confident, that the prevailing part of those to whom they did apply, had as it were their eyes wilfully shut, and ears stopp'd, against any thing of light or reason offered to them, 'tis as not to discern the dangers wherewith the Kingdom was threatened.

"The army then seeing nothing left, to which the Parliament's engaging and persisting in such ways, could rationally be attributed, less than a treacherous or corrupt neglect of, and apostasy from the publick trust reposed in them, they thought fit to appeal to the common judgments of indifferent and uncorrupted men, and to the more righteous judgment of God above all."

After justifying this extraordinary appeal in the best manner they could, they admonished such members as were upright, and had a just sense of those things, to protest against the resolutions of the House, and withdraw, promising to look upon them as persons that had the chief trust of the Kingdom remaining in them, and to adhere to them, and be guided by them, till the introducing of a more formal power, in a just representative, were speedily endeavoured. Then they declared, that they were ready to lay down their arms, if their remonstrance were answered; but that the little notice taken of their propositions, made them sensible there was nothing to be hoped. And therefore the case being so extraordinary, and the danger so pressing, they were drawing up with their army to London, there to follow providence, as God should clear their way.

The first of December, the General writ to the city, to inform them of the army's advance towards London, on account of the Parliament's contempt of their remonstrance: That they had no thought of plunder, or other wrong to the city, or so much as troubling the Inhabitants with quartering any soldiers: But that for prevention of all violence, he desired forty thousand pounds might be provided by the next day (3). The House of Commons agreed, that the city should send this sum to the army, and acquainted the General, that it was the House's pleasure he should not remove nearer London.

The second of this month, the House took the King's offers into consideration, but without coming to any conclusion. Whilst they were debating, the General, with several regiments came and took up their quarters in Whitehall, St. James's, the Muse, and other places in the skirts of the city, which he judged convenient for his designs.

The 3d being Sunday, the Parliament did not sit. But on the 4th, the Commons resumed the debate of the King's concessions, which was interrupted by the news of the King's removal to Hurst Castle. Whereupon they voted immediately, that the carrying the King prisoner to Hurst Castle, was without the advice and consent of the House. After that, they debated again the King's offers, and sat all the day and night, till five a-clock in the morning. At last, it was proposed, whether the question should be put, and carried by a hundred and forty, against a hundred and four. Then the main question being put, it was voted, that his Majesty's concessions to the propositions of Parliament upon the treaty, were sufficient grounds for settling the peace of the Kingdom. But I cannot think it was unanimously, as the Lord Clarendon affirms (4). What has been just seen seems to show rather, there were many Members not content with this resolution.

Immediately after, the House appointed a Committee to confer with the General, for the better procuring a good correspondence between the Parliament and the Army; and then adjourned to Wednesday. The same day, several other regiments came and quartered in the suburbs of London, and the General caused a Proclamation to be made, requiring all Delinquents, who had not perfected their commissions, to depart ten miles from London [for a month,] on pain of being proceeded against as prisoners of war.

Wednesday, the 6th of December, the General sent two regiments to W'lmster, and the City trained-bands were discharged, who had been set there some months since, for guards to the Parliament. After the soldiers were drawn up in the Court of Requests, on the stairs, and in the lobby before the House, when the Members offered to go in, Colonel Pride, having a paper of names in his hand, seized upon one and forty, and sent them into the Court of Wards, where they were kept under guard. The House having notice thereof, sent their Serjeant at Arms to acquaint these Members, that they should forthwith attend the service of the House. But the officer of the guard answered, he had order to secure them, which order he was to obey before any other command (1).

Not long after, Colonel Whaley, with other officers, presented to the House a Paper intitled, Pragmatics and Desires of the Army in vindication of their conduct, the substance whereof was to this effect:

"1. Whereas several Members of your House (2), were in the year 1647, impeached by yourselves for treason, or for high crimes and misdemeanours, in relation to the treasonable engagement in the city of London; the violence then done upon the Parliament, the levying of a new war, and other evils, in maintenance and protection thereof; and upon clear proofs against them, were by your censure expelled the House, and disabled from farther trust therein, and upon new Writs issued out, new members were chosen and returned in some of their rooms; and yet by the prevalence of their faction, when in the last summer's wars, divers faithful members were engaged abroad upon necessary publick service, and others through malignant tumults and disturbances could not safely attend the House, the same persons were afterwards re-admitted to sit in the House, and vote as formerly, without any trial or satisfaction in the things whereof they were accused.

"2. Whereas by the confederacy of Major-General Brown, now Sheriff London, with the said impeached members and others, the Scots were invited and drawn in to invade this Kingdom the last summer, inasmuch as when upon their actual invasion the House proceeded to declare them enemies, and those that adhered to them, traitors; yet the said confederators, and other treacherous members, to the number of ninety and odd, as upon the division of the House appeared, did by their counsels and votes endeavour to hinder the House from declaring against their confederate invaders: We desire, that the said Major-General Brown may be also secured and brought to judgment, and that the rest of the ninety and odd persons dissenting against the said vote, may be excluded the House.

"3. Whereas in a continued series of your proceeding for many months together, we have seen the prevalence of the same treacherous, corrupt, and divided counsels, through factions and private interests, opposing or obstructing justice in all kinds, diverting your counsels from any thing of publick good, hindering any proceedings to any such settlement, as would consist with security to the publick interest, or put a real end to the troubles, burdens, or hazards of the Kingdom, and precipitating into treacherous and destructive compliances and conjunctions with the acknowledged enemies thereof, as in the votes of No more Addresses to the King, &c. the justness and necessity whereof you had once so cleared to the world; also in the votes for entertaining or seeking after all that personal treaty: And lastly, in the votes declaring the King's past concessions to be a ground for the House to proceed upon for the settlement of the peace of the Kingdom, notwithstanding the visible insufficiency and defects of them in things essentially concerning the publick interest and liberties of the Kingdom, as those propounded in our late Remonstrance are, and in other matters both religious and civil. We therefore most earnestly desire, that all such faithful members who are innocent in these things, would immediately, by protestation and publick Declaration, acquit themselves from any guilt of, or concurrence in the, several votes or counsels here before particularly mentioned, as corrupt or destructive, that the Kingdom may know who they are that have kept their trust, and distinguish themselves from the rest that have thus falsified the same; and that all such as cannot or shall not so acquit themselves particularly, may be immediately excluded or suspended the House, and not re-admitted until they have given clear satisfaction therein, to the judgment of those who now so acquit themselves, and the grounds of such satisfaction be published to the Kingdom.

"4. Thus, such as by faithfulness have retained their trust, being left in a condition to pursue and perform the same, without such interruptions, diversions, and deprivations of counsels as formerly: We shall desire, and hope you will speedily and vigorously proceed to take order for the execution of justice, to set a short period to your own power, to provide for a speedy succession of equal representatives, according to our late Remonstrance, wherein differences in the Kingdom may be ended, and we and others may comfortably acquiesce; as for our parts, we hereby engage and assure you we shall."

It would be needless to make any remarks and observations upon this Paper, the injustice and violence whereof are so very obvious. But it was necessary to inform the Reader of the contents for the following reason. There are Historians whose partiality has caused them either to omit, or but just mention it, without relating the substance, for fear of convincing their Readers, that the Presbyterians were not concerned in what was afterwards transacted, and that the Independents were the true and sole authors thereof.

December the 7th, the Commons as they were repairing to their House, found the door within and without guarded by soldiers, who hindered many from going in (3). The Lord Clarendon says, near one hundred were denied entrance. This makes me think that the ninety mentioned in the Remonstrance were of this number. So from this day, very few or no Presbyterian-members were admitted any more. However this be, the state of the House was once more changed by this new revolution. The Presbyterians had been superior from the beginning of the war, to the 6th of August 1647. The Independents had prevailed from that day, till about the end of the year 1648, when the army was forced to remove from London, after which the Presbyterians were masters again. At last, on the 6th and 7th of December this same year, the Independents entirely expelled the Presbyterians, or at least disabled them from supporting their party. This must be carefully remembered, if we desire to have a clear idea of this History.

The same day, December the 7th, Cromwell, who came to London the night before (4), sat in the House, and received thanks for his great services.

Though the General had promised the city not to quarter the soldiers upon the inhabitants, as this promise was the only condition, in case the sum demanded were paid, and as the city had not furnished the money, he ordered two regiments into the city, and on the morrow, a third, after which, he took away twenty thousand pounds from Weavers-Hall, assuring the Treasurer he should be reimbursed out of the assessments of the city due to the army.

About the same time, was presented to the General, a plan for the People, A new Representative, or, an Agreement for settling the Government (5). This plan was wholly founded upon Independent principles, and agreeable to the army's Remonstrance, except that it was more large on each article. This agreement was propounded as a rule for future Government, and to be subscribed throughout the Kingdom. But as this plan was not executed, though it was drawn with great pains by the council of war, and even seemed to be approved by the Parliament, I do not think it necessary to insert it (6).

Divers rules for the election of the Members. Officers, and Malignants, to be incapable of electing, or being elected; and generally of the power and equal distribution of the Members, to be in all three hundred persons, &c. The frame of this Agreement of the People was thought to be, for the most part, made by Commissary General Ireson, a man full of invention and industry, who had a little knowledge of the Law, which led him into the more errors. Whitelock, p. 361.

The secluded members having published a protestation against the violence put upon them, both Houses declared the Protestation to be false, scandalous and seditious, and tending to destroy the fundamental Government of the Kingdom, and ordered that all persons who had any hand in framing or publishing it, should be incapable to bear any office, or to sit as members of either House. They further ordained, that all absent members, upon their coming to the House, should disclaim their being concerned in, or giving consent to the contriving or publishing the protestation.

After that, both Houses passed an ordinance, that no persons who had been Delinquents, or assisted the King against the Parliament in the first or second wars, [or been aiding in bringing in the Scots army, or subscribed to the reasonable Engagement in 1647, for a personal Treaty] or abetted the late tumults within the cities of London and Westminster, or the counties of Essex, Kent, Middlesex, or Surrey, should not be elected, or give their voice for elections, the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, Common-council-men, or any other officers. But within few days, a committee of the Common-council acquainted the House, that the city was so generally concerned in the engagement for a personal Treaty, that there would not be a sufficient number of persons to supply the necessary offices of the city, if that restriction in the late ordinance should stand.

The 20th of December, the General ordered fifteen or sixteen of the members secured by the army to be released, with liberty to resume their places in the House if they pleased.

We have just seen how much the face of affairs was altered, by the great turn on the 6th and 7th of December. The Commons were now all Independents, openly supported by the army, and their design was to destroy equally, King, Monarchy, Episcopacy, and Presbytery. As for the House of Lords, who had used their endeavour, though in vain, to hasten the peace, they saw themselves, since this revolution, obliged to follow the stream, which was too rapid to be opposed. There were in the House but few Peers, most of them indeed Presbyterians, but too weak, in their present situation, to assert their negative Voice, and the rest of their privileges. Whilst the King was able to protect such as applied to him, the Lords retained some authority, because they were not without a resource, in case they were disregarded by the Commons. But after the battle of Naseby it was not the same. The Commons assumed such a superiority, that the Lords had no other way to support themselves, but by approving, or seeming to approve, whatever was done by the other House, for fear of producing a breach which must have been fatal to them, since they would not have known what to do. If they were forced to behave in this manner, whilst their own party prevailed in the Lower House, it is no wonder, they did not dare to swerve from this policy when the Independents had gained the advantage. To what purpose would it have been to resist the torrent? We shall see presently, their first opposition to a material point irrecoverably ruined them. They therefore who blame them for a too great compliance with the transactions since the 6th of December 1648, ought to remember, that this is not an occasion, where we are to reason upon the general ideas of the constitution of the Parliament, but rather upon the particular idea of the situation the Parliament was in at that time.

Since the Independents were masters of the Parliament, petitions against the King multiplied so fast, that scarce a day passed without some one being presented to the Commons, especially from the garrisons, which were part of the army. Lambert being returned from Scotland, the regiments under his command failed not to present a petition agreeable to the remonstrance of the army. Somersetshire where the King had formerly many adherents, distinguished itself on this occasion above all the rest, by presenting a petition, desiring that speedy and effectual justice might be executed upon the chief Delinquents, that lay upon the King. The Commons were so pleased with such a petition from a whole county, that to encourage the rest to present the like, the petitioners were called in and received the thanks of the House, and the petition with the order of thanks were forthwith printed and published. It does not however appear that the other Counties followed this example. Only Norfolk, a few days after, desired by a petition, that the King himself might be brought to impartial justice.

At length, the 23d of December, the House of Commons having resolved, pursuant to the desires of the army, to bring the chief Delinquents to a trial, and intending to begin with the King, appointed a committee of thirty-eight to draw up a charge, and for that purpose to receive all informations and examinations of witnesses for the matters 1648. of fact against him.

The same day, the fleet under the command of the Earl of Warwick, sent a Declaration to the General, that they concurred with the army in their remonstrance. This did not much redound to the Earl of Warwick's honour, who having been one of the Presbyterian-leaders, was the first that quitted his party to join with the Independents.

The resolution to try the King being taken, (a resolution projected by several officers of the army, when he first retired to the Isle of Wight,) Colonel Harrison was commanded to remove him from Hurst castle to Windsor. All the time the King was in the Isle of Wight, he kept a private correspondence with the Lord Newburgh. Since his Strathmore being at Hurst, that Lord had found means to acquaint him, he was to be removed to Windsor, and as his house was in the road (1), sent him word, to endeavour to dine with him, and complain of the going of his horse, promising to supply him with one of the fleetest in England, by means of which he might attempt to escape. Accordingly, the King complained all the morning, that his horse was very uneasy, and so artfully managed, that he was conducted to dine with the Lord Newburgh. But when his Majesty came there, he was quickly told, that the horse so much depended upon, was the day before lamed with a kick. This stratagem failing, the King was conveyed to Windsor, where he was kept till the 19th of January 1648-9, when he was carried to St. James's.

He was no sooner at Windsor, than the council of war ordered all the usual ceremonies to the King to be laid aside, as serving him upon the knee, and the like, and most of his domesticks to be dismissed. For though the council of war had no right to take then upon them, yet they daily increased upon the privileges of the Parliament, which acted entirely by their orders.

I have before spoken of the representation of the Common-council of London, concerning the election of the Lord-Mayor, and other officers of the city. The House of Commons having heard the report of the committee appointed for that purpose, ordered, that their former ordinance should be punctually executed, not regarding, that the Magistrates of London should be chosen out of the ablest and most substantial citizens, provided they were of the reigning party. They further ordered, that freemen, for the future, should not be obliged to take the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.

The same day, being the 28th of December, the committee appointed to consider of drawing up a charge against the King, reported an ordinance for attaining him of high treason, and for trying him by such commissioners as should be named in the ordinance, which being read the first time; was ordered to be read again the next morning. But as the House knew, the ordinance would be approved at the third reading, they passed an act for erecting a High Court of Justice, with power to try the King. The preface to which extraordinary act was as follows:

"Whereas it is notorious, That Charles Stuart, the now King of England, not content with those many encroachments which his predecessors had made upon the people in their rights and freedoms, hath had a wicked design, totally to subvert the antient and fundamental laws and liberties of this nation, and in their trade to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical Government; and that besides all other evil ways and means to bring this design to pass, he hath persecuted it with fire and sword, levied and maintained a cruel war in the Land against the Parliament and Kingdom, whereby the country hath been miserably wasted, the publick treasure exhausted, trade decayed, thousands of people murdered, and infinite other mischiefs committed, for all which high and treasonable offences, the said Charles Stuart, might long since justly have been brought to exemplary and condign punishment: Whereas also the Parliament, well hoping, that the restraint and imprisonment of his person, after it had pleased God to deliver him into their hands, would have quieted the distempers of the Kingdom, did forbear to proceed judicially against him; but found by sad experience, that such their remissness served only to encourage him and his complices in the continuance of their evil practice, and in raising of new commotions, rebellions, and invasions. For prevention therefore of the like or greater inconveniences, and to the end, no chief Officer, or Magistrate whatsoever may hereafter presume, traitorously and maliciously to imagine or contrive, the enslaving or destroying of the English nation, and to expect impunity for so doing: Be it ordained and enacted, by the Commons in Parliament, and it is hereby ordained and enacted by the authority thereof, That Thomas Lord Fairfax, Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, Esquires,

(1) The Lodge at the King's Park at Bagshot.

1643. "Sir Hardress Waller Knight, Philip Skippon, (and a hundred and forty-five others) shall be, and are hereby appointed and required to be Commissioners and Judges for the hearing, trying, and adjudging of the said Charles."

The ordinance for trial of the King passed in the House of Commons, the second of January, and was sent up the same day to the Lords for their concurrence. Since the 6th of December, the Upper-House had consisted only of nine Peers, the rest having absented themselves, that they might not be obliged to countenance the outrageous proceedings of the Commons. But upon notice, that the ordinance would that day be sent up to the Lords, there came more Peers than usual, as the Earls of Northumberland, Manchester, Rutland, the Lords North, Rochford, Maynard, Dunbar, in all sixteen, [and the Lord Denbigh Speaker.] The ordinance being read, was unanimously rejected. However, to gain time, if possible, the Lords agreed to acquaint the Commons, that they would send answer by messengers of their own; and at the same time adjourned for ten days. This artifice was fruitless. The Commons having ordered the Journal of the House of Lords to be examined, and finding the ordinance was rejected, voted, "That all members of the House of Commons, and others, appointed to act in any ordinance wherein the Lords were joined, shall be empowered to sit, act, and execute, in the said several committees of themselves, notwithstanding the House of Peers join not with them." And therefore they ordered the names of six Lords, who had been appointed for Judges, to be left out of the commission, and others to be nominated in their room. Among these last was Serjeant Bradshaw, who was afterwards chosen President of the High Court of Justice. Then, the House voted:

1. That the people under God, are the original of all just power.
2. That the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, being chosen by, and representing the people, have the supreme authority of this nation.
3. That whatsoever is enacted and declared law by the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, hath the force of law, and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the consent and concurrence of the King, and House of Peers, be not had

These principles, though directly contrary to the true constitution of the English Government, were however very agreeable to those of the Independents, whose intention was to turn the Monarchy into a Republic.

The ordinance for trial of the King, with the amendments that were forced to be made, for want of the Lords concurrence, passed the House of Commons the 6th of January.

The following days to the 20th, were employed in preparations for the trial, the like whereof had never yet been seen in the world. I intend not to swell this history with the circumstances of this famous trial. They are to be found in a little book, entitled, A true account of the Trial of Charles Stuart, &c. published at London in 1650, and translated into French, wherein nothing is omitted. I imagine I shall do the Reader no injury, to refer him to this little book, which is not scarce, and which will inform him of all particulars (3). I shall content my self therefore with briefly observing, what I think most material in this affair.

I. The High Court of Justice observed the same rules in trying the King, as in judging a common malefactor, there being no precedent of such a trial.

II. The principal article of the accusation was, that the King had levied war against the Parliament, which was undeniable. The sieges and battles were evident proofs of it. But this ought not to have been the principal point. It should have been proved, that he was the Beginner and Author of the war. For it is manifest, if this war had been only defensive on his part, he was not to be blamed. And yet, in the charge, he was supposed to have put the Parliament under a necessity of defending themselves, and this point, which was the chief, not only was not proved, but even not attempted to be so. The depositions of the witnesses tended not to show, that the King had forced the Parliament to take arms, but only that he had been seen sword in hand against the Parliament, and giving orders to carry war. The question, which of the two, either the King or the Parliament, had begun the war, ought to have been fully cleared. But though it had been so, to the King's disadvantage, who does not know, that the beginner of a war, is not always the aggressor? This was a point of great discussion, and which impartial judges would have found difficult to decide. For if what has been said in the History of this reign be remembered, it will be observed, that though it is evident, the King governed in an arbitrary manner for some years, the ground of the war he undertook, was not in maintenance of this arbitrary power. He had fully consented to the annulling of his usurpations. But the ground of the war, on his part, was the defence of the power the King enjoys by the laws of the Land. On the Parliament's side, the ground of the war was, That in a supposition, the King could not be trusted any more, they would have divested him of the power his legal prerogatives afforded him to return to his former courses, and govern for the future as he had governed before. The King was unwilling to be curbed, and the Parliament would set bounds to his power. This was the true ground of the war. It was not therefore easy to determine who was the first author of it. The King refused to give other security for the future than his word; and the Parliament pretended to have very strong reasons to suspect the word of a Prince, who had so often broke it. To determine on which side justice and reason lay, the King's heart must have been divided into, to know whether he was sincere, or intended to deceive the Parliament. On the other hand, it was necessary to know, whether the directors of the Parliament had not some other end than the public good, and whether private interests were not concealed under that pretence. But all these things could be known only to God. And yet, the Parliament, being judge and party, supposed, without alleging any proof, that the King was the aggressor and sole author of the war.

III. There are frequent instances in History of Kings assassinated by their subjects, in consequence either of the public hatred, or of private revenges, or of the interest of some faction. The English History furnishes, even since the Conquest, examples of two Kings solemnly deposed and imprisoned. But till Charles I., it no where appears, that any King was ever tried for his life, before his own subjects as Judges. I shall say nothing here of other Sovereigns, who are possessed of a greater authority over their Subjects than the Kings of England; for there may be a wide difference between Sovereigns in that respect. But confining my self wholly to the Kingdom of England, and supposing the constitution of the Government such as it was from the Conquest to Charles I., I shall briefly set forth what has been said for and against for extraordinary a trial. In the first place, it is demanded, On what Law, natural or positive, was founded the right assumed by the Parliament of England to try the King? The most plausible answer in vindication of the Parliament's proceedings, is as follows.

According to the constitution of the English Government, the King is no less bound than the Subject, to observe the Laws to which himself, or predecessors assented, which is the principal clause of the Coronation-oath. If this obligation be equal on both sides, there must be therefore equally means to cause them to discharge it, in case they neglect it. As for the Subject, there is no manner of difficulty. The penalties against offenders are universally known, and the Courts of Justice are appointed to inflict them. It is true, the Laws have ordained no penalty upon the Kings, who discharge not their duty, as well out of respect to the regal dignity, as because it cannot be supposed, that the King, to whom the execution of the Laws is committed, should be the first to break them, and betray the trust lodged in him by the People. He is nevertheless bound to observe them himself, and cause them to be observed by the Subject. This is a principle generally acknowledged. But what is this obligation, if the observance of the Laws depends solely on his will, and there be no just means to compel him to observe them, or punish him when he breaks them? Will it not be an empty sound without any meaning? And will not the English Government be as arbitrary as that of any other country in the world? Since therefore, the Laws have not decreed any penalty against a King that should neglect his duty, or the manner to constrain him to discharge it; and as, nevertheless, he is bound by the same Laws to procure the observance thereof, and to observe them himself, the Nation's representative in Parliament is of course to call him 1648-9. to an account, since it is not possible to imagine any other way. Supposing the King has violated the most fundamental Laws of the realm, shall foreigners be applied to, for to bring him to justice? Can it be supposed, contrary to experience, that the King is under an impossibility of breaking the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, of endeavouring to subvert them, and of establishing an arbitrary Government? Will it be maintained, that he may do it with impunity? But if he is assured of impunity, what difference is there between the English Government and the most despotick, since its preservation will solely depend on the King's probity and will? If he runs no hazard in trying to alter the constitution, after ten attempts, he will try again, even till he succeeds. As to the objection, That less violent means than war may be used to oblige the King to the observance of the Laws, and less unjust and extraordinary, than the taking away his life, to punish him for the breach of them; it is answered, This is true, and the Parliament had accordingly tried to secure the Government by other methods, as by demanding of the King that the power of the Militia might be lodged in both Houses. If the King had agreed to it, the realm would have been in peace, and the People's jealousies have ceased. But he had taken arms to prevent the Parliament's using these means, a clear evidence that his design was to maintain himself in a condition to alter the Government when he should have opportunity. This unjust war had been the occasion of infinite mischiefs, of the death of thousands of his Subjects, and the ruin of the rest; and if he was brought to a trial, it was not so much to punish him for violating the Laws, as for preferring the unjust and violent way of arms, before the expedients offered him to prevent his breaking them for the future.

The advocates for the King say, 1. Though the Kings of England have not so much authority in their realm as some other Kings, it does not follow, that they may be put upon a level with subjects, and made equally accountable for their actions.

2. The principle laid down for foundation, that there is an equal obligation upon the King and the Subjects to observe the Law, is false, and consequently the whole reasoning founded thereon, of no force. For, private persons being entrusted only with their own conduct, nothing can exempt them from the observance of the Laws. But the King being entrusted with the Government of the State, and the execution of the Laws, he has consequently power to qualify them on certain occasions, otherwise this trust would be to no purpose. The Laws could not foresee every thing, and there are occasions where it is absolutely necessary for the publick good to act contrary to them, or at least, to suspend the observance of them, and therefore the obligation of the King and the Subject is not equal.

3. Supposing the King had violated some of the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, and levied war against the Parliament after the most unjust manner, it did not follow that he might be punished with death, by reason he has neither superior nor equal in the Kingdom, and he could have none but Subjects for his Judges. Besides, he was the fountain of justice, and it was absurd to make him liable to justice, from whom it flows and derives its whole authority.

4. According to this supposition, the chance of war having put him in the power of his enemies, he might have been detained in prison, and prevented from doing mischief, till he was prevailed with to grant all the securities required. But there was a wide difference between imprisonment and death; as the first could be considered as a reasonable and necessary precaution, and the other as a punishment Subjects were not empowered to inflict on their Sovereign, as indeed, the like had never been heard of.

5. But the supposition that the King had violated the Laws, and levied unjust war against his Parliament, was very far from being well-grounded. In the first place, as to the Laws, if the King, misled by evil counsels, had, on some occasions, carried his power too far, when the Parliament made him sensible of the ill consequences of this conduct, he had cheerfully and willingly renounced the exorbitant power which he believed himself before to be justly intitled to. He had, without delay, consented to all the Acts presented to him on that subject, and agreed that his most intimate counsellors should be brought to justice. The Parliament had accepted this reparation, without expressing the least desire of causing him to suffer for his past faults. After that, it was absurd to alledge these same faults, so amply repaired, as a motive of the justice pretended to be executed upon him.

6. As for the war he had levied against his Parliament, it was wrongfully asserted, and without the least proof, that the King had raised and begun it on purpose to avoid giving his People security. And under colour of desiring security for the future, a desire wholly founded upon mere suspitions and bare possibilities, that the King might abuse his power, it was pretended to strip him of all his Prerogatives, in a word, of the regal authority, and leave him only a shadow of Royalty. Thus, supposing it true that the King had begun the war, which was by no means evinced, it would also be true, that the Parliament had excited it, by attempting, under a vain pretence of peace and concord, to reduce the King to the most melancholy state a Sovereign can possibly be in.

7. The justice, pretended to be executed upon the King, was founded entirely on two suppositions, supported with no proof. The first, that the King had undertaken the war, only to free himself from giving security. The second, that there was reason to fear he would employ the power that should be left him, in altering the constitution. All reasonable persons were therefore left to judge, whether there was justice in trampling upon all Laws divine and human, and inflicting upon their Sovereign a capital punishment on two such rash suppositions.

8. As for the plunder, ruin, murder, and other mischiefs occasioned by the wars, before they could be charged to the King's account, it ought at least to have been well proved that he was the author of the war. But if this point were fully examined, it would doubtless be found, that the complainers themselves could alone be charged with it.

9. The King was proceeded against for intending to change the Government, and make it arbitrary and tyrannical. But every Englishman was convinced, that the Government had never been more despotick, more tyrannical, and more arbitrary than since the meeting of this Parliament. There was scarce a Law but what had been violated. The two Houses had, for several years, usurped the supreme authority contrary to the known Laws. And lately the Commons had voted, that all power was lodged in them, without the concurrence of King and Peers, a maxim unknown to the English from the foundation of the Monarchy.

10. The Commons in establishing, by a bare vote, that it belonged to them alone to try the King, had plainly declared, they owned neither superior nor equal, which was really introducing an arbitrary Government.

11. Lastly, till 1643, the Parliament had only suspected the King's intention to alter the Government, but after the Parliament had assumed the direction, the Government was really and truly changed. The King was moreover suspected of designing to alter the established Religion: but the Parliament had indeed changed it, and reduced it to a deplorable confusion, and the Project of this unfortunate change had been the true cause of the war, and of all the subsequent calamities.

IV. The fourth circumstance I intend to observe, is, that the King was brought three times before the High Court of Justice, and as often called upon to answer the charge entered against him, which was read in his hearing. But he constantly refused to own the authority of the Court, and of those who erected it. On the other hand, the Court would never hear his reasons for declining their jurisdiction. They always took for granted, that the authority by which the Court was established, was sufficient; which was the very thing the King would have combated, but was never suffered. At last, seeing he could not prevail to be heard on that subject, he left his reasons in writing to this effect:

"That no earthly power could justly call him (who his reasons for it, Rushworth, VII. p. 1453)

"was their King" in question as a delinquent.
"That there were no proceedings just against any man but what were warranted, either by God's Laws, or the municipal laws of the country where he lives. As for the proceedings against him, they could not be warranted by God's laws. For on the contrary, it is there said, where the word of a King is, there is power; and who may say unto him, what dost thou? Eccles. viii.

4. Then for the law of the land, no impeachment can lie against the King, they all going in his name: And one of their maxims is, That the King can do no wrong. Besides, the law upon which they grounded their proceedings, must either be old or new: If old, they ought to shew it; if new, they should tell what authority, warranted by the fundamental laws of the land, had made it, and when.

"How the House of Commons could erect a Court of Judicature, which was never one it self, he left to God and the world to judge.

"And it was full as strange, that they should pretend to make laws without King, or Lords Houses, to any that had heard speak of the laws of England. And admitting, that the people of England's commission could grant their pretended power, he saw nothing they could shew for that; for certainly they never asked the question of the tenth man in the Kingdom.

"That having concluded, as much as in him lay, a treaty

1648-9. ambiguous term, or some restriction that rendered them useless. This may be said to be one of the principal causes of his ruin, because giving thereby occasion of distrust, it was not possible to find any expedient for a peace with the Parliament. He was thought to act with so little sincerity in his engagements, that it was believed there was no dependence on his word. The Parliament could not even resolve to debate on the King's propositions, so convinced were they of his ability to hide his real intentions under ambiguous expressions. But they sent their own propositions to the King, with the liberty only of saying Content, or not Content, so apprehensive were they of his explanations. But as I may be accused of loading the King too much upon the point of sincerity, I think it incumbent on me, to justify what I have said, by an unexceptionable evidence. I mean the Earl of Clarendon.

A Law enacted by violence and force, says that illustrious Historian, is not rightfully enacted, was one of those positions of Aristotle, which hath never been since contradicted, and was an advantage, that being well managed, and stoutly insisted upon, would, in spite of all their machinations have brought his Majesty's enemies to a temper of being treated with. But I have some cause to believe, that even this argument which was unanswerable for the rejecting the bill [for taking away the Bishops votes,] was applied for the confirming it; and an opinion, that the violence and force used in procuring it, rendered it absolutely invalid and void, made the confirmation of it less considered, as not being of strength to make that all good, which was in it self null. And I doubt this logic had an influence upon other acts of no less moment than these.

Let the Reader judge after this, if we may boast of King Charles's sincerity, since even in passing Acts of Parliament, which is the most authentick and solemn promise a King of England can make, he gave his assent, merely in an opinion, that they were void in themselves, and consequently he was not bound by this engagement. I pass over in silence the manifest breach of the Petition of Right, perhaps upon the same principle, and of his many assurances to his Parliament of his intention to maintain their privileges, which he violated within a few days, because these things have been sufficiently spoken of in the History of his Reign.

Some accuse him of an inclination for the Roman Catholic Religion, nay, there are who carry this charge so far as to say, he intended to restore it in England. These imputations are groundless. But it cannot be denied, that he gave occasion for them by his conduct, though contrary to his intention. During the first fifteen years of his reign, the Roman Catholics were not only screened from the rigour of the Laws, but even encouraged and countenanced to such a degree, that he made them Privy-Counsellors, Secretaries of State, and Lords-Lieutenants of Counties. Two things induced him to this condescension. The first, the Queen's importunities, who was extremely zealous for her Religion. The second, his project to render himself absolute, for the execution of which, he believed the assistance of the Catholics, as well English as foreigners, to be necessary. But I will not affirm, that the Queen, and some of the Ministry had not formed with regard to Religion, more extensive projects, which they did not think proper to impart to the King. The assistance of the Catholics, whom the King had managed for another occasion, became necessary for his own defense, after his breach with the Parliament. How unwilling soever he seemed to receive any aid from the Papists, it is certain, many were entertained in his service, and that he was privately assisted by the Catholics on sundry important occasions.

Though it cannot be proved that he excited the Irish rebellion, it may however be affirmed, it was not against him that the Irish took arms, since they never had less cause to complain, than in this and the late reign. Besides, the Papists, both Irish and English, always looked upon this Prince as their protector, and were ever ready to assist him. Had he succeeded in his designs, very likely, the condition of the Catholics in England and Ireland, would have been much more happy, and the penal Laws in great measure repealed. But it does not follow, that the King himself had any inclination to Popery, or intended to establish the Romish Religion. In short, that he was a sincere member of the Church of England, can hardly be doubted, since he affirmed it on the Scaffold, at a time when it could be of no service to him to dissemble his belief.

Many people give him the surname of Martyr, pretending, he suffered death in maintenance of the truth of the Protestant religion, against the Presbyterians and Independents, and call the day of his death, which is solemnized yearly on the 30th of January, the day of his Martyrdom. But in the first place, there was too great a complication of causes which brought him to this tragical end, to ascribe his death solely to Religion. 2. Though it were true that Religion was the sole cause of his death, it would not be universally agreed that he died for defending the truth of the Protestant Religion, since, among Protestants, the English alone, or rather a great part of the English, hold Episcopacy to be a doctrine of Faith. 3. Though dying for Episcopacy were really Martyrdom, the King in his last proposals at Newport, agreed to reduce Episcopacy to a very small matter. 4. Had he been condemned by the Presbyterians, he might in some manner be said to suffer for Episcopacy. But it is evident the Presbyterians had no share in this sentence, nor ever thought of bringing him to a trial. The Independents were the men that condemned and executed him, and surely, it was not on any religious account, but to turn the monarchy into a republic. 5. If the Scrivener's evidence be true, King Charles cannot be said to suffer death for supporting Religion against the Independents, since, according to the deposition, he offered to grant them all the freedom they should desire, if they would but take his part. However this be, the Church of England having recovered, in the reign of Charles II, the advantage she had lost in that of Charles I, appointed the day of his death to be kept every year with fasting and humiliation, which has caused some to give him the glorious title of Martyr.

To conclude, Charles I, was endued with many virtues, and noble qualities. There is even room to believe, that his failings flowed entirely from his design to enslave England, and if, on some occasions, he followed not exactly the rules of sincerity, it was only the more easily to execute what he had undertaken. Without this unfortunate project, he might be reckoned one of the most accomplished Princes that has ever been on the English Throne (1). The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Strafford, Archbishop Laud, and the Queen herself used to a very different Government from that of England, were the persons that ruined this unhappy Prince, whom they so passionately desired to raise higher than his predecessors. But who can forbear making a very natural reflection on this subject? I mean, upon the punishment of those evil Counsellors, and of the King himself. The Duke of Buckingham lost his life by the hands of an assassin; Laud, Strafford, and the King himself died on the Scaffold, and the Queen spent the residue of her days in a melancholy widowhood, being even slighted by her nearest relations. She lived however long enough to see the Prince her Son's Restoration; but found not with him, all the satisfaction she expected, which doubtless was the cause of her return to France where she died in the year 1669.

(1) Dr. Wetwood mentions these particulars, in his Character of King Charles, not taken notice of by Rapin. "He was a Prince of a comely Presence, of a sweet, grave, but melancholy Aspect. His Face was regular, handsome, and well complexioned; his Body strong, healthy, and well-made; and though of a low Stature, was capable to endure the greatest fatigues. He had a good taste of Learning, and a more than ordinary skill in the Liberal Arts, especially Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, and Medals; he acquired the noblest Collection of any Prince in his time, and more than all the Kings of England before him. He spoke several Languages very well, and with a singular good Grace; though now and then, when he was warm in discourse, he was inclinable to flammer. He writ a tolerable hand for a King; but his Sense was strong, and his Style laconick." Mem. p. 68, &c.

The HISTORY of the INTER-REGNUM, from the Death of Charles I, to the Restoration of Charles II.

BOOK XXII.

The HISTORY of the INTER-REGNUM is divided into three principal Parts. The first contains what passed, whilst England was reduced to a DEMOCRACY. The second, what happened during the Protectorates of OLIVER and RICHARD CROMWELL. The third, what passed from the Deprivation of RICHARD CROMWELL, to the Restoration of CHARLES II.

PART I.

The COMMONWEALTH of ENGLAND.

1649. TO understand the Revolutions in England after the death of Charles I, we are necessarily to remember some material things which have already appeared in the foregoing reign, and of which it will not be amiss to make here a short recapitulation.

A recapitulation of some important matters. First, The Parliament now sitting consisted properly but of a House of Commons, who refused to acknowledge the Negative voice of the Peers. This they had manifestly showed in erecting a Court of Justice to try the King without the concurrence of the Lords, whose consent was voted unnecessary.

Secondly, This House of Commons was composed of a small number of members, all Independents, Anabaptists or other Sectaries. All the Presbyterian members who sat in the House the 6th of December were expelled by the army, and the absent, whose Principles agreed not with those of the Independents, durst not resume their places. If ever there was an usurpation, it was this maintained Parliament's Government, founded only in violence, and wholly supported by the army. For though the House of Commons pretended to represent the People of England, it is very certain, the nation afforded but few persons, who were pleased to see the Sovereign Power lodged in the hands of such representatives.

Thirdly, The Independents, of whom this House was chiefly composed, were distinguished by two principles, one relating to the Civil, the other to the Ecclesiastical Government. By the first, they asserted, that the Republican Government was not only the most perfect, but also absolutely necessary for England, after so many oppressions from her Kings, who had changed the Government into a real tyranny. With regard to Religion, tho' they called themselves Protestants, their principle was, that every particular Church was independent, and might be governed as the members thought proper. Their notions concerning the vocation of the ministers of the Gospel, were also very singular; as they believed that, without any other Call, every man was free to discharge the office of Minister, and use the talents given him by God. The other Sectaries, who had joined the Independents because they found in that party a full Toleration, were united with them in the first of these principles, and had declared for a Republican Government. But with respect to Religion there were between them some differences, which the Independents regarded the less, as they wanted to increase their adherents, and, besides, believed, that in matters of Religion, Toleration was absolutely necessary.

Fourthly, There was still in the army a remnant of Levellers, who adhered to their Principle, and were always ready for any attempt to recover their credit. It is true, Cromwell, after having himself raised this faction, had in some measure dispersed, but not entirely destroyed it. An able leader would still have made it as formidable as ever.

No. 72. VOL. II.

Fifthly, It was with the utmost concern that the Presbyterians saw the Independents in possession of Sovereign Power. By that all their measures were broken: Their progress for eight years became fruitless, and the storm, they had raised against the King, returned upon their own heads, or at least, it was apparent, they had all this while been labouring for others without any thing done for themselves. For indeed the Independents were equally enemies to Presbyterian and Episcopal Government. As to civil Government, it is certain, the Presbyterians were not averse to Royalty in general. If they had undertaken to limit its power, 'twas not from a belief that the thing was evil in itself, as established by the Laws of England, but because the two last Kings had used their power to destroy Presbyterianism. So, whatever they had done against King Charles I, was not pointed so much against his Dignity as his Person, because they considered him as their enemy, and despaired of establishing a Presbyterian Government in the Church, so long as he had power to prevent it. Very likely however many of them would have complied with a Republican Government, notwithstanding the tenour of the Covenant, had that Government not been in the hands of the Independents, who were by no means inclined to support Presbyterianism, and whose principles upon Toleration were entirely rejected by the Presbyterians. And therefore an union between the Presbyterians and Independents was morally impossible.

Sixthly, The Royalists, equally enemies of both, could unite with neither of the parties, considering the opposition there was between their principles. The Independents were for a Commonwealth, to which the Royalists could not consent. On the other hand the Presbyterians were for maintaining their Government in the Church, and most of the Royalists could hardly believe, the Presbyterian Churches, as they had no Bishops, to be true Christian Churches. Thus the Royalists, though persecuted by both parties, were far from joining with either. On the contrary, they conceived some hopes, that the division among their enemies would, one day, give them a good opportunity to restore the Monarchy to its former state. Wherefore, they industriously fomented this division, in expectation that the Presbyterians would at last be obliged to abandon their projects, and unite with the Royal Party, to free themselves from the persecution they suffered.

Such were the interests of the Parties which divided the People of England immediately after the death of Charles I. The remembrance of all this is absolutely necessary for understanding the transactions during the Inter-regnum.

Presently after the King's death, the House of Commons published an Act to forbid the proclaiming of Charles Stewart eldest son of the late King, or any other person whatever, on pain of High-Treason. Here was laid, as it were, the foundation of the Commonwealth, which the Independents meant to erect in England. The same day the Lords desired a conference with the Commons.

mons about settling the Government, and the administration of Justice, the Judges commissions being determined by the death of the King. The Commons, without answering the message, voted the House of Lords to be useless and dangerous, and therefore to be abolished. They only left the Lords the power of being elected members of Parliament, in common with other Subjects. This privilege was embraced by a few (1), but rejected by most of the Peers, nay, some published a Protestation against the power assumed by the Commons, which was little regarded. Thus, the Parliament, which at first was composed of the King, six-score Lords, and five hundred and thirteen Commons, was reduced to a House of Commons consisting of about eighty members, of whom very few at the beginning, had five hundred pounds yearly income. And yet, these members, though so few in number, assumed the name of a Parliament, and acted as if in their body had been united the power, which before resided in the King, Lords, and Commons. This might appear very surprising, if we had not seen the foregoing transactions, and the universal terror inspired by the Army. Hence appears with what care and ability Cromwell and his associates had, upon the self-denying ordinance, filled the army with their creatures. Certainly, nothing less than an army entirely Independent and Republican could have procured a power so excessive and extraordinary to so inconsiderable a number of members of Parliament. But it must also be confessed, that, of these new Governors, some were men of a great genius and uncommon capacity, and that if they erred in their principles, they wanted not skill to pursue the consequences. Their principle was, that the Sovereign Authority resided originally in the People, by whom a part of it was committed to the Kings, chosen to govern them according to law. That the King's abuse of this trust, had broken the original Contract between King and People, and by this violation, the Contract subsisting no longer, the Sovereign Power returned to the People as the fountain thereof. So, considering themselves as the representatives of the People, they believed, they had a right to change the form of the Government, without any regard to the original Contract annulled by the King in his violation of the laws.

In consequence of this principle the Commons, assuming the name of Parliament, voted, and afterwards enacted, that the Kingly office should be abolished as unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous, and that the State should be governed by the representatives of the People in a House of Commons without King or Lords, and under the form of a Commonwealth. This grand alteration in the Government produced many others in things consistent with Monarchy, but not with a Commonwealth. The oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy were to be abolished (2), Justice was no longer to be administered in the King's name (3), a new Great-Seal was to be made, new Money to be coined; in a word, every thing to be removed which bore any marks of Royalty. A Great-Seal was therefore made, on one side of which was seen the Parliament sitting, with this inscription, The Great-Seal of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; on the other side, the arms of England and Ireland, with these words, The first Year of Freedom by God's Blessing referred (4). This Seal was committed to a certain number of persons, who were styled Keepers of the Liberties of England. And it was ordained that for the future, all publick orders should be dispatched in the name of these Keepers, under the direction of the Parliament (5). Lastly, The Parliament made choice of thirty-nine persons to form a Council of State for the administration of publick affairs under the Parliament (6). The projects of these changes were formed in February, but the execution of them all required some months.

In the beginning of March, the Parliament erected a new High-Court of Justice, [consisting of sixty Members] to try some persons of distinction, who were in their power. It seems, as there was no House of Lords, the Peers of the Kingdom had lost their privileges under this new Democracy, and that consequently the imprisoned Lords might have been tried by a Jury, in one of the Courts of Justice. The Parliament, without delay, was apprehensive, that a Jury, impanelled as usual, would never find persons of Quality guilty of death, for supporting the cause of their Sovereign. The Independents were not sufficiently numerous among the people, to be secure of a Jury of their party. Besides, they were not assured of the Judges, fix of whom had refused to accept commissions from the Commonwealth. But in erecting a Court of Justice, the Parliament could name such Judges as would be obedient to their orders.

Before this new Court, of which Bradshaw was President, as he had been of that which condemned the King, were brought Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, the Lord Goring, lately created Earl of Norwich, the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, all for the same crime, namely, for having appeared in arms against the Parliament. When the King had a mind, in the beginning of the civil wars, to put to death prisoners taken at Edge-hill and Colchester, the Parliament thinking it unjust, declared, they would inflict the same punishment on their prisoners, if the condemned persons were executed. But when victory had decided in their favour, it was then found very agreeable to justice, to punish with death those who had fought for the King. This will seem the less strange, when it is remembered, that the King himself had been put to death, for making war upon the Parliament.

The Duke of Hamilton represented, That being a subject of Scotland, he had entered England with an army, as an open enemy, by virtue of a commission from the Parliament of Scotland, which he was bound to obey, and consequently, could be treated but as a prisoner of war. As this objection had been foreseen, he was told, he was not proceeded against as Duke Hamilton of Scotland, but as Earl of Cambridge in England; and since he had accepted that title, and as such, taken a seat in Parliament, he was thereby become a subject of England: That if the title of Duke of Hamilton obliged him to obey the Parliament of Scotland, that of Earl of Cambridge ought to have engaged him to refuse the commission. Besides, they were informed, that his accepting the command of the Scottish army, was not owing to mere obedience, but to his own sollicitation, and that he had been the principal author of the war.

The Earl of Holland spoke but little in his defence. Besides, the steps he had taken, and his frequent changing sides, did not much favour his cause.

The Lord Goring (Earl of Norwich) represented, That he had been educated in the Court from his cradle, having been a Page to King James I: That he had never served any other master than the King, whom he had followed, without examining the justice or injustice of his cause, not having had opportunity to be informed in such points, which were above his capacity.

The Lord Capel, steadfast to his principles, and zealously attached to the cause of his Sovereign, defended himself with more courage and resolution. He refused, at first, to own the authority of the Court, alleging, That if he had committed any crime, he ought to be tried in the usual form, and not before a Court unsupported by any law. But the condemnation of the King himself, by a Court of the like nature, might have convinced him, of the unserviceableness of such a defence. He said afterwards, that having surrendered himself prisoner at discretion, he was, by the Law of Nations, exempted from death, if not inflicted within so many days, which were long since expired. He urged, that when after the taking of Colchester, the council of war had condemned Lucas and Lisle to be shot, General Fairfax promised life to the other prisoners, and therefore he demanded the benefit of that promise. The Court being a little embarrassed, sent to the General, to know what promise he had made the Lord Capel. His answer was, That as General, he had promised the prisoners an exemption from military execution, to which three had been condemned, and that his intention reached no farther. Upon this answer it was decided, that the General's promise did not exempt the prisoner from the justice of the Parliament.

Sir John Owen said only, he was obliged in conscience to serve the King according to his oath of allegiance.

649. Notwithstanding their defence, they all received sentence of death (1). But as they had many friends, petitions were offered to the Parliament in their name for a pardon. These petitions were examined in the House, and those of Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, and Lord Capel, rejected. The votes were equally divided upon that of the Earl of Norwich, and as, according to custom, the Speaker's vote was to decide, he declared for pardon, saying, He had formerly received from the Earl some civilities, and therefore voted in his favour (2). The execution of Sir John Owen was suspended, because, as a Commoner, he ought to have been tried before an inferior Court. This saved his life. The three first were executed on a scaffold, erected before Westminster-Hall.

Duke Hamilton complained, when on the scaffold, that he was condemned to die for obeying the Parliament of Scotland, which if he had not done, he must have been put to death there. But it was with little reason that he insinuated a danger of being put to death in Scotland, for a refusal to accept the command of an army raised by his intrigues and authority. He intimated, that if he would have confessed who invited the Scots army into England, it would probably have saved his life. Before his process was formed, he had been strongly solicited to make this discovery, which he utterly refused to do (3). The character of this Duke is not easy to be conceived. All that can be inferred from what has been said for or against him, is, that he had the art to adapt himself to the times. And the Earl of Clarendon plainly insinuates, That when he was employed by the King, he was secretly making friends in the contrary party, in case affairs should turn to the King's disadvantage.

The Lord Capel maintained, That he had acted nothing contrary to the Laws, and consequently was unjustly sentenced to die. He spoke of King Charles I. as of a Saint, and enlarged upon the great understanding, excellent nature, and exemplary piety of the Prince, to whom he gave the title of King, affirming, he would never be shaken in his Religion. In all appearance, the Lord Capel spoke his real sentiments. But the sequel discovered, either that he did not sufficiently know Charles the II. or that Prince had other principles when restored to the throne, than those he had imbibed in his youth.

At or about the same time, many others were executed for the same crime in several parts of the Kingdom; and amongst the rest were Morrice and Blackburn, who had surprised the Castle of Pontfract for the King. Poyer, Powell, and Langborn, who had drawn into a revolt from the Parliament the Principality of Wales, cast lots for their lives, and the first was executed.

When the army drove from the House above a hundred Members, who were unacceptable to them, those only were expressly excluded, whom they then present: but many were absent, against whom nothing had yet been determined. Indeed, these last had never since taken their seats in the House; being apprehensive of the same fate. But possibly they might return in great numbers, whenever a favorable opportunity offered. This the House resolved to prevent, by an Act, which excluded for ever all, who had not fate since the trial of the King, unless they gave the House an entire satisfaction. At the same time, a Committee was appointed to examine those who should offer themselves. This Committee received, without scruple, those who were of Independent principles, and found reasons to exclude their enemies. This indeed was a good expedient to prevent divisions in the Parliament, because the Members were all of one party. But this precaution bred an inconvenience, which called for other measures. The Parliament consisted of so few Members, that they perceived the ridiculousness of stiling themselves the representative of the Commonwealth. It is true, the vacant seats might have been filled by new elections, but the Parliament did not care to run that risk, knowing, their party was yet too inconsiderable, to hope for new Members of their own principles. The House therefore resolved, in order to increase their authority by a greater number of Members, to permit all who had fate in the present Parliament, to resume their places, on condition of signing an Instrument, called the Engagement, by which "they rejected all concessions made by the King in the treaty of Newport; approved of all the proceedings against him; signed and engaged themselves to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, as established without King or House of Lords." By this Engagement were excluded all the Royalists, and the Presbyterians, who were the most rigid observers of the Covenant. But however, a good number of the latter signed, and took their seats in the House, being either less scrupulous than their brethren, or in hopes to recover some influence in the Parliament. Notwithstanding, those who were known to be most inclined against the Independents, were excluded by the Committee. Edmond Ludlow, a member of this Committee, freely owns in his Memoirs, that an expedient was found to admit only those, from whom it was believed, there was no danger (4).

The Prince of Wales received at the Hague the melancholy news of the tragical death of his Father, and immediately assumed the title of King, being then eighteen years of age. Within two or three days, the States-General, the States of Holland, and the Ministers of the Hague (5), paid him their compliments of condolence. He caused those of his Father's Council, who attended him to be sworn of his Privy-Council, with the addition of only one person (6). He had no sooner established his Council, than he received a letter from the Queen his mother, who, after expressions of her extreme affliction, advised him to retire into France, and form no Council till she had spoke with him, but her advice came too late. Probably, the Queen designed to govern her Son, as she had governed his Father, though the power of the new King was insignificant. His condition was deplorable, not having where withal to maintain his household, or any table but that of the Prince of Orange his Brother-in-law, and subsisting entirely by his assistance, which too could not last very long. The States of Holland, foreseeing the Parliament would shortly solicit the King's removal out of their dominions, had been very glad to be freed, by his voluntary retreat, from the necessity of desiring him to depart. Some of the States Deputies were even of opinion, to prevent the desires of the Parliament. The King was informed of this disposition, and wished to be gone, but knew not whither. He had been ill received in France, whilst his Father was alive, and had no reason to expect a better reception. He knew too well the Queen Regent and Cardinal Mazarin, to imagine, they would prefer his friendship to that of the new Commonwealth of England. So, though he had resolved to withdraw into France, it could have been but for a very short space. On the other hand, he had no great inclination to be with the Queen his Mother, knowing, she would hold him in a sort of servitude, which he could neither brook, nor avoid without a quarrel. Ireland alone seemed to promise him an honorable retreat, by reason of the situation of affairs in that Kingdom, which it is necessary to describe.

In the year 1646, the Marquis of Ormond by express orders from the King concluded a peace with the Irish Rebels, in hopes of receiving sufficient forces to drive from that Island the English Parliamentarians and the Scots. But however advantageous this peace was to the Catholic Religion, the Pope's Nuncio did not think fit to consent to it. The pretence was, that the Catholics found in it neither sufficient advantages, nor security. But the true reason was, that by this peace he would have lost all his credit, since the Marquis was to be acknowledged Governor by the Irish. He caballed therefore with such success among the People, that, not only they deserted the Marquis, but also by their insults obliged him to retire to Dublin, unprovided of every thing to defend that capital, which they were preparing to besiege. In this extremity, he chose rather to deliver Dublin and Drogheda to the Parliament, than see them fall into the hands of the rebels. He capitulated therefore with the Parliament, and surrendered these two places to Colonel Jones, who took possession the 17th of June 1647. After that the Marquis withdrew

(1) When Sentence passed, That they should all lose their Heads, Sir John Owen made a low reverence, and humbly thanked them: And being asked by a Stander by, what he meant? He said aloud, "It was a very great honour to a poor Gentleman of Wales, to lose his Head with such noble Lords; and swore a great Oath, That he was afraid they would have hanged him." Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 206.

1649. into England, where he had frequent leave to visit the King, then a prisoner of the army, till at last he was forced to pass into France.

After the Marquis had quitted Ireland, the Nuncio exercised a tyranny, which grew intolerable to the Irish. They therefore sent to the Queen and Prince then at Paris, that they were disposed to shake off the Nuncio's yoke, and if the Marquis of Ormond were sent to them with a supply of arms and ammunition, they would put him at the head of an army capable of expelling all the King's enemies out of the Island. The Nuncio had notice of this plot, and excommunicated the authors, but for this once, he proved not the strongest. He was forsaken by all his adherents, and even forced to ask as a favour, the liberty to withdraw.

The Marquis of Ormond long waited at Paris for the performance of a promise made him by the Cardinal, of a supply of money, arms and ammunition. But finding at last, he was only amused, he departed without any assistance, and arrived in Ireland the beginning of October 1648. Three months after, he concluded a new treaty with the Grand Council of the Irish assembled at Kilkenny (1). At the same time the process was forming in England against the King. But this peace was not general. Owen Roe O'Neale who commanded in Ulster rejected it, because, as he pretended, it was not advantageous enough to the Catholic Religion. Much time was spent to gain him, without success. At last, the Marquis of Ormond, not to lose the opportunity of making progress in Ireland, while the Parliament was erecting their new Commonwealth, resolved to take no farther notice of O'Neale, but act singly, with the army which the Council of Kilkenny had at their disposal. He put himself therefore at the head of this army, and advancing towards Dublin, took Dundalk, Newry, Trim, Drogheda, and some other towns and castles, which facilitated his intended siege of Dublin. On the other hand, Prince Rupert, Admiral for the King, being pursued by the Parliament's fleet, put into King'sale, where he was secure, and in a condition to favour the Marquis of Ormond's designs. This disposition of affairs made the King judge that Ireland was a convenient retreat, where at the head of an army, he might make himself master of Dublin, and then of the whole Island. After which he hoped, that with his Irish succours and his friends in England, he might recover his throne. But news from Scotland made him suspend his resolution of going to Ireland. And this it will be necessary to explain.

Since Cromwell's expedition into that Kingdom, after the defeat of Duke Hamilton, the face of affairs was entirely changed. The Marquis of Argyle, with all the rigid Covenanters who opposed the war against England, had regained the advantage they had lost. The new Parliament had declared incapable of all employments, those who were concerned in the Engagement formed by Duke Hamilton, and the Kirk had excommunicated them: so that they were considered as enemies of God and the State. Of this number were William Earl of Lanrick, Brother of Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Lauderdale, and many others, who formed a faction, which I shall call Hamiltonians, and which was entirely crushed. By this revolution Scotland remained united with England, so long as the English Parliament continued Presbyterian, that is, to the 6th of December, 1648.

The revolution in England, upon the army's expelling the Presbyterian members from the Parliament, to leave only Independents, changed the interests of Scotland. The Independents mortally hated the Scots on account of their attachment to the Covenant, and these again looked upon the Independents as enemies, no less formidable than the Royalists. This might have sunk the credit of Argyle, which partly subsisted upon his friendship with Cromwell and Vane, the chiefs of the Independents. But the Scots had a confidence in him, because in religion he was an approved Presbyterian, though in politics he leaned to the republican scheme. When the Parliament of England had erected a Court of Justice for the trial of the King, the Scots found themselves extremely embarrassed. To suffer the Independents to remain masters of England after the death of the King, which was visibly their design, could not but be very disadvantageous to them. They perceived, that a Parliament so composed would disregard Scotland, and infallibly ruin the Covenant between the two Kingdoms, which it was of the utmost importance for the Scots to maintain, because the Presbyterians might possibly one day recover the ground they had lost. But on the other hand, they could not take arms for the King without manifest danger. After their late loss, they were hardly able to raise another army, to fight the Independents; and though they had done it, they would not have saved the King's life. They therefore resolved to show the English and all Europe, that they highly disapproved the proceedings of the Parliament of England, which was all they could do on this occasion.

Pursuant to this resolution, Commissioners were sent to London, where they arrived the beginning of January 1648-9, and presented a Memorial to the Parliament, setting forth the reasons which ought to divert them from their purpose of trying the King. But this Memorial produced no effect. At last, after the King had been twice brought before the High-Court of Justice, they gave, in their protestation, in which they put them in mind, "That they had, near three weeks before, represented to them, what endeavours had been used for taking away the King's life, and for the change of the fundamental Government of the Kingdom, and introducing a sinful and ungodly Toleration in matters of Religion; and that therein they had expell'd their thoughts, and fears, of the dangerous consequences that might follow thereupon; and that they had also earnestly pressed, that there might be no farther proceeding against his Majesty's person, which would certainly continue the great distractions of the Kingdom, and involve them in many evils, troubles, and confusions; but that by the free counsels of both Houses of Parliament of England, and with the advice and consent of the Parliament of Scotland, such course might be taken in relation to his Majesty, as might be for the good and happiness of both Kingdoms; both having an unquestionable, and undoubted right in his person, as King of both; which duly considered, they had reason to hope, that it would have given a stop to all farther proceedings against his Majesty's person. But now understanding, that after the imprisonment and exclusion of divers Members of the House of Commons, and without, and against the consent of the House of Peers, by a single Act of their own, and theirs alone, power was given to certain persons of their own Members of the army, and some others, to proceed against his Majesty's person, in order whereunto he had been brought before that extraordinary new Court; they did therefore, in the name of the Parliament of Scotland, for their vindication from false aspersions and calumnies, declare, That though they were not satisfied with his Majesty's late concessions in the treaty at Newcastle, in the Isle of Wight, especially in the matters of Religion, and were resolved not to crave his restoration to his Government, before satisfaction should be given by him to that Kingdom; yet they did all unanimously with one voice, not one Member excepted, disclaim the least knowledge of, or occasion to the late proceedings of the army here against the King; and did sincerely profess, that it would be a great grief to their hearts, and lie heavy upon their spirits, if they should see the trusting his Majesty's person to the two Houses of the Parliament of England, to be made use of to his ruin, contrary to the declared intentions of the Kingdom of Scotland, and solemn professions of the Kingdom of England: And to the end that it might be manifest to the world, how much they did abominate and detest so horrid a design against his Majesty's person, they did, in the name of the Parliament and Kingdom of Scotland, declare their dissent from the said proceedings, and the taking away his Majesty's life; protesting, that as they were altogether free from the same, so they might be free from all the miseries, evil consequences, and calamities, that might follow thereupon to the distracted Kingdoms."

The Parliament answered this Protestation, but after the King's death, saying, "They had heretofore told them, what power this nation had in the fundamentals of Government: That if Scotland had not the same power and liberty, as they went not about to confine them, so they would not be limited by them; but leaving them to act in their's as they should see cause, they resolved to maintain their own liberties, as God should enable them. And as they were very far from imposing upon them, so they should not willingly suffer impositions from them, whilst God gave them strength or lives to oppose them." They said, "The answer they made to their first and second letter was, that after a long and serious deliberation of their own intrinsic power and trust, (derived to them by the providence of God, through the delegation of the people) and upon the like considerations, of what themselves and the whole nation had suffered, from the misgovernment and tyranny of that King, both in peace, and by the wars; and considering, how fruitless, and full of danger and prejudice the many addresses to him for peace had been, and being conscious how much they had provoked and tempted God, by the neglect of the impartial execution

1649. "of Justice, in relation to the innocent blood spilt, and mischief done, in the late wars, they had proceeded in such a course of justice against that man of bloods, as they doubted not the just God (who is no respecter of persons) did approve, and would countenance with his blessings upon the nation; and though perhaps they might meet with many difficulties, before their liberties and peace were settled, yet they hoped they should be preserved from confusion, by the good will of him who dwelt in the bush, which burned and was not consumed; and that the course they had taken with the late King, and meant to follow towards others, the capital enemies of their peace, was, they hoped, that which would be for the good and happiness of both nations; of which, if that of Scotland would think to make use, and vindicate their own liberty and freedom, (which lay before them, if they gave them not away) they would be ready to give them all neighbourly and friendly assistance, in the establishing thereof; and desired them to take it into their most serious consideration, before they espoused that quarrel, which could bring them no other advantage, than the entailing upon them, and their posterities, a lasting war, with all the miseries which attended it, and slavery under a tyrant and his issue."

Shortly after, the Scotch Commissioners were recalled. But just after their departure, an answer was in their name presented to the Parliament, which charged the fitting Members with unfaithfulness, breach of promises and oaths, and other things very offensive. This was so ill received by the Parliament, that they ordered them to be arrested on the road, and put under guard, till it should be known whether they were avowed by their Principals. But, the Scotch Parliament justifying them, and complaining of the violation of the law of nations violated in their persons, they were immediately discharged.

In so nice a juncture, the Scots had but two ways to prevent their falling into a dangerous anarchy. They were either, with the English, to change their Government into a Commonwealth, or else acknowledge the eldest Son of the late King for their Sovereign. But each of these ways had its difficulties. A Republican Government was directly contrary to their ancient Constitution, the two Covenants, and the inclination of the People. Besides, it was not seen what advantage could accrue to the nation from such a change. The second way was likewise very embarrassing, considering the circumstances of Scotland for many years past. Had James I. and Charles I. not invaded the privileges of Scotland, by introducing the Religion of England, contrary to the inclinations of the People: Had the differences between Charles I. and his Scotch Subjects produced no civil war: Had not the treaty which ended that war, and restored to the Scots their ancient Religion, been extorted from the King: Had not the invincible distrust of the Scots, with regard to Charles I. armed them to lessen his power in England, and disable him to revoke his concessions to Scotland: Had not the Scots sworn two Covenants, the one national, and the other common, to both nations, to maintain Presbyterianism: Had these things, I say, never happened, the Scots might, nay, ought to have acknowledged for Sovereign the next heir of the Crown, according to the immemorial custom of Scotland. But in the recognition of this new King, the maintenance of their Laws, their Privileges, their Religion, was concerned. Herein lay the difficulty, for the accession of a new King to the Crown, was no reason to oblige them to relinquish things, which had cost them a ten years war. They knew, Prince Charles, eldest Son of the late King, had the same principles as his Father, concerning Religion, and civil Government; and had never entertained, nor did now entertain, any persons about him, but what were mortal enemies to their Nation and Religion. Wherefore, in receiving him for King without any previous condition, they ran the risk of being replunged into their former state under Charles I., who by artifices, and, as they thought, by deceit, and at last by open violence, had undertaken to reduce the Kirk of Scotland to a perfect Conformity with the Church of England. As therefore, agreeably to the laws and customs of the Kingdom, it was natural to acknowledge for Sovereign him, to whom the Crown was to devolve, it was no less proper, in the present juncture, to take care to preserve what they had with so much difficulty recovered. Was it reasonable for them, to deliver themselves to the mercy of a young Prince, yet a stranger to them, and cause their peace and happiness to depend on his sole will, notwithstanding their suspicions, that he had no more affection for them than his Father? Nevertheless, as his affairs were almost desperate, they imagined, the offer of their Crown, might engage him to become a good Scot, and dismiss his English counsellors, who were not proper for Scotland; in a word, would think himself very happy to recover one of his Kingdoms, and see himself in the same state in which his ancestors were, before his Grand-father's accession to England. They resolved, therefore, to acknowledge and proclaim him, but however with restrictions, which left them at liberty to capitulate with him. The Proclamation was thus worded:

"The Estates of Parliament presently (1) convened in this second session of this second triennial Parliament, by virtue of an Act of the Committee of Estates, who had power and authority from the last Parliament, for convening the Parliament; considering, that so far as the King's Majesty, who lately reigned, is, contrary to the dissent and protestation of this Kingdom, removed by a violent death; and that by the Lord's blessing, there is left unto us a righteous heir, and lawful successor, Charles Prince of Scotland and Wales, now King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland; We the Estates of the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland, do therefore most unanimously and cheerfully, in recognition and acknowledgment of his just right, title, and succession to the Crown of these Kingdoms, hereby proclaim and declare to all the world, That the said Lord and Prince Charles is, by the providence of God, and by the lawful right of undoubted succession, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, whom all the Subjects of this Kingdom are bound, humbly and faithfully to obey, maintain, and defend, according to the national Covenant, and the solemn League and Covenant betwixt the two Kingdoms, with their lives and goods, against all deadly enemies, as their only righteous Sovereign Lord and King."

"And because his Majesty is bound by the Law of God, and the fundamental laws of this Kingdom, to rule in righteousness and equity, to the honour of God, the good of Religion, and the wealth of his People: It is hereby declared, That before he be admitted to the exercise of his royal power, he shall give satisfaction to the Kingdom, in those things that concern the security of Religion, the unity betwixt the Kingdoms, and the good and peace of this Kingdom, according to the national Covenant, and the solemn League and Covenant, for which end we are resolved, with all possible expedition, to make our humble and earnest addresses to his Majesty. For the testification of all which, We the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland, publish this our acknowledgment of his just rights, title, and succession to the Crown of these Kingdoms, at the Market-cross at Edinburgh, with all usual solemnities in like cases, and ordain his royal name, portrait, and seal, to be used in the publick writings and judicatories of this Kingdom, and in the Mint-house, as was usually done to his royal predecessors, and command this act to be proclaimed at all the Market-crosses of the royal Burghs, and to be printed, that none may pretend ignorance."

When the proclamation was published, the Council dispatched Sir Joseph Douglas, to give the King notice of it, and the States sent also two Commissioners (2), only to inform him of what had been acted in his favour, but without any order or instruction to treat with him. Before the conditions on which he was to be invested with the royal authority were proposed to him, it was necessary to know, if he would accept the Crown upon terms not yet known, but easy to be guessed (3). The Commissioners found the King at the Hague, where there arrived at the same time, but in another Ship, the Earls of Lanrick and Lauderdale, and some time after, the Earl of Montrose also from France. When the late King, after his retreat to the Scotch army, ordered Montrose to lay down his arms, he retired into Germany, and served in the Emperor's army. Afterwards he went into France, where the Queen and Prince of Wales gave him a reception very different from what he expected, after his great services in Scotland. This coldness was owing to his arrival in France, at the very time the Queen was using her endeavours to persuade the King her Husband, to throw himself upon the Presbyterians and Scots, and grant all their demands, imagining, he had no other refuge. It was therefore no proper season to caress a man, who was extremely hated in Scotland. He had been very successful in serving the King, but had used his advantages with such barbarity, that he had been degraded by the Parliament, and excommunicated by the Kirk; so that in Scotland he was considered as an enemy to the nation, and to Presbyterianism. As his residence in France was very disagreeable, he no sooner heard of the 1649. death of Charles I., then he repaired to the Hague to offer his service to the new King. In his return, were some Scottish Lords and Gentlemen attached to his fortune.

The King received very coldly the news of his being proclaimed, by reason of the restriction in the Proclamation. There was however nothing strange in it, since the Scots pretended only to require what had been asked of Charles I. agreeably to their Covenant, and the Covenant of the two Kingdoms. But the King and his Council, it seems, were persuaded, that the Scots had not the least right to exact such conditions. That is to say properly, the Scots in their recognition of the new King, ought at the same time to acknowledge the injustice of their Covenants, and depart from all their pretensions. These were two contraries which they thought to be irreconcilable, namely, That the Scots should own the King's undoubted right, and yet desire to capitulate with him. In a word, they pretended that the transactions of the last ten or twelve years, ought to be entirely buried in oblivion. Charles I. Charles II. and their Counsellors, were prepossessed with an opinion which often deceived them, namely, that there was no mean between an absolute attachment to the King, and a total enmity to him. The Lord Clarendon's History abounds with instances of this prepossession. But to confine myself to the present occasion, this illustrious Historian in representing the Scottish Nation, as animated with a just indignation against the English Parliament, for the King's death, would infer, that Scotland was inclined to accept the Prince his Son for successor without any condition. But as this did not happen, he ascribes it to the artifices and credit of the Marquiss of Argyle. He says, The Marquiss would have been glad to prevent the King's being proclaimed, but as he durst not oppose the general sentiment of his Country, he was forced to consent to it. According to him, the Marquiss of Argyle was the sole cause of the restriction in the Proclamation. This supposes the Proclamation to have been the general sense of the people, and the restriction the effect of Argyle's intrigues. But if this restriction was agreeable to the interests and sentiments of the ruling party, as I have shown, why is it ascribed to the Marquiss alone? Was it impossible for the people of Scotland to acknowledge King Charles II. without an entire confidence in him? But the Scots acted with him only in the same manner as they acted with his Father, as appears in the Covenant itself, wherein they shewed an extreme distrust of the late King, even when they engaged to defend his person and rights. The restriction therefore contained nothing new, or extraordinary. It was a natural consequence of the troubles begun in 1637.

However this be, Charles believed, that no great regard was due to what had yet been done for him in Scotland. He understood, that in the intended capitulation, things would be demanded which he had resolved not to grant, as the confirmation of the Covenant and the Presbyterian Government. He wished however to justify his disinclination to Scotland, by the advice and opinion of the Scottish Lords who were with him at the Hague. For this purpose he would have had them appear together before his Council, and upon being consulted, dissuade him from going to Scotland, and the Council thereupon form their resolution. The Marquiss of Montrose approved of this proceeding; but the Earl of Lantherdale, and the Earl of Lanrick who took the title of Duke Hamilton, on hearing at the Hague the tragical death of his Brother, would not consent to it. They thought it too nice a proceeding, for Scottish Lords to appear before an English Council. By this the Earl of Traquair had been ruined. On the other hand, they were so enraged against the Marquiss of Montrose, that they would have no communication with him. When the King found he could not bring them together to consult upon this subject, he declared however, he would not go into Scotland, and persisted in his resolution for Ireland. Thus, upon a bare information that Scotland would not receive him without conditions, he resolved to refuse the Crown of that Kingdom. And, what is more, he gave commission to the Marquiss of Montrose to raise forces in Germany, and make a descent upon Scotland. So, receiving with acknowledgment, the offer made him by the Scots, he ordered a war to be levied upon them, as upon enemies, because they refused to admit him for their Sovereign, without a previous engagement. Nothing is more proper to demonstrate the necessity of the precautions taken by the Scots, though some Historians are pleased to represent them as very unjust.

The King could not reside any longer in Holland, where it was intimated to him, that the Scots were under, of a quarrel with the new Commonwealth of England, made his stay there very unwelcome. Besides, they received advice, the Parliament was to send an Agent, to propose between the two Commonwealths a strict alliance; and this affair was not to be negotiated whilst the King remained at the Hague. This Agent, named Dorffbus, arrived indeed before the King left the place. But the same evening that he came to the Town, as he was at supper in his Inn, with some other persons, six Scots of the Marquiss of Montrose's retinue entered the room, and dragging him from the Table, murdered him (1). The Affairs were neither arrested, nor immediately pursued; and though afterwards some pains were taken to apprehend them, the Scots showed on that occasion a great regard for the King, which offended the Parliament. Nevertheless, the King knew, after this action, there was no remaining at the Hague, and the Prince of Orange advertised him, that he would be desirous to depart. He therefore sent his heavy baggage and some of his Domesticks to Ireland, with a resolution to follow them, after he had paid a visit to his Mother in France. But as he was not yet ready, he prevented the ungrateful compliment he was to receive, by presenting himself to the States a Memorial of the state of his affairs, and asking their opinion, whether he ought to go for Ireland or Scotland. The States observing he was about to depart, thought it not convenient to press him, and thereby he gained time to be prepared.

While the King was deliberating at the Hague, concerning the offer from Scotland, the States of that Kingdom were settling the terms on which he was to be received, not doubting his inclination and readiness to accept the offered Crown. But he had friends in Scotland, who, better informed of his sentiments, resolved to disturb the publick deliberations, by an insurrection, in hopes that a happy success would cause the King to be admitted without any condition. With this view Middleton, Monroe, the Gordons and others, assembled some forces in the North, and seized the Town of Inverness. But the Parliament having before received intimation of their design, had already raised forces, which immediately marched to the north, under Straughan and Kerr, and dispersed the mutineers before they could assemble all their forces.

Though the King had firmly resolved to go into Ireland, it was impossible for him to execute his design, by reason of the turn in his affairs in that Island. After the Parliament was become master of Dublin, it had been often moved in the House, to send a powerful reinforcement to Ireland: but the opposite interests of the Presbyterians and Independents hindered the taking any resolution. The first were for sending Sir William Waller to command there, and the latter were as earnest for Major-General Lambert. The division between the Parliament and Army which arose quickly after, brought new obstacles to this affair. At last, the revolt of Wales, the insurrections in other Counties, and the preparations of the Scots to invade England, discharged all thoughts of Ireland. If, in this interval, the Irish could have come to an union amongst themselves, and have joined the Marquiss of Ormond, they might have expelled the Parliament's forces, and rendered themselves masters of the whole Kingdom. But their divisions hindered them from improving so favorable an opportunity. It was not, as I observed, till the end of the year 1643, that they made peace with the Marquiss of Ormond, and the opposition of O Neale kept the Marquiss from taking the field till April 1649, when the King was dead, and the Government of England modelled into a Commonwealth.

The union of the Irish with the Royalists, the progress of the Marquiss of Ormond, the extreme weakness of the Parliament's party in that nation, brought at the last the House to a resolution of sending thither a good army, with all possible diligence. Waller, who was a Presbyterian, was no longer considered as a proper General to serve the Parliament; and Lambert, till then supported by Cromwell, was now supplanted by him. Cromwell believed, the Government of Ireland was a post not unworthy of himself, and so managed by his intrigues, that he was unanimously chosen to fill the dignity of Lord-Lieutenant of that Kingdom. But before his troops could be ready for that expedition, he had a difficulty to overcome, which might have had dangerous consequences.

Besides the Cavaliers and Presbyterians, the Parliament had other enemies, who only waited an opportunity to declare, and were in the army itself. These were the Levellers, who were dissatisfied, for that after they had

(1) He was Doctor of the Civil Law, born in Dorset in Holland, and bred at Leiden, but afterwards lived long in London, having been received into Gray's Inn College, as a Doctor of the Law, which are endowed for Publick Lectures in that Society; and had been from the beginning of the Troubles, in the service of the King's Army. The Lord Clarendon says, they were Scots, and Dependents upon the Marquiss of Montrose, but misrepresents him, Tam. 3. p. 229. But Whitelock says, That they were twelve English Cavaliers who dashed him in several places, and cut his Throat, one of them lying at the same time, 'Twas done one of the King's Judges. Whitelock, p. 401. Ludlow says, They were English and Scots, Tam. 1. p. 291.

1649. served as instruments to ruin the Presbyterian Parliament, they were not only disregarded, but even called seditious and rebels. This occasioned their assembling upon Cromwell's being appointed to command in Ireland, under a pretended necessity of inquiring what troops were proper to serve in that Kingdom (1). To that end they met at Busford to the number of five thousand; and without any precaution continued there, pretending a promise from Cromwell, that no part of the army should approach within ten miles. But Raynolds, by the command of General Fairfax, unexpectedly fell upon them with five or six thousand men, and gave them an entire defeat. Nine hundred Horse, and four hundred Foot were sent prisoners to London, and some of them executed. Others obtained their pardon by Cromwell's mediation. This affair being thus happily ended, the army was prepared which Cromwell was to lead into Ireland.

While this army was assembling, the Marquis of Ormond approached Dublin to besiege it. Whereupon, Cromwell immediately sent about three thousand men to reinforce the garrison which was very weak. Mean while, as he believed he could not arrive soon enough to save that city, he resolved to land his army in Munster, where he hoped to find no obstacle, because he knew, the Lord Inchiquin, President of that Province, was departed with his English troops, to reinforce the army under the Marquis of Ormond. But the Marquis having notice of his intention, immediately dispatched the Lord Inchiquin with the forces under his command to prevent his landing, by which he considerably weakened his army. He however continued his march, and began the blockade of Dublin about the middle of June. He stayed some time at Finglas, five miles from Dublin, in expectation of fresh troops, and at last passed the river, and posted himself at Rahbinnis, to lay the siege in form. While he was in this camp, the succours sent by Cromwell arrived in Dublin. A few days after, the Marquis of Ormond resolved to repair an old castle, which by its situation was proper to hinder any fresh relief from entering the Town. Then Colonel Jones the Governor, who from a lawyer was become a good officer, perceiving how much these fortifications might annoy him, resolved to endeavour to prevent their being finished. For that purpose he put the garrison under arms in the night, and at break of day making a fall, marched directly to the castle, and carried it sword in hand. This happy success caused him to advance towards the enemy's camp. He met by the way a body of Horse, which stopped him some time. But this body being dispersed, brought such terror to the Irish army, that they fled in confusion without striking a blow. The Marquis of Ormond was forced to follow them, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemies. After this defeat, he was obliged to retire to some distance, to wait for the succours, he had been promised.

Cromwell informed of this good success whilst he was imbarcking his army, altered his design, and instead of going to Munster, failed to Dublin, where he safely arrived about the middle of August [with about fifteen thousand men.] When the Marquis of Ormond knew that Cromwell was at Dublin, he retired to a still greater distance, and left in Drogheda a numerous garrison (2), under the command of Sir Arthur Aston, an officer of reputation, who had been Governor of Reading, and afterwards of Oxford. About the same time Londonderry, the most considerable city in the north of Ireland, which was besieged by the King's forces, was relieved by a fallly made by Sir Richard Coote, much in the same manner as Dublin was by Jones.

From what has been seen, it is manifest the King could not venture into Ireland, where he had no other succour to carry but his person, while Cromwell was assembling his army on the coast, and still less, after Ormond's defeat. But as, on the other hand, he was looked on with no good eye in France, where, since his arrival, the Court had made him no offers of service, he resolved to withdraw into the Isle of Jersey, as the only place where he could hope to be favorably received (3). He retired therefore to that Isle with his brother the Duke of York, and his small Court, where he continued some months (4).

The commotions raised by the King's friends in Scotland being appeased, the committee of estates assembled to prepare the conditions to be demanded of the King. It seems, they were not informed in Scotland of the King's sentiments, since they continued to deliberate upon that subject, which doubtless they would not have done, had they been acquainted with his resolution. In all probability, as the estates had not yet expressly invited him to come and receive the Crown, he did not think himself obliged to communicate his thoughts to them, and if the envoys of the estates and council had received an answer from him, it was too general for any thing to be inferred from it. However this be, the committee of estates having learned, the King was in Jersey, sent Mr. George Windram to acquaint him, they were desirous to treat with him concerning his establishment in Scotland: but as the Isle of Jersey was neither safe, nor commodious, he was desired to name some town in the Low Countries, where he might receive their commissioners. For this purpose, it was required of him as a preliminary, without which there could be no negotiation to acknowledge the authority of the present Parliament, and particularly of the two last sessions. Windram left Edinburgh the 25th of September, but was not with the King till towards the end of October, being detained by contrary winds: so that the King was fully informed of what had passed in Ireland, where Cromwell having taken Drogheda by assault, had put the garrison to the sword, and was continuing his progress with wonderful rapidity. This news made the King look upon Scotland with another eye than before. He knew, he should be unwelcome both to France and Holland. From Ireland he was entirely excluded, nor could Jersey long afford him subsistence. Besides, he was told, the Parliament had given orders for a fleet to reduce that Island, which was not in a condition of defence. Scotland therefore was the only place where he could find safety and subsistence. For this reason, he received Windram very graciously, and named Breda for the reception of the Scotch commissioners, promising, he would be there the 15th of the following March. It was not however without some uneasiness that he came to this resolution. Besides his little affection for the Scots, whom he regarded as the principal authors of his father's misfortunes, not one counsellor advised him to put himself into their hands, though it was impossible to direct him to another retreat. So it was meer necessity which caused him to resolve to listen to the propositions the Scots were to make him. That this was his only motive, can hardly be doubted, when it is considered, that on the 30th of January 1649-50, he writ to the Marquis of Montrose, that the Scots had sent Windram to him, and that their Commissioners were to repair to Breda, in March to treat with him. Wherefore, he pressed him to hasten his preparations for a descent into Scotland before this affair should be settled, in order if it was possible, and should please God to favour him with success, to prevent the conclusion thereof (5).

Windram being returned with the King's answer, the committee of Estates laboured incessantly to finish the propositions to be sent to the King. The draught was laid before the Parliament, and after some amendments, ordered to be communicated to the general assembly of the Kirk, where it was approved. Hence it appears, that these propositions were settled with the common consent, since they had the concurrence of both Parliament and Kirk, though some have been pleased to ascribe them solely to the Marquis of Argyle, as if they were more agreeable to his interest than that of the Kingdom. After this, the Parliament and general Assembly named Commissioners to carry them to the King. These Commissioners arrived at Breda at the time appointed (6), and presented the conditions to him, on which the Scots would admit him to the exercise of the regal power. They consisted of these four articles:

1. That all those who have been, and continue excommunicate by the Kirk of Scotland, may be removed from having any access to the Court.
2. That he would be pleased to declare, that he would by solemn oath under his hand and seal, allow the national Covenant of Scotland, the Solemn League and Covenant of Scotland, England and Ireland; and that he would prosecute the ends thereof in his royal station.
3. That he would ratify and approve all Acts of Parliament, enjoining the solemn League and Covenant, and establishing Presbyterian Government, the Directory of worship, the confession of Faith and Catechism in the Kingdom of Scotland, as they are already approved by the general assembly of the Kirk, and by the Parliament of that Kingdom, and that he would give his royal assent to the Acts of Parliament injoining the same in the rest of his dominions, and that he would observe the same in his own practice and family, and never make opposition therein, or endeavour any change thereof.

4. That he would consent and agree that all matters civil might be determined by the present and subsequent Parliaments of the Kingdom of Scotland, all matters ecclesiastical by the ensuing general Assemblies of the Kirk, as was formerly condescended and agreed to by his late father.

After hearing these conditions, the King demanded, whether these papers they had delivered to him, contained all the particulars which they had to propound or desire? Whether they had power to recede from any particular article, or to treat with him concerning the assistance of Scotland, to place him on the throne of England? They answered, their commission extended only to the offering of these propositions, and to receive either his consent or refusal.

These conditions, which to the Scots appeared very just, lawful, and absolutely necessary for the safety of Scotland, seemed to the King very hard and unreasonable. This contrariety will not appear strange, if it is considered, that the King and the Scots reasoned upon different principles, and with opposite views. And this it will not be improper to unfold.

The people of Scotland were perfwaded, they had been oppreffed by James VI. in the eftablifhment of Epifcopacy in Scotland by that Prince, which had been aboliſhed by the Reformation : That this had been effected by adreſs, by artifice, by violence, whilft corrupt Parliaments were employed to enact new Laws concerning Religion, without conſulting the Kirk, contrary to her will and exprels declarations : That Charles I. by a fraud ſupported with force, had inveſted himſelf with a power of ordering whatever he pleaſed in matters of Religion, by virtue of an act ſuppoſed by him to be granted by a plurality of voices, though it was rejected : That by this pretended power, he had not only reſtored Biſhops to their revenues and government in the Church, but alſo given them a juriſdiction more extenſive than ever : That he had eſtabliſhed a High-Commiſſion to ſupport this injuſtice, and entirely ſuppreſſed the Preſbyterial-afſembles. In a word, that he had changed the Presbyterian Government, eſtabliſhed by the Reformation, into an Hierarchy, exactly like that of the Church of England : That he had alſo attempted to impoſe upon them a Liturgy and Canons, unknown to their anceſtors, and to reduce the worſhip of the Church of Scotland, to a perfect conformity with that of England : That the people of Scotland, for their own preſervation, and the maintenance of their rights, fo manifeſtly invaded, had judged it proper to unite in a Covenant, intended for the preſervation of the King's juſt rights, and the privileges of the People and Kirk : That the King, not contented with what of right belonged to him, had twice made war upon his Scottiſh Subjects to maintain his uſurped power, and render Scotland dependent upon England : That this war had been ended by a treaty, to which the King would not have conſented, if he had not been forced to it by the affairs of England : That after this treaty he came into Scotland, where he granted his Subjects whatever they demanded, and even thoſe things which before he had haughtily and obſtinately reſuſed : That therefore it was to be ſuſpected, he had only accommodated himſelf to the times, till a favorable opportunity offered, to revoke his conſenſes : That it was not ſtrange the Scotts ſhould entertain this ſuſpicion, ſince the King, by the ſame conduct in England, had deſtroyed all confidence in him : That it was therefore abſolutely neceſſary to reduce him to a ſtate, which would remove all danger of his retracting : That to this end, the Scotts had made with the Engliſh a ſolemn League, as having the ſame common intereſt, and that the ſword had decided in favour of the allies, againſt the King : That notwithstanding this decision, the Scotts had never thought of withdrawing from the obedience due to the King, but only of obtaining other ſecurity than his bare word : That the tragical death of Charles I. had not changed the ſtate of affairs in Scotland, or procured them the ſo long deſired ſecurity : That they required no more of the new King, than they had a right to demand of his Father : That their deſires were not unjuſt, ſince they expected only to be maintained in the ſtate, which they enjoyed before the two laſt Kings had attempted to alter the eſtabliſhed Religion, according to their caprice, and the pleaſure of their Engliſh counſellers : That they had run all hazards to reſtore themſelves to the condition from whence they were fallen : That God having granted them a happy success, they saw no sufficient reason to oblige 1649.

them to desist, and expose their repose and Religion to the caprices of a young Prince, who was known to be of the same sentiments and principles as his Father and Grandfather: That the conditions offered him, limited not his Prerogative as King of Scotland, but only put it out of his power, to tread in the steps of the King his Father: That in offering him the Crown of Scotland, it was lawful to require, that he should govern according to the true interest of that Kingdom: That if these conditions appeared to him contrary to his interest with regard to England, he was at liberty to reject them; but his interest with respect to England, was not a good reason to engage the Scots to venture their happiness, in leaving him to govern as he pleased:
That it was not yet fifty years since James VI. became King of England, and that Charles I. having lost that Crown by his ill conduct, and Charles II. being utterly unable to recover it, he ought to esteem himself happy, that his Scottish Subjects had offered him the Crown of his ancient Kingdom, on the same terms it had been enjoyed by his ancestors for many ages; and that in becoming a good
Scott man, he would be restored to what his predecessors, Kings of Scotland, had formerly been: That it was not reasonable to suffer persons excommunicate, and conspirators against the State, in attempting, by force, to restore the late King, to approach the new King with their pernicious counsels, tending to sow division between him and his Subjects.

But the King reasoned upon other principles. The offer of the Crown of Scotland was no farther regarded by him, than as a means of restoring him to the throne of England; that was the principal object of his attention. He little cared to be King of Scotland, if he could not use the forces of that Kingdom to procure him the English Crown. Mean while, his power was to be so limited, that it should not be possible to receive any advantage from Scotland to that end. Those who were effected by him as his best friends, and had used their utmost endeavours to free his father and restore him to the enjoyment of his rights, were to be removed from his person and council, and yet these were the men he designed to employ for the recovery of England. In accepting the Crown of Scotland, he was to forget he had any just claim to England; he was to govern Scotland as his ancestors governed it before their accession to the English throne; that is to say, he was to look upon his English friends with continual distrust, and consequently renounce all hope of a re-establishment in England. He was to swear to the National Covenant, made against the King his father, the intent of which was to prevent for ever the introducing the Church-government and worship of England into Scotland, which alone in his opinion were lawful. He was to swear to the Covenant of the two Kingdoms, the sole design of which was to maintain Presbyterianism already established in England, which was an infallible way to make him lose all his friends. He was, lastly, not only to approve and protect Presbyterianism in the two Kingdoms, but also promise a sincere and constant profession of it himself. But this was directly contrary to his sentiments and conscience, since he hardly believed the Presbyterians to be any part of the Christian Church.

Hence it appears that the interests of the King and those of the Scots were no less opposite than during the life of Charles I. and that the same difficulties still subsisting, could be surmounted only by the arms or acquiescence of one of the parties. The King was unable to use force, and yet the terms to be imposed upon him appeared so hard, that he would have immediately rejected them, if he could have taken any other course. But his melancholy circumstances, not knowing where to subsist or even to be safe, obliged him, though very unwilling, to dissemble his repentment, and to treat with the Scotch Commissioners upon propositions which to him seemed most unjust. There were two Articles which he could not *d.*geit. The first was, the obligation to swear to the Covenant. He said, the Covenant was made for the Subjects, and not for the Prince, since the taker swore to be faithful to the King, and it was absurd to make him swear allegiance to himself. This objection would have been unanswerable, had the Covenant contained only this article. But there were others, in which it was said, the King was no less concerned than his Subjects. The second related to Religion. He was willing he said, to consent to the establishment of Presbytery in Scotland by Act of Parliament: but, as to his own person, he could not with justice be required to renounce the Religion for which the King his Father had died a Martyr; however he would content himself with only three Chaplains to celebrate Divine Service in his preference after the manner of the Church of England. But all he could allege was ineffectual; and the Commissioners had not power to recede from any article. This had the Parliament of England offered to treat with his Father, 1650. without leaving him other liberty than to accept or refuse their propositions. But tho' the King perceived it would be to no purpose to dispute upon the articles, he desired however to prolong the negotiation as much as possible in hopes of good news from Scotland, where he knew the Marquis of Montrose would shortly make his appearance. This was his last refuge; and had the Marquis been attended with his former success, the treaty of Breda would soon have ended, since it was in the King's power to reject absolutely the offered conditions. But the Marquis's progress did not answer the King's expectations.

After that Lord had left the King at the Hague, he went into Germany to endeavour to raise forces and money, the King having only given him a bare commission without other assistance. The King of Denmark, as Charles's near relation, furnished him with a sum of money, and the English settled in Sweden assisted him to the utmost of their power. With this relief he was enabled to buy arms and ammunition, and to lift five hundred soldiers, which he sent in March to one of the Isles of Orkney. He followed them himself in April, and from thence repaired with his troops to Cathness in the north of Scotland. This was at the very time the Scottish Commissioners were with the King at Breda. As the King was informed that Montrose was now gone for Scotland, he waited the success of this expedition, before he would conclude with the Commissioners, whom he nevertheless entertained with hopes of granting their demands.

After the Marquis's arrival at Cathness, he seized a cattle where he might secure his arms and ammunition, and then writ to his friends to join him. At the same time he published a Manifesto, declaring, "That he was come with a commission from the King to protect his good Subjects; but with no design to obstruct the negotiation at Breda; on the contrary, he hoped to hasten the conclusion of it by means of his army. If the treaty succeeded, he should readily lay down his arms on the first command from his Majesty."

The Scottish Parliament then sitting at Edinburgh was surprized to hear of Montrose's arrival in that juncture, with the King's Commission. It was not difficult to perceive that, whatever was pretended, this was not to advance the treaty, but rather to obstruct it, and force the Parliament to desist from conditions which were thought necessary for the safety of the Kingdom. It may well be imagined, this tended not to breed a good opinion of the King's sincerity.

Mean while, as Montrose was very formidable, by reason of his former great success in favour of the late King, the Parliament gave immediate orders for raising, with all possible expedition, an army of six thousand men, under the command of David Leslie. 'Till this army was ready, Colonel Straughan was detached with three hundred Horse to the Northward, in order to awe the country, and prevent the King's friends from rising and joining Montrose. This precaution had a surprizing effect. The King's adherents, whether through fear of falling into the hands of this Cavalry, or because of the six thousand men which were to follow, durst not stir, and Montrose was joined only by some ill-armed and worse disciplined Highlanders. So, his little army, if it deserves that name, composed of soldiers of different nations, strangers to one another's language, and in a barren country, could make no great progress. Besides, as Montrose had no cavalry to send out for intelligence, he knew not what passed in other places, and particularly Straughan's march, vainly expecting the King's adherents to come and join him. To this ignorance was owing his being surprized by Straughan's little troop, which, after a long march, fell upon him when least expected. At the approach of the enemy, the Highlanders deserted and fled; the foreigners made more resistance, but were routed at last (1). The Marquis himself being forced to fly, threw away his Ribband and George, disguising himself like a peasant to prevent a discovery. He wandered some days in this habit, and at last put himself into the hands of a Gentleman, named Aston, who had formerly served under him, and promised to conceal him. But, whether through the hope of the reward published for taking him, or the fear of being rigorously punished if he did not discover him, it is certain, he delivered him to Lesley, who immediately sent him to Edinburgh (2). The Parliament now sitting resolved to try him themselves; and as, since his degradation, he was called only James Graham, and was universally hated, no regard was paid to his birth. He was condemned to be hanged on a gallows thirty foot high; with this addition to his sentence, that, after he was dead, his head should be severed from his body, and set on Edinburgh Talbooth; his arms and legs sent to four several Towns, to be exposed as a spectacle; and his body buried under the gallows. He met death with extraordinary courage, and before his execution, made a speech to the People, in which, far from owning himself worthy of death, he testified, on the contrary, an entire persuasion of the justice of the cause he had supported. He said that Charles I. died a Martyr, and assured the people, the new King would observe all his promises to the Scots, wherein he was as false a prophet as the Lord Capel had been in England. Thus fell the Marquis of Montrose, who had rendered himself famous by his great actions for the late King in Scotland, but withal, odious to his country-men, by his inhumanity to them, when he had the advantage.

The tragical death of the Marquis of Montrose disappointed all the King's hopes, who was thereby deprived of his last refuge. He complained loudly to the Commissioners of the execution of that Lord, during the negotiation, affirming it to be a breach of faith. He writ in the same strain to the committee of Estates, but was silenced by their answer, and told, it would be much better not to insist upon this affair. The answer imported, that Papers were found upon Montrose, which it was more for his honour to conceal than to publish. The King easily understood, that by this was meant his commission to the Marquis after the news of his being proclaimed, and his letter of the 30th of January, after the time and place of conference was fixed. This justified the Parliament of Scotland from breach of faith, of which he himself was not entirely guiltless.

The death of Montrose leaving the King without refuge or retreat, he at last accepted the conditions presented to him by the Commissioners. Only the signing of the Covenant was deferred till his arrival in Scotland, upon his promise however of compliance, in case it was judged proper to press him when he should be at Edinburgh. The Commissioners were willing to grant him this favor, knowing, the Estates would never desist from that article. It is certain, the King submitted to these conditions only because he had no other course to take, and it is, perhaps, no less certain, that he meant to observe them but whilst he should be forced. This plainly appears in the history of those times, penned by the King's adherents. For they could not forbear to think it strange that the King, when in Scotland, should be obliged to a strict observance of what he had promised by oath. As if his promise and oath had been only formalities, which were not to bind him.

When the King had signed the conditions, he went to Scheveling near the Hague, and embarked, being attended by Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Lautherdale, and some other Scots, who gave him hopes that his presence in Scotland would remove all suspicions, and that an exact observation of what he had promised would be dispensed with. But at his arrival, before he was suffered to land, the Covenant was so pressed upon him, that he could not avoid taking it. He had positively promised it at Breda, and no man durst advise him to break his word. This exactness of the Estates convinced Duke Hamilton and the Earl of Lautherdale, that it was not safe for them to appear publicly in Scotland. Wherefore, finding means to land with the King, they retired to their own estates, or their friends, in expectation of a more favourable juncture.

The Marquis of Argyle received the King with extraordinary reverence and outward marks of respect. But within two days, all his English domesticks were removed, except the Duke of Buckingham. Some were obliged to return into Holland, others withdrew at a distance from the Court, to friends who were willing to entertain them. This rigour at first appears very strange, and by some is so represented. But it must be considered, the Scots were for receiving the King on those terms only, on which they would have admitted his father, had he happily escaped from captivity, and retired into Scotland. Certainly they would never have suffered about him, men whose principles and maxims were directly opposite to the interests of Scotland, and who were the Kingdom's reputed enemies. Why then were they to repose more confidence in Charles II.? Precaution was not more necessary under the last, than under the present reign.

When the friends and confidants of the King were thus removed from his person, he saw himself in the hands of men whom he knew not, and whose principles were entirely different from those in which he had been educated; so that he was extremely uneasy, though outwardly he received all the respect due to his rank. What troubled him most, was the importunity of the Ministers, who thought it their duty to instruct him in the Presbyterian Religion, and scrupled not to brand the Hierarchy and worship of the Church of England with the name of Doctrine of De-

(1) There were about three hundred slain, and five hundred taken prisoners. Whitelock, p. 454.

1650. will. They pretended, the King's promise and oath to profess Presbyterianism obliged him to receive their instructions. His Embarrassment on this occasion was a natural consequence of the promise he had made, without intending to keep it. To be rid as well as he could of this trouble, he was present at their sermons and prayers, but with so little attention, that it was plainly against his will (1). The reluctance he shewed upon this article bred in the Scots a very ill-opinion of him, being persuaded, he had sworn against his conscience, and with an intention to break his promises when freed from restraint. It ought not therefore to seem strange, that they had no confidence in him, and that those who were at the Helm, imparted not to him all the affairs. He was not considered as a Prince attached to the interests and Religion of the Kingdom, but as intending to establish other maxims if it was in his power. But if the transactions of some years past, and the occasion of the troubles, be considered, it will not be thought so strange, that the Scots took precautions with regard to their new King, and refused him a confidence, which in that juncture, appeared to them very dangerous.

It was quickly perceived how necessary these precautions were, by the King's endeavours to reconcile to the State and the Church, those who had enter'd into the late Duke Hamilton's engagement to raise an army, which under colour of acting against the Independents, was designed to restore the late King to the Throne of England without any condition. The authors of that design had thereby plunged Scotland into a war not only unnecessary, but directly contrary to her interests. Besides, their ill conduct had occasioned the loss of a numerous army, and a great effusion of blood. What might not the Scots have added in aggravation of the crimes of the Hamiltonians, had they known the secret treaty made with the late King in the Isle of Wight, so contrary to the Covenant of both Kingdoms? It is not therefore strange, that men who had acted with views so opposite to the interest of the Kingdom, or at least of the prevailing party, were regarded by that party as enemies of the State and Religion. And yet these were the men for whom the King laboured so strenuously, under the pretence of procuring a happy union amongst his Subjects. But at the same time he clearly discovered his aversion to the maxims by which Scotland was then governed, and his intention to enable his friends to oppose the Marquis of Argyll, who was the head of the contrary faction and of the Government. That Lord easily fathomed the King's design. And therefore, whereas he had hitherto constantly attended him, he gradually withdrew himself from him, as from a secret enemy who only waited an occasion to ruin him.

While these things passed in Scotland, the Parliament of England were not idle. When they learned that Commissioners from Scotland were to confer with the King at Breda, they imagined, Charles would accept the Crown of Scotland on any terms, in order to use the forces of that Kingdom to invade England, in which they were not mistaken. This war, which the Parliament deemed unavoidable, could not but be very dangerous to the Independent party, if it was brought into England. The Independents, tho' uppermost, had no support but the army, with the Presbyterians, the Royalists and the City of London for their enemies. It was therefore very likely, that if the King entered England with a Scotch army, he would be joined by the Royalists, and favoured by the Presbyterians. To prevent therefore this danger, the Parliament resolved to carry war into Scotland. This resolution was founded entirely upon policy, forasmuch as the Parliament had no cause to complain of the Scots, who in recognizing for their Sovereign, the eldest Son of their late King, did not injure England. Nay, it was a consequence of the Covenant between the two Kingdoms, though manifestly violated by the English Parliament. But on this occasion, the Parliament believed themselves not bound to a scrupulous observance of the rules of equity, for fear of the prejudice with which such scruples might in time be attended. Interest therefore was solely regarded, which required, that the war should rather be carried into Scotland than expected in England.

After this resolution, Cromwell was hastily recalled out of Ireland to take the command of the army which was to act against Scotland. In the late Scotch invasion under Duke Hamilton, the behaviour of General Fairfax had given occasion to judge, that he would unwillingly accept of the conduct of this new war, which was really the case. Cromwell's success in Ireland had been such as the Parliament could have wished. After the taking Drogheda, he seized Kilkenny and many other places, and in a little time reduced the greatest part of the Island to the obedience of the Parliament. The Marquis of Ormond was little capable of resisting him, because of the division still reigning amongst the Irish. This division went so far that O'Neale had at last concluded a treaty with Monk one of the Parliament-Generals, commissioned by the Council of State. But the Parliament refused to ratify the treaty, as being too favorable to the Catholics, and therefore O'Neale had begun to treat with the Marquis of Ormond, and was upon the point of joining him, when his death prevented the execution of his design. His troops dispersing upon his death, were of no advantage to the Marquis of Ormond. In the mean time, Cromwell continued his conquests with surprising rapidity, and to prevent the agreement and junction of the Irish amongst themselves, he thought of an expedient, which succeeded. He published by Proclamation a permission to all the Irish officers to lift, in the service of foreign Princes, what soldiers they pleased of their own nation, with a promise to give them no disturbance or molestation. More than twenty-five thousand immediately chose to serve France and Spain, and afterwards a much greater number (2). This precaution prevented the Marquis of Ormond from bringing an army into the field capable to resist that of the Parliament. So, when Cromwell was recalled, the Irish were in so good condition, that his Son-in-law Ireton, whom he left there as his Lieutenant, had but little to do.

Cromwell being returned to London, took his seat in the Parliament, where, by order of the House, the Speaker thanked him for his late services. After this, the Scotch war being the most pressing affair, the Parliament caused Fairfax to be asked, whether he would take upon him the conduct of the war? He replied, If the Scots entered England with an army, he would endeavour to repel them; but desired to be excused from attacking them in their own Country. Some endeavours were used to convince him of the justice and necessity of this war, but without any success. Cromwell acted his part so well, that though he passionately wished to be commander in chief, he gave his opinion in favour of Fairfax, and pretended he should be well satisfied to serve as his Lieutenant. Fairfax perceived, that being a Presbyterian, (though he had but too faithfully served the Independents) the Parliament would have had no great confidence in him, and that the zeal shewn on his behalf was only ceremony. He therefore sent his commission to the House, which was cheerfully received, and an annual pension of five thousand pounds was settled on him in acknowledgment of his services. Immediately Cromwell was declared General of the armies of the Commonwealth, and to command in person, dispatched (3).

While the army, which was to act against Scotland, was raising, the Parliament appointed a Committee to draw up a Manifesto, concerning the intended war. This precaution appeared the more necessary, as the House was not ignorant, that the Cavaliers and Presbyterians would indutritiously represent this war, as the most unjust that ever was, since the Scots had given no provocation. The Committee employed about the Manifesto, being unwilling to publish the true reason of the war, namely, to support the Independents, contented themselves with supposing, that the Scots designed to force the English to acknowledge King Charles II, tho' hitherto they had not moved one step towards it. It was nevertheless, very likely the King would attempt to engage them in a rupture with the English Parliament; but there was no probability of success, considering his manifest aversion to become a good Presbyterian.

The Scots hearing of the preparations against them in England, raised an army with all possible diligence (4), and gave the command to General Lesley, not daring to trust the King for the reasons above-mentioned. He was even suffered to see this army but once, for fear of gaining the officers and soldiers by his intrigues. David Lesley formed his camp between Leith and Edinburgh, and fortified it with such intrenchments, that he was not to be attacked without manifest danger.

About the middle of July, Cromwell put himself at the head of the English army, consisting of eighteen or nineteen thousand men, and marched to the frontiers of Scotland.

where he published his Manifesto. As the enemy's army lay encamped near Edinburgh, he entered Scotland without any difficulty. But he found the country destitute of inhabitants, and every thing capable to furnish his army conveyed away; so that he was obliged to maintain it with supplies from his Fleet. He advanced, however, and came in sight of the enemy's army; but found it too well entrenched to be attacked. He chose therefore to retire towards Musselborough, whereupon Lesly detached a large body of Horse, which fell upon the English rear, commanded by Lambert, with some advantage (1). The day after, there was a sharp skirmish, in which the Scots beat some English regiments; but at last were repulsed to their camp with considerable loss. Then, Cromwell once more attempted, by his approach, to draw the Scotch army out of their intrenchments, but his endeavours were fruitless. At last, after the two armies had remained almost in fight several weeks, Cromwell, for want of provision and forage, was forced to retire. His design was to embark his Foot, and return into England with only his Horse. To execute this resolution, he marched towards Dunbar, where his fleet expected him, his army being much diminished, and reduced to about twelve thousand men.

The Scots, advertised of Cromwell's resolution, imagined, the English were seized with terror, and that a more favorable opportunity could not offer, to fight them, and therefore they left their camp to follow them closely. The first day, they encamped upon a hill, about a mile from Dunbar, so that it was impossible for Cromwell to embark his Foot, without exposing himself to the danger of a defeat. General Lesly was not for attacking the English, but only for watching an opportunity to engage them with advantage. But the clamours of the Ministers who were in his army, and promised a certain victory, as if by some revelation (2), obliged him the next day to draw nearer to the enemy. Cromwell, who observed them with a perspective glass, seeing them descend the hill, cried out, That God had delivered them into his hands. He immediately went to prayers, and then told some of his officers, that he had felt, in praying, such a repose in his mind, that he doubted not but God would give him the victory. Perhaps this was his real belief, or else an artifice to inspire his soldiers with courage, who were most of them fanatics. The two armies remained in fight all the rest of the day, Lesly still alleging some excuse to delay fighting. But in the night, Cromwell resolved to attack the Scots at break of day. It was his frequent and ever successful maxim, not to expect, but attack the enemy, without any regard to number, being persuaded, the assailants have always a great advantage.

This resolution being taken, he drew up his army in the night, and, not to be prevented, began the fight an hour before day. The Scotch Cavalry on the right wing behaved well at first, but were at last put to flight. The left wing fled, without charging once. Three regiments of Scotch Infantry fought with such bravery, that they were almost all slain on the spot, without offering to fly. The rest seeing themselves deserted by the Horse, fled in confusion, leaving the field, and an undoubted victory to the English. It is said, the Scots lost three thousand men (3), besides seven or eight thousand prisoners, with twenty seven pieces of cannon; and that the English lost but three hundred. The Scots, after their defeat, abandoned Leith and Edinburgh, of which Cromwell made himself master, but the Castle of Edinburgh held out till the end of December.

This misfortune to the Scots was advantageous to the King, as it obliged them to alter their behaviour to the Hamiltonians. When the army lately defeated at Dunbar was raised, great care was taken not to admit any who had been concerned in the Engagement of the late Duke Hamilton, or were suspected to be of the King's party. In a word, the rigid Presbyterians, who were then at the head of affairs, would have no society with those whom they called the Luke-warm, that is, men who were not sufficiently zealous for the Covenant. After the defeat at Dunbar, a new army was to be raised, to oppose Cromwell, who threatened Scotland with entire ruin the next spring. The Parliament was therefore convened at St. Johnstoun's, where the King had retired (4). But as a new army was not easily to be formed of the zealous, it was proposed in Parliament, to receive into this, those who had hitherto been called Luke-warm, and who offered their service to their country in its present distress. This affair being debated, the Parliament was forced to resolve, That all who had been excluded from places, should be allowed to produce proofs of their repentance, and then be employed in the service of their country. In consequence of this resolution, those who had till then opposed the Marquis of Argyle, who had wanted zeal for the Covenant, who had shewn an inclination for the King, who had ever been employed by Charles I., readily gave outward marks of their repentance, in a disavowal of their past conduct, and a reconciliation with the Kirk. After this, they were admitted, as well into the Parliament as to public employments, and especially to posts in the army to be raised. Hence the King at last obtained, what he had so passionately desired, namely, to see those who were attached to his interests, in a condition to serve him, when occasion should offer.

But the resolution of the Parliament, of which necessity had been either the motive or the pretence, was not agreeable to all. The Zealots could not bear the admission of Malignants (as they called them) to employments, under colour of a resolution obtained from the Parliament by intrigue and cabal, in the same manner as the levying an army had before been obtained, to serve against the interests of Scotland. They said, it was mocking God, to receive the guilty to a hypocritical repentance, in order to re-admit them to employments, from which they had been justly excluded. But it was answered, It was strange cruelty to remove from employments, men who offered their service to their country, at so critical a juncture, and had professed a repentance, for not having been sufficiently zealous for the common Cause. In a word, the first protested solemnly against the resolution of the Parliament, and formed a party called the Protestors, whilst those who adhered to it formed another, called the Resolutioners. Five western counties (5) joined the Protestors, and entering into an association, published a remonstrance, which being offered to the Parliament, was voted seditious. But this did not hinder several officers of reputation, as Strachan, Kerr, and some others, from adhering to the party of the Protestors.

It is certain, if the people of Scotland had been consulted, this resolution had never passed in the Parliament. The people were so attached to the Covenant, that there was no likelihood of their departing from their rigidness at once, in favour of persons who had not subscribed it, or scrupled to violate it. It is therefore very probable, this resolution was owing to the artifices and cabals of the enemies of Argyle, on pretence of the necessity of raising new forces. Nothing is a clearer evidence of its being contrary to the general sense of the people, than the condition of professing a repentance, required of all who were to be admitted to any employments. This shews a condescension for the people, who were persuaded, that a Luke-warmness for the Covenant, was the most heinous of crimes. Accordingly, it was publicly said, that the defeat at Dunbar was the just punishment of having called in the King, before any proofs were given of his repentance. This was the most general sentiment, though the Parliament had decided the contrary. But neither in Scotland nor England are the resolutions of Parliament to be always considered, as the sense of the nation. It is a defect in the constitution of both the States, that the Members of Parliament receive no instructions from their Electors. The moment they are met, they become masters and sovereigns of those by whom they are chosen, and palm upon the nation their own decisions for those of the publick, though they are often contrary to the sentiments and interests of the people represented. Instances are so frequent, that I need not stay to prove what I advance.

The managers of this affair in the Parliament, knew, that the party of the Protestors was much more numerous than that of the Resolutioners. Wherefore, it was thought convenient to give an appearance of satisfaction to the former, to prevent their obstructing the designs formed in favour of the King. Their project was, to put the King at the head of an army, almost wholly at his devotion, that he might, upon occasion, march into England, where it was not doubted, he would find many friends, and a powerful assistance. The rigid Presbyterians were therefore not to be alarmed at seeing the King in the head of the army, for fear of their concerting measures to hinder the execution of the project. For this purpose it was thought proper, that the King should publish a Declaration of a strange nature, where he was made to speak a language agreeable to the sentiments of the people, but very contrary to his own. In this Declaration, he owned the sin of his Father, in marrying into an idolatrous family: He acknowsome days (1) before Cromwell heard of it, and entered England the sixth of August, where he was proclaimed by his army.

The news of the King's march greatly surprised Cromwell who never expected it. He believed, he had gained a considerable advantage in forcing his way into Pife, but this had given the King opportunity to march into England, where, very likely, he would be joined by a great number of adherents. The avoiding of this, was the sole aim of the Parliament in carrying the war into Scotland. It may therefore be said, that Cromwell was guilty of an error, which might have been attended with very ill consequences to the new-modelled Commonwealth, and the governing party. Accordingly, his greatest care was to prevent the mischiefs that might follow. As he doubted not, the Parliament would be alarmed at the news of the King's march, he speedily informed them of it, and withal, of his intention closely to pursue him. He advised them also to put the Militia in arms in all counties of the Kingdom, with all possible diligence, to keep the King's party in awe, and prevent their joining his army. He gave himself the same orders in the northern counties, as well to hinder the Cavaliers from rising, as to find several Bodies of the Trained-bands ready to reinforce his army on his arrival in England. At the same time he detached Major-General Harrison with three thousand Horse, which were to be followed by Lambert at the head of another body of cavalry, to retard the King's march as much as was possible. After these precautions, he left Major-General Munk in Scotland with five thousand men, with orders to endeavour to make himself master of Sterling and Dundee. At last, he put himself upon the march, [three days after the King's departure] making all possible haste to reach the King before he should arrive at London, not questioning but he would march thither without halting.

The King entered England full of hopes that all the enemies of the Independents, as well Presbyterians as Royalists, would eagerly join him. For this purpose he sent Colonel Maffey before with a detachment to receive all who were willing to serve him (2). He wrote likewise to the Earl of Derby, then in the Isle of Man (3), to repair to him, greatly relying on his credit in Lancashire. But many things conspired to disconcert his Projects. 1. As he advanced, the Scotch soldiers deserted in such numbers, that it was computed four or five thousand returned to Scotland. These deserters were probably the zealous Presbyterians, who believed, they could not in conscience assist the King in the recovery of England by force of arms, which was the opinion of most of the Scots. 2. The Militia, every where in arms, hindered the King's friends from assembling, by guards placed on all the public roads. 3. The committee of the Kirk, which had followed the army, feared, if the King's forces were augmented with too great a number of Royalists, their superiority might oblige the Scotch army not only to assist in the ruin of the Independents, but moreover in the restoration of the King without any conditions, which was directly contrary to the interests of Scotland. In this belief the committee sent Maffey a declaration, with orders to publish it, signifying, that the King being zealous for the Covenant, no persons were to be received into his army who refused to sign it. This was done without the King's privity, who was extremely troubled at the news. He even forbid Maffey to publish the declaration. But the import of it being now every where spread, the King's friends thought it proper to conceal themselves, not daring to mix with the Scotch army, because they could not resolve to take the Covenant. 4. The English Presbyterians were indeed enemies to the Independents; but not such friends of the King, as to restore him to the throne without a previous alliance of his ratifying the concessions made by the King his father at the treaty of Newport. But this not being a proper season to enter into such a negotiation, they did not appear very eager to serve him. 5. The Earl of Derby, who had been sent by the King into Lancashire, and had there raised twelve hundred men, was defeated by Colonel Liburn at the head of ten troops of Horse brought from York to join Cromwell. It was with great difficulty that the Earl escaped to the King after the loss of his forces, the Lord Widdrington and Sir Thomas Tildesley being left dead upon the spot. This defeat much discouraged the King's friends of those parts, who intended to repair to his army.

At last, after a very fatiguing march, the King arrived at Worcester, where he was honorably received by the magistrates, and solemnly proclaimed. He resolved to refresh his weary troops in the neighbourhood of that city, as they were not able to continue their march without some repose. Probably his design was to have marched directly to London, if his army, according to his expectation, had been considerably strengthened on their rout. But on the contrary he saw it so diminished by desertion, as to be reduced to twelve or thirteen thousand men, without any hopes of its being augmented, for the forementioned reasons. It is therefore likely, he durst not farther advance, and thought the ground about Worcester proper for defence in case of an attack.

Whilst the King's army refreshed themselves at Worcester, Cromwell was advancing with speed. His orders for assembling the forces and Militia of the North were so well obeyed, that on his arrival in England, his army was daily increased by parties from all quarters. By this means, after his junction with Lambert and Harrison, he found his army much superior to the King's, which lay encamped about a mile from Worcester, with a resolution to stand upon the defence. Cromwell before he attacked the King's army, thought proper to make a diversion on the other side the Severn. For this purpose he detached Lambert, who marched directly to Upton, where was a bridge guarded by Mossy. This passage was so vigorously attacked, that after a sharp engagement, Mossy was obliged to abandon it. Immediately after, Cromwell ordered part of his army to go over to the western side of the Severn, which forced the King to send some of his forces the same way, and so to weaken that part of his army which was to sustain Cromwell's attack.

The 3d of September, a day fortunate to Cromwell by the defeat of the Scots at Dunbar the year before, he charged the royal army on both sides the Severn. After an engagement of some hours the King's forces were repulsed on both sides the river, and forced to retire into the town in such confusion, that the entrance was forgot to be defended. The King's solicitations were fruitless, to inspire his now vanquished troops with resolution to resist any longer the conqueror. At last, his cavalry seeing the enemy breaking into the town, fled, and left the infantry to the mercy of the English. The King himself was forced to fly through St. Martin's gate, and with great difficulty avoided falling into the enemy's hands. The Foot were almost entirely killed or taken; and the Horse being warmly pursued, were easily dispersed; so that most of the officers and Cavaliers were made prisoners. It is pretended, of the Scots there were slain about two thousand, and seven or eight thousand taken prisoners (4), who being sent to London, were sold for slaves to the Plantations of the American isles. Duke Hamilton mortally wounded, died nine days after. Amongst the principal persons were General Lefey, the Earls of Lautherdale, Rathes, Carnwarth, Kelly, Derby and Cleveland (5).

The King, though happily escaped from the defeat, was under great difficulties. He was to avoid his pursuers; that was his only concern, but the thing was not easy. He found himself in the middle of England, which he could consider but as an enemy's country, tho he had in it still some friends. He was under a necessity to quit it, and find some way to convey himself beyond sea, which seemed impracticable. It was still more dangerous to attempt a return into Scotland, because he would probably be searched for most carefully on that road, and though he should safely reach that Kingdom, the danger would be almost the same there as in England. The Parliament-army, victorious in Scotland, as we shall see presently, would not have afforded him a secure retreat there. He resolved therefore to go that night as far as possible. After that, he dismissed his attendants, who could only serve to discover him more easily, and put himself into the hands of a trusty guide, by whom he was disguised like a peasant, and conducted through by-roads. In this melancholy state he spent a whole day in a tree near the road (6), from whence he saw and heard people as they passed by, talking of him, and wishing he would fall into their hands. He travelled only in the night, his guide concealing him by day in cottages where he was not known, and where 1651. his diet generally was only a little milk. At last, after two months great fatigues, after infinite dangers escaped, after a great part of the Kingdom travelled from Worcester to the county of Suffex (1), he embarked, and safely arrived in Normandy the 23d of October. The curious are referred to the Earl of Clarendon, who, from the mouth of the King himself, has given a circumstantial account of the means of his escape, and the adventures in his flight (2).

We must now return to the transactions of Scotland, since the two armies left that Kingdom. While Cromwell was absent, the King, Monk, in obedience to his order, laid siege to Sterling, which resisted but few days. This place, one of the strongest of Scotland, where the publick Records were kept, surrendered the 14th of August (3). All the papers and records were sent to London, from whence they never returned, the ship which was bringing them back, after the Restoration, being cast away. After the surrender of Sterling, Monk besieged Dundee, where the inhabitants of Edinburgh had conveyed their best effects, and were at last obliged to surrender. Dundee, however, some Scotch Gentlemen assembling some forces to relieve the town, they were surprized and dispersed by a detachment from Monk, and their leaders taken prisoners. Notwithstanding this misfortune, [Major Lunsdale] the Governor made a stout defence, till the town was taken by storm the first of September, two days before the battle of Worcester. The taking of Sterling and Dundee were followed by that of Aberdeen, St. Andrews, and all the rest of the towns and castles, capable of making resistance. Thus, in a short time, Monk reduced the whole Kingdom of Scotland to the obedience of the English Parliament. And this was the remarkable consequence of the King's resolution, to conduct the Scotch army into England.

The victory of Worcester, and the reduction of Scotland, gave such a reputation to the new Republick, that every State in Europe, either courted its friendship, or dreaded its arms. For this reason, most of the Sovereigns excused themselves from making offers to the King, or supplying him with money, for fear of being suspected by the Parliament. So, the King saw himself reduced to great extremities, and even to a want of common necessities. He lived at Paris, maintained by his Mother, who had a pension from the Crown, but Cardinal Mazarin making his court to the Parliament of England, took no notice of the distress of her unfortunate Son.

On the other hand, Cromwell's glory and credit were so increased since the battle of Dunbar and Worcester, that as he was master of the armies of the three Kingdoms, he was in effect, master of the resolutions of the Parliament, no man daring openly to oppose him. He had, besides, in the House so great a number of creatures, that it was easy for him to procure what resolutions he pleased. So, it may be truly said, that he was the Head of the Commonwealth, whilst he had only the title of General.

This Commonwealth was very powerful from its beginning. This appears strange at first, considering the great sums that were expended, and the blood that was shed, during the civil war. But it is to be considered, with regard to the expence, that the money had not been carried out of the Kingdom. The only alteration was, that the rich were become poor, and the poor rich, which had not sunk the capital of the Kingdom. And as to the number of men killed in the war, it must also be considered, that England swarmed with people in the year 1642, having had no wars since the death of Elizabeth. So the effusion of blood had not diminished the inhabitants so, as to weaken the Kingdom to any degree. This is evident, from the eagerness wherewith, in the space of one year, the Parliament raised an army for Ireland, and another more considerable for Scotland, besides the forces remaining in England. The navy, having had no enemies to engage during the war, was in a flourishing condition. In a word, England was not less powerful than under Elizabeth, or than it might have been under James I. and Charles I. had those Princes thought proper to engage in foreign wars. Nothing therefore was altered but the Government, and that was in the hands of the most able men England had for a long while produced, though their usurpation was the most unjust. In this respect, England found itself in a very different state from what it was under the two foregoing Kings, whose capacities to govern, cannot be greatly commended by the Impartial.

Cromwell returned to London the 21st of September, leading with him, in triumph, his principal prisoners, who were committed to the Tower, from whence Massey, some time after, found means to escape (4). A majority of the Parliament, with the Speaker at their head, attended by the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, met him as far as Alton. Eight days after, the Earl of Derby was tried, and sentenced by a council of war, and beheaded at Bolton in the county of Lancaster (5).

While these things passed in England, the Parliament's fleet became master of the Isle of Jersey, Cornet Castle in the Isle of Guernsey, and the Isle of Man. In January following, Sir George Ayscough reduced the Isle of Barbadoes, then governed by the Lord Willoughby [of Parham], for the King; and the Isles of Nevis and St. Christophers submitted without opposition.

England enjoying a profound tranquillity, and Ireland being almost reduced, the Parliament thought of means to unite Scotland with the Commonwealth of England. As they had conquered that Kingdom, they believed they had a right to do with it as they pleased, without consulting the Scots, who were no longer able to oppose their will. An Act therefore passed in the English Parliament, which entirely abolished kingly power in Scotland, and united that Kingdom to the English Commonwealth, with a power to send a limited number of Representatives to the Parliament. Commissioners were afterwards sent into Scotland, to adjust the particulars of this union. Most of the Scotch Nobility seeing themselves unable to resist the Parliament, submitted to their pleasure. The Marquiss of Argyle became one of the most zealous adherents of the Commonwealth, but the Clergy were very much dissatisfied with this union.

Since the Independents had openly appeared, they made a great progress. They had beheaded King Charles I. abolished the House of Lords, turned the Monarchy into a Commonwealth, quelled the faction of the Levellers, humbled the Presbyterians, subdued Scotland, and almost finished the conquest of Ireland. By the victory at Worcester, they seemed to have deprived the King of all refuge, and to have nothing more to fear from him. Nevertheless, the Royalists were still a thorn in their side, and gave them continual apprehensions. Indeed, this party appeared too weak to recover by their own strength, but they were not without a possibility of receiving assistance from foreign powers. Of these powers, they dreaded neither France nor Spain, because they were satisfied, that the managers of the affairs of these two Kingdoms had no design to attempt the Restoration of King Charles, and though they should have attempted it, their naval forces could not withstand the navy of England. But there was another Power which inspired them with fear. This was the Republick of the United Provinces, who could strongly assist the Royalists: Nay, it was likely, the Prince of Orange, Brother-in-law to the King, would use his great credit in those Provinces, to engage them in the quarrel between the King and the Parliament. It was therefore no less important, to prevent any assistance to the King from Holland, than it had been to hinder the Scots from assisting the Presbyterians.

For this purpose, the Parliament, in the year 1649, sent Dorjans to Holland, to propose a strict union betwixt the two Republicks. The assassination of that Agent at the Hague, made the less noise in England, because the Parliament intended to prevent the danger which might come from that quarter, by a strict alliance with the States. The Prince of Orange dying October 1650, the Parliament judged the occasion favorable to treat with the States, because the interest of that Prince could no longer obstruct the negotiation. They sent therefore, in March 1651, Oliver St. John, and Walter Strickland, to the Hague, to negotiate, not a bare alliance, but such an union, as might render them one Commonwealth. This proposal met with great opposition from the States. First, the English pretended, the States should renounce all their alliances,

Secondly, the conditions propoſed by the Engliſh were of ſuch a nature, that all the advantages were of their ſide, and the forces of the United Provinces were properly but to ſerve for augmentation of thoſe of England. Thirdly, if the time of the arrival of the two Envoys at the Hague be conſidered, it will be eaſily ſeen, that the affairs of the Parliament were not yet in a ſituation to oblige the States to be contented with conditions, ſo little advantageous. Indeed, Cromwell had, the year before, gained the battle of Dunbar: But that was not a deciſive victory, ſince the King was going to head a new army, as he afterwards did, before the Engliſh Envoys left the Hague. The States would therefore have aſted with too much precipitation, had they concluded this union before a deciſion between the King and the Parliament. Laſtly, the party of the Houſe of Orange not being yet entirely ſuppreſſed, ſtrongly oppoſed the union of the two Republicks, which would have deſtroyed all the hopes of the young poſthumous Prince of Orange. On all theſe accounts, the Engliſh Envoys returned in July, diſſatisfied not only at their ill ſucceſs, but alſo at ſome inſults on their perſons from the rabble at the Hague (1). By that they perceived, the Subjects of the States were more inclined to the King, than to the Parliament, and were confirmed in the ſuſpicion, that the States waited only a favorable opportunity to eſpouſe openly the King's intereſt. So, their report to the Parliament, contributed to exaſperate them againſt the States. Their reſentment would perhaps have been immediately ſhown, had they not been engaged in the war with Scotland. Wherefore, it was judged proper to diſſemble, till that war was ended, to which the battle of Worceſter, and Mont's ſucceſs in Scotland gave at laſt a proſperous concluſion.

But if the happy end of this war enabled the Parliament to undertake another againſt Holland, it ſeems, on the other hand, to have removed the motives of a freſh war. For after the Parliament was become maſter of Scotland and Ireland, there was no likelihood, the States of the United Provinces would think of aſſiſting the King. Beſides, as the Prince of Orange was dead, it was not even probable, the States would contribute to the King's reſtoration, Uncle of the young Prince, whom they deſigned to reduce to the condition of a private perſon. Nevertheless, the Parliament's reſentment againſt the States was ſo great, that a war was reſolved (2). Pretexes were fought from injuries ſaid to be done to the Engliſh by the Dutch thirty years before, at Amboyna, and other places in the Indies. It is pretended, Cromwell conſented to this war, of which he ſaw no neceſſity, in pure complaiſance to St John, and ſome others, who appeared extremely incenſed againſt Holland.

The ſtrong deſire ſhown by the Parliament to engage in this war upon ſuch remote pretences, gives room to conjecture, there were other motives than what publicly appeared. Very probably, even then ſome Members, ſecret enemies or envious of Cromwell, fought means either to ruin him, or at leaſt conſiderably to leſſen his power. This power in a private perſon ſeemed to them too dangerous for a Commonwealth. They had participated in his Counſels and deſigns to ſubvert the Presbyterian Parliament, and therefore knew his Genius, and of what it was capable. Wherefore they could not help dreading, that inſtead of labouring for the Commonwealth, he was labouring for himſelf, however careful he was to hide his ambition under the mask of the public good. They ſaw at leaſt with uneaſineſs, that if he was forming his own advancement, nothing could hinder him from executing his deſigns as long as he was maſter of the army. This ſupport was therefore either to be taken from him, or the Commonwealth expoſed to his ambitious deſigns. But it was difficult to obtain his conſent to diſband an army which was at his devotion, and his great credit in the Parliament afforded no hopes of effecting it there, without a preſſing neceſſity. It was believed therefore, that if the Republick could be engaged in a ſea-war, the great expence of which was foreſeen, the Parliament would by degrees be induced to diſband a land-army, to avoid an unneceſſary charge. This policy perhaps may appear at firſt too refined, but three things ſtrengthen this conjecture. Firſt, The cauſes alledged for this war appear not of ſufficient weight to engage the Parliament in ſo great an expence, at a time when it would have been on the contrary very advantageous to let the people enjoy the ſweets of peace, in order to make them reliſh the late eſtabliſhed Republican Government. Secondly, It will appear in the ſequel, that all the ſubmiſſions of the Hollanders, were ineffectual to procure them a peace, and that the Parliament would ſcarce hear their propoſals. This plainly ſhows, the Parliament had ſome ſecret motive for the continuation of the war; and it is difficult to diſcover any other than what I have mentioned. Thirdly, It is certain, Cromwell at laſt perceived, as will hereafter appear, this war was continued only to give the Parliament occaſion to diſband the army, and that this made him reſolve to deſtroy a Parliament which fought his ruin. I own, it is not eaſy to prove, that the authors of this war againſt the United Provinces, had at firſt the deſign I have aſcribed to them; and that with reſpect to the beginning, it is only a conjecture. But this conjecture is confirmed, when it is conſidered, that the principal members joined together to humble the power of Cromwell, and that the war was only continued to make the expence of it a proper reaſon for diſbanding the land-army, as uſeleſs, but which was neceſſary to Cromwell's ſupport.

However this be, Cromwell returning victorious from Amſterdam, as he had before done from Ireland and Scotland, ſo his credit ſo increaſed, that he became as it were the Soul of the Parliament and Commonwealth. Whether he did not at firſt perceive the ſecret motives of the projected war, or for ſome other reaſon, he readily conſented to the deſign of humbling Holland, which was conſidered as the only foreign Power the Parliament had to fear. But as the People were to be managed, who would not have been eaſily perſwaded of the neceſſity of this war, it was reſolved to force the Hollanders to be the aggressors, or at leaſt to furniſh a pretence for the war. For this purpoſe the Parliament, under colour of encouraging navigation, made an Act prohibiting the importation of all foreign commodities except upon Engliſh bottoms, or ſuch as were of the country from whence the commodities came. By this Act, which was to commence the firſt of December 1651, all commerce between England and Holland was deſtroyed, ſince that commerce conſiſted only in foreign merchandizes imported from Holland in their own vellels. Beſides this, the Parliament granted Letters of Mart to ſeveral private men, who complained of an unjuſt Confiscation of their ſhips in Holland.

The States eaſily perceived the Parliament's deſign, but inſtead of beginning hoſtilities, as was expected by the Engliſh, they ſent an embally to London, to ſolicit a revocation of the Act. The Parliament received the Ambaſſadors with marks of reſpect, and granted them ſeveral audiences, their aim being to intimate, that it ſhould not be their fault if the peace between the two republicks were not preſerved. But when the particular articles came to be diſcuſſed, it was plain the Parliament was bent upon war. Inſtead of revoking the navigation-Act, ſeveral ſtate pretentions were revived. Satisfaction was demanded for the maſſacre of the Engliſh at Amboyna in the year 1622; for the loſſes ſuſtained from the Dutch ſince the year 1618 in the Indies, Persia, the Mogul's Dominions, Muscovy, Greenland, and the Iſle of Pelaron. Theſe loſſes, according to the Parliament's eſtimation, amounted to ſeventeen hundred thouſand pounds Sterling. A ſuitable reparation was alſo inſiſted on for the murder of Donrighius committed at the Hague, under the eye of the State, who had taken no proper meaſures to bring the authors to puniſhment. In fine it was pretended, that ſatisfaction ſhould be given for the ſecret intelligence which the laſt Ambaſſadors from the States had held with the late King during the civil war. For theſe ſatisfactions and reparations, the Parliament offered to make an alliance with the United Provinces upon the terms propoſed by their envoys at the Hague (3).

Theſe propoſitions convinced the States that they were to prepare for war. Accordingly with great care and expence a fleet was put to ſea of a hundred and fifty ſail. They were unwilling however to declare war againſt the Parliament, and reſolved, if poſſible, to cauſe the Engliſh to be aggressors. For this purpoſe, while the States Ambaſſadors were ſtill at London, their Admiral Martin Van Trump, one of the braveſt and moſt experienced Sea-officers in Europe, appeared in the Channel with a fleet of forty five ſhips of war, pretending to convey ſome merchant men, and came and anchored in Dever-Road, probably with deſign to give the Engliſh a provocation to begin hoſtilities. Admiral Blake, who commanded the Engliſh fleet conſiſting only of twenty-fix ſail, appearing in ſight, the Dutch weighed anchor, and put to ſea without ſtriking their flag, whereupon Blake fired three

(2) Hoſtilities began between the two Nations in October 1651, when an Engliſh Man of War, meeting with ſome Dutch Fiſhermen, demanded of them the truth hereof, as an acknowledgment of England's Sovereignty in thoſe Seas, (or elſe, inſiſted upon their ſtriking ſail) which the Dutch reſuſed; whereupon they fell from words to blows, and the Dutch ſhook firſt at the Engliſh, the Engliſh Man of War ſunk one of their Ships, and all the Men were ſlaid.

So, the fight begun without any certainty which side was the aggressor (1). The two Admirals had positive orders so to behave, as not to come to an engagement without apparent necessity. The English say, Trump had orders from the States not to strike to the English, to oblige them to begin hostilities. This is not improbable, though the Dutch authors, do not mention it (2). Blake being reinforced with eight ships, the engagement lasted from four in the afternoon till night. The English, if their Historians are to be credited, had not a single ship damaged, and the Dutch lost two, one taken, and one sunk. They say farther, that night coming on, Trump drew his fleet to the back of the Godwin Sands, and the next morning sailed for Zealand. The Dutch own the loss of two ships, but affirm the English had six sunk, and that the night only saved their fleet from entire destruction. It is difficult exactly to discover the truth in such contradictory accounts, particularly concerning sea-engagements. It seems however, that the confederation at London occasioned by this battle, and the insults offered to the Dutch Ambassadors from the populace, which obliged the Parliament to give them a guard, show, the People were not pleased with the success.

The Dutch Ambassadors, knowing the intention of their matters, endeavoured, in an audience obtained of the Parliament, to show, the battle was a pure effect of chance. On the other hand, the States sent to the Parliament an Ambassador extraordinary, to propose an agreement. This was Adrian Pau, who had been Plenipotentiary at the peace of Munster. But the Parliament not receding from any of the articles proposed before the rupture (3), the States recalled the Ambassadors, and resolved to continue the war, since there was no other way to procure a peace. A Manifesto was published, in which they pretended to demonstrate, the Parliament attacked them, without any provocation; and the Parliament answered in another, declaring all the occasions of complaint above-mentioned. To this was added the refusal of the striking the Flag, a right they were resolved to maintain, at all hazards. The States replied, it was true, their republic, in its infancy, had paid that compliment to the Royal Dignity, when England was under the dominion of a King, but they could not believe themselves obliged to the same respect since the Monarchy was changed into a Commonwealth. After all, this was by no means the real cause of the war. But these Manifestos were necessary on both sides, for an intimation to the People, that they were not engaged without necessity in extraordinary expences to support a war.

The war being sufficiently declared, as well by the Manifesto's, as by a battle, Van Trump put to sea with a fleet of seventy ships, whilst Van Gallen sailed to the Mediterranean to fight the English there. Trump's design was to engage Admiral Acough who lay in the Downs with part of the English fleet. But, while he was waiting an opportunity, Admiral Blake with forty ships sailed to the northward, to attack the Herring fleet, and their convoy (4). Trump being informed of it, follows and overtakes him near New-Castle. But while he was preparing for the fight, a furious tempest so dispersed his fleet, that he returned to Holland, but with forty sail. The rest that escaped Snipwreck, arrived not at the Texel till some weeks after.

About the same time, Ruyter conveying a fleet of merchant-men with thirty four ships (5), was met by Sir George Acough, and a furious engagement ensued, which was bravely fought on both sides, till Acough at last was forced to retire to Phymouth, and leave Ruyter free passage to convey his fleet into Holland.

During the Engagements in the Channel, Van Gallen attacked and beat the English into the Mediterranean: But his victory cost him his life, being slain in the fight.

Mean time, the English putting to sea with a formidable fleet, made themselves masters of the Channel, the Dutch not daring to appear. Mean while, a considerable number of Dutch vessels returning from Holland, without being informed of the war, fell into the hands of the Eng- lish, and amongst others, a fleet of forty sail from Portugal and six India ships richly laden.

Whereupon the Dutch, not to expose their Merchants to greater losses, gave notice to the Merchant-men, home ward bound, to fall to the life of Rbd, where a fleet should be ready to convoy them. Parliament to the contrary, Trump left the Goree in November, with several Merchant-men, war, and six fire ships, and met Blake, who was in the Channel. The fight lasted from eight in the morning till night, when part of the English fleet retired to the Downs, and part into the Thames. A wound received by Blake having thrown his fleet into some disorder, he could not hinder Trump from pursuing his course (6).

Since the death of Charles I, the Duke of Gloucester, his third Son, had been confined in the Isle of Wight, and educated as a private Gentleman, they who had the charge of his education, being expressly commanded to show him no respect, that might put him in mind of his being a King's Son. At last, the Parliament resolved to send him out of the Kingdom, for which purpose he was conducted to Dunkirk, from whence he visited his Sister the Princess of Orange, at Breda, and then repaid to the King his Brother at Paris.

In February, Blake again put to sea, [with a Fleet of A Sea Eighty sail] being assisted, at his own request, with Monk, Dean, newly arrived from Scotland for that purpose. The intention of the three Admirals was to fall upon Trump in his return from the life of Rbd, with three hundred Merchant ships, he was to convoy to Holland. The States being informed of the great preparations in England, had equipped twenty ships to join their Admiral in his passage, but they were hindered by contrary winds. In the mean time, Trump entering the Channel, and conducting the Merchant men along the coasts of France, met the English fleet, much superior to his own in number of ships. But finding himself too far advanced to recede, a furious engagement began, which lasted three days, and would have been renewed the fourth, had the ships on either side been able to sustain a fresh charge. The Dutch lost in this engagement eighteen men of war, and eight Merchant-men (7). But their Historians pretend, that one and twenty ships of the enemy were sunk, and three stranded. Each side challenged the victory. However that be, Trump conveyed his three hundred Merchant-men into Holland, the eight excepted, which fell into the hands of the English. After he had secured the Merchant-men, he engaged the English four several times, but not in so important a manner.

Shortly after, the King imagining, he had many friends amongst the commanders of the English fleet, offered the States to put himself on board their fleet, without any command, except of such English ships as should come and join him. But the States thought not fit to accept his offer. It was considered by them as a snare, to engage them to declare for him, to which, in their present circumstances, they had no inclination. They wanted peace, and were unwilling to remove, or render it impossible, by espousing the King's cause. They even found a way to convey privately, to Lenthal the Speaker, a letter from the particular States of Holland, to propose an agreement. Some say, this was owing to a private intimation from Cromwell, who began to discover, that peace was now proper for his interests. He had the address to obtain from the Parliament a civil answer to the letter received by Lenthal, but the answer was directed to the States General. This drew from the States a letter of the 30th of April, in which it was openly desired, the Parliament would please to name a place for a treaty.

Cromwell at last perceived, the continuation of the war was a contrivance of his enemies, that the expence might render it necessary to disband the army, now become useless, to which he saw the House was inclined. This tended manifestly to undermine his authority. For though he had excellent qualities, and by his valour and capacity had raised the Commonwealth to its present grandeur, he was, however, still feared. Had he not been supported by the army, his ruin had been inevitable, the Parliament fearing that his credit, already too great, would become still greater, to the prejudice of the Commonwealth. Cromwell had even private information, that a conspiracy was forming against him, in which were engaged not only several Pres-

1653. byterians and Royalists, but also some considerable Members of the House, though of the Independent party. Affairs therefore were in such a situation, that the Parliament was either to be subdued, or himself ruined. Such a choice does not long amuse the ambitious. Cromwell, displeased at a design to requite his services with ingratitude, easily determined to risk every thing to make himself master of the Parliament, rather than become their slave, who properly owed all their power to him.

The Parliament, as I observed, was entirely supported by the army, and by their means held the nation in subjection. But since the battles of Dunbar and Worcester, Cromwell had so acquired the esteem and affection of the officers and soldiers, that they supported the Parliament, but as its interests were confounded with those of their General. The leading Members perceived it, and therefore had formed the project of disbanding the army, to ruin Cromwell with more ease. But such a project was not to be long concealed from one of Cromwell's penetration. As soon as he discovered the design of his enemies, he judged, there was no other way to support himself, than by withdrawing the confidence of the army from the Parliament; after which, it would not be difficult to destroy them. This was the very method practised by himself and the other Independents, to ruin the Presbyterian Parliament. He therefore causes the officers of the army, in a general council, to frame a petition, and present it to the Parliament; in which they demanded, "The arrears of their pay, that they might not be compelled to take free quarter upon their fellow subjects, who already paid for great contribution and taxes, which they were well assured, if well managed, would defray all the charges of the war, and of the Government."

The Parliament, as Cromwell had foreseen, complained of the insolence of this petition, and ordered a reprimand to the officers for their presumption, to intermeddle in affairs which belonged not to them, and to arraign the Parliament's management of the treasury. This drew from the army a second petition, which put the House in mind of some former propositions they had made, "That they would be glad to be dissolved, and that there might be successive Parliaments, to undergo the same trouble they had done. They therefore desired them to remember, how many years they had fate, and though they had done great things, yet it was a great injury to the rest of the nation, to be utterly excluded from bearing any part in the service of their country, by their ingrossing the whole power into their Hands: And thereupon besought them, that they would settle a council of war for the administration of the Government, during the interval, and then dissolve themselves, and summon a new Parliament; which they told them, would be the most popular act they could perform."

This Remonstrance, though intended to exasperate the Parliament, appeared however very just in itself, and agreeable to the general sentiment of the nation. This will be evident, when it is considered, in what manner the Members, which composed this Parliament, had possessed themselves of the supreme authority. The violence they had used to their colleagues, the late King's tragical death, the change of the Monarchy into a Commonwealth, and the taxes imposed on the People for an unnecessary war, had rendered them odious to the whole Kingdom. They were themselves sensible of these things; but, besides that it was very mortifying to them to divert themselves of an authority which had so many charms, they had reason to fear, that an account would be demanded of their actions. They were therefore unwilling to quit possession, and yet, could not avoid solemnly deliberating upon the petition, which was of a nature not to be neglected. In this debate, all the Members, who were officers in the army, strenuously supported the petition. The Presbyterians, who had been received into the House upon their swearing to the Engagement, were also of opinion, that the Parliament ought to dissolve themselves, since it could not be doubted, that it was the nation's desire. But the negative was carried by a majority of voices. It was therefore resolved, that it was not yet time to dissolve this Parliament, while affairs were depending that could not be left unfinished, and particularly the important war with Holland. That nevertheless, the Speaker should issue out writs for filling the vacant seats in the House. At the same time, a committee was appointed, speedily to prepare a Bill, by which all persons were forbid to present such petitions, under pain of being declared guilty of High-treason.

This was what Cromwell expected from the Parliament. After so express a declaration, it could not be doubted, that the Members who had fate more than twelve years, and had but too much abused their power, would always retain the supreme authority in their hands, under colour of being the representatives of a Republick, which properly consisted only of themselves. Cromwell being therefore very certain, this Parliament was odious to the people, and not less disagreeable to the army, believed, he owed no farther regard to men, who only fought his ruin. When things were concerted with the principal officers, he came to the House, the 20th of April, with some officers and soldiers, and without any ceremony, told the Members, he was come to put an end to their power, of which they had made an ill use; and therefore, they were immediately to be dissolved. The officers and soldiers entered at the same time, and stayed at the door till the Members walked out. Cromwell, as they came by him, reproached one with drunkenness, another with corruption, not sparing any of those whom he knew to be his enemies. After that, he gave the Mace to one of his officers, and locked the door (1). This was an extraordinary action, but no more than was done a few years before by General Fairfax, when he expelled and imprisoned the Members, who were disagreeable to the army.

It cannot yet, however, be affirmed, that Cromwell, by this proceeding, had pulled off the mask. He might still be thought to have good intentions to the publick, since he had only delivered the nation from a Parliament, which had long held them in servitude. And had he, after this, called a free Parliament, and submitted to it himself, the people would have loaded him with blessings. But the sequel clearly discovered, he was only labouring for himself (2). And yet, if it is considered that the nation was then divided into three parties, each mortally hating the other two, it is not easy to conceive, how a Parliament, though ever so free, would have been able to settle the peace of the nation. It was hardly possible to find expedients to content the three parties, whose interests and principles were so opposite, as well concerning Government as Religion. So only force, by giving a superiority to one of the three, was capable of awing the other two. This doubtless was considered by Cromwell, and therefore he resolved to model the Government after his own way, support his settlement by force, and regard not the chimerical project of contenting every man. He saw the necessity of a supreme authority capable of commanding obedience, without which all would run into confusion, and that this authority was to be supported by the army; and doubtless, he believed himself more capable than any other, to manage the reins of the Government. I pretend not here to justify all the actions of this great man, whose ability was never contested; but only to shew, that, in this juncture, he could have taken no other course, without throwing the State into the most terrible confusion that can be imagined. Since therefore, as matters then stood, England was to be governed by force, was it more inconvenient to see the nation ruled by the greatest General and Statesman the Kingdom had for many years produced, than by a Parliament, Independent or Presbyterian, or by a King intoxicated with arbitrary power? The people had made trial of these three several Governments, and found them insupportable. A fourth therefore was to be tried, things being in such a state, that it was neither possible nor proper to submit to any of the other three. This supposed, it is not to be denied, that Cromwell was more capable to govern this great State, than any other man then in England. No objection could be raised against him, which might not with more justice, have been urged against any other man who should have seized the Government, or any body of men invested with the supreme power. If, on certain occasions, he abused his authority; if, in his actions, he had only a view to his own glory and interest, this is what I pretend not to vindicate. It is however certain, that things have been greatly aggravated, and some of his actions mis-represented, which with disinterested and unprejudiced persons, are capable of being easily justified. All the difficulty concerning this affair, lies in the supposition made by each of the three parties, that their scheme of Government was the best and most perfect. But as Cromwell disregarded all the three schemes, he was equally exclaimed against by the three

upon the Action of Cromwell,

(1) Whitelock, who was present, says, Cromwell led into the House a File of Musketeers with him, and in a furious Tone bid the Speaker leave his Chair, and told the House, "They had fate long enough, unless they had done more good; that some of them were Whoremasters, (looking toward Henry Marten, and Sir Peter Wentworth), others of them were Drunkards, and some corrupt and unjust Men, and scandalous in the Profession of the Gospel; and that it was not fit they should sit any longer, and desired them to go away." Whereupon, among all the Parliament Men, of whom many wore Swords, and would sometimes talk big, not one offered to draw against Cromwell, but all tamely departed the House. He bid one of his Soldiers "take away that Fool's Battle the Mace." Whitelock, p. 374.

(2) It is probable, he had formed the design of invading the Government, just after the Battle of Worcester. For he had a meeting at the Speaker's, with several Members of Parliament, and principal Officers of the army, to consider of the settlement of the Nation. The Soldiers were for a Republick, the Lawyers for a mixed Monarchy, and many for the Duke of Gloucester to be made King; but Cromwell still put off that debate. And it is thought, his design in this Conference, was only to sound those great Men, that he might manage accordingly. See Whitelock, p. 516.

parties. The Independents, fond of their Democracy, which was, however, but an empty name, were enraged at him, for overturning a building which he himself had erected. The Presbyterians could have wished, he would have restored the Parliament to the state it was in, at the beginning of the year 1648, when they were masters; and could not forgive him, for not taking that course, which, in their opinion, was the most natural. The Cavaliers or Royalists were well pleased that Cromwell had dissolved the Independent, without restoring the Presbyterian Parliament. But to satisfy them, he must have restored the King to his throne, and the Church of England to all her rights. The Reader is left to judge, whether, in the present situation of affairs in England, what the three parties desired, was either just, proper, or practicable. It is no wonder therefore, if these three parties were equally displeased with Cromwell's proceedings, and loaded him with invectives.

A little after, Cromwell published a Declaration to justify the dissolution of the Parliament, and as his designs were not yet manifested, this Declaration was subscribed by the colonels of the army, and all the sea-captains, and met with a general approbation.

The Parliament being dissolved, the sovereign Power was necessarily to be lodged some where. Cromwell might have taken the administration of the Government, by the same authority that he had dismissed the Parliament. But he had no design to usurp it so notoriously. He had contrived, that it should be given him by a Parliament, in order to dazzle the eyes of the publick with his venerable authority. The council of officers, who had presented the petition to the Parliament, being still assembled, Cromwell caused them to resolve, that a hundred forty-four persons should be intrusted with the supreme power. In the choice of these persons, Cromwell at once displayed his abilities, and discovered, that he had some secret design, which, would at a proper season manifest itself. They were all men of no birth, illiterate, with no particular merit, unexperienced in affairs, in a word utterly incapable of an employ of that consequence (1). Cromwell easily foresaw, they would soon be weary, and forced to put the Government into his hands, and so, furnish him with a pretence to assume it to himself. This notable choice being made, he writ to each in particular, to require them to assemble at Whitehall the 4th of July in order to take upon them the administration of the Government (2).

These new Sovereigns meeting on the day appointed, Cromwell made a speech, and when it was ended, gave them an Instrument signed by himself and the principal officers of the army, by which the supreme power was lodged in their hands. This instrument imported, that all these members, or any forty of them, were to be held and acknowledged the supreme authority of the nation, to whom all persons were to yield obedience and subjection till the 3d day of November, in the year 1654, that is, during one year and four months. That three months before their dissolution, they were to make choice of other persons to succeed them, whose authority should not exceed one year, and then they were likewise to provide and take care for a like succession in the Government. But it will presently appear, that Cromwell did not intend, this regulation should be exactly observed. These members, thus impowered, made no scruple to call themselves a Parliament, and chose one Rouse (3) for their Speaker. The whole nation was surprized to find themselves under the dominion of such men, most of whom were artificers, or retail merchants (4). Amongst these members was one Barebone a Leather-seller, who in his neighbourhood passed for a notable speaker, because he used to entertain them with long harangues upon the times. From this man the people, in derision, called them Barebone's Parliament (5). I shall leave this ridiculous assembly for a moment, which did nothing worth remembering, to refuse the recital of the war and the affairs between England and the United Provinces.

The letter writ by the States-General to the Parliament the 20th of April, the day on which the Parliament was dissolved, was referred to the council of State, established by Cromwell and his officers, till the new Parliament should assemble. This Council, under the direction of Cromwell, gave a favourable answer to the States, with hopes of a peace, upon sending plenipotentiaries to London.

The English affairs were then in a state of uncertainty, of which it was difficult to foresee what would be the event. Cromwell had, by his sole authority, dissolved the Parliament, and named a council of State which governed the Kingdom, with no other right than what was derived from the officers. It was therefore not very proper for the States either to treat of, or conclude a peace with men so little authorized. But the Provinces of Holland and Zeland, the greatest sufferers by the war, wished to end it at any rate. At last, after great contests, the States General named four ambassadors to negotiate a peace at London.

Whilst their instructions were preparing, the fleets of England and the States, met the 2d of June, and came to an engagement, which was renewed the next day. In this last engagement, Trump fighting with great disadvantage, was obliged to retire in disorder, having lost many ships, which were sunk or taken by the English (6).

After this battle, the English fleet being reinforced to the number of a hundred ships, saw it self, some time, mistress of the sea, and gave frequent alarms to the coasts of Holland. At last, Trump having repaired his fleet as much as possible, though it was inferior to the English both in the number and largeness of the ships (7), attacked the enemy's fleet again near the Tenel. The fight lasted from morning till night without any considerable advantage to either side. It was renewed the next day with the same fury. Trump being reinforced with twenty-seven ships, nor did this second day decide the victory. The third day opened with a fresh engagement, in which Trump was killed by a musket-ball. But Vice-Admiral De Witzen continued the fight, till the two fleets, as if by consent, retired to their own coasts, unable to fight any longer. The loss on both sides was very considerable (8), and neither could justly boast of the victory; but the loss of Admiral Trump was irreparable to Holland.

Cromwell took care speedily to repair the English fleet, in hopes of receiving some advantage from the consternation caused by the death of Trump, the loss of so many ships, and the division then reigning amongst the United Provinces. But a violent storm so damaged his fleet, that he was under a necessity of either making a peace, or loading the people with new taxes, which, in his present situation, was very improper. He listened therefore to the propositions of the States, and the whole following winter was spent in this negotiation.

Barebone's Parliament did nothing considerable in a session of more than five months (9). Nor was it called for that purpose. At last, the 12th of December, the Speaker, with a good number of the members, who knew Cromwell's intentions, being assembled sooner than usual, one of them rose up and said, that they were unequal to the burthen laid upon them, and therefore proposed a dissolution of themselves, and a resignation of the sovereign authority into the hands from whom it was received. This proposal met with a ready and unanimous approbation. Then the Speaker and all the present members, without waiting for those who were not yet come, left their seats, and went directly to Cromwell and the council of officers: To whom they declared, that they found themselves incapable of the trust reposed in them, resigned the instrument they had received, and besought them to take care of the Government. Thus Cromwell and his council of officers were once more invested with the supreme power, by that Parliament on which themselves had conferred their pretended authority. It is manifest, this had been resolved from the calling of the Parliament, in order to derive a Parliamentary authority to those, who had by their 1654. and others were wounded by his servants; after which, he retired to his Brother the Ambassador's. This tumult drew the people together, who surrounded the Ambassador's house, and threatened to drag the criminals to justice. Cromwell being informed of it, dispatched an officer, with some soldiers, to demand the murderers. The Ambassador loudly complained of the insult offered him, and demanded an audience of the Protector, but was refused, and told, that if the criminals were not delivered, the people would not be easily appeased, nor could the Protector answer for the consequences: That as a man had been killed, and several wounded, justice must be satisfied. In the mean time, the people continued their noise and menaces; so that the Ambassador, seeing himself too weak to resist, was at last forced to deliver up his Brother, and the rest that were concerned, in expectation of afterwards obtaining their pardon. But Cromwell continuing inflexible, the Portuguese Gentleman was beheaded in the Tower, and his accomplices hanged at Tyburn. I pretend not to decide, whether this act of justice could be done, without a violation of the privilege of Ambassadors, or whether Cromwell had not done better, in conniving at the prisoner's escape. I shall only shew very briefly, that the present juncture was not favorable to the Ambassador, or the King his master.

Don John IV. King of Portugal, formerly Duke of Braganza, had, in 1640, seized the Crown of Portugal, pretending, it was unjustly wrested from his ancestors by Philip II. of Spain. This had engaged him in a fierce war with Spain, during which Charles I. had, in a treaty signed at Breda, the 22d of May 1642, owned him for King of Portugal. Thus the two Crowns of England and Portugal were in peace and alliance, before the war between Charles and the Parliament was declared: Upon this foundation, the two Princes Palatine, Rupert and Maurice, the first of which commanded the King's navy, being obliged, in 1650, to leave Ireland, where they could no longer continue in safety, sailed into the river of Lisbon. They were no sooner there, than a fleet from the Parliament arrived in the mouth of the Tagus, and immediately the Admiral required of the King of Portugal the delivery of the ships commanded by Prince Rupert, saying, they belonged to the Commonwealth of England. This demand extremely embarrassed the King. He had made an alliance with the King of England; but on the other hand, England was the King's enemy, and in that juncture, Don John was under a necessity of declaring for one or the other. Policy required a declaration for the Parliament, but honour and hospitality demanded a protection for the King's ships, which were come for refuge to Portugal. This question was warmly debated in his Council. The majority advised him to relinquish a King, expelled his dominions, who could do him neither good nor hurt, and thereby gain the friendship of a powerful Commonwealth, from which he might expect great assistance against Spain: Whereas, in declaring against the Parliament, he would perhaps engage himself in fresh difficulties, at a time when all his forces were hardly sufficient to resist his enemies. But the King, by his reasons and authority, caused it to be decided, that the King of England's ships should be protected. Pursuant to this resolution, a squadron was immediately equipped of thirteen men of war, to join Prince Rupert's. The two squadrons sailed together with design to fight the English, if they were between the two Capes (1). For the Portuguese Squadron had orders to sail no further, that it might appear, the King intended only to secure the entrance of the Tagus. Upon notice of this juncture, the English Admiral sailed away. But to be revenged for the protection granted to Prince Rupert's, he fell upon a Portuguese fleet returning from Brazil, and took fifteen ships. The approach of winter obliging him to return to England, the two Princes Palatine sailed to Avignon, after causing a truce of truce between England and Portugal. To adjust this difference, the King of Portugal had sent to London the Conde de Penaguis, his circumstances, during a war with Spain which had now lasted thirteen years, not suffering him to remain in a state of hostility with the Commonwealth of England. Probably, for the same reason he did not think proper to recall his Ambassador, after the execution of Don Pantelen Sa. I do not know whether this accident did not retard the peace between England and Portugal, which was not signed till two years after in 1652.

Since Charles II's arrival in France, after his miraculous escape from the battle of Worcester, he had lived in extreme want, not having wherewithal to subsist. The Court of France took no notice of his necessities, whether in compliance to Cromwell, or from a desire of making a strict alliance with him, or through dread of his declaring in favour of Spain. So, the King was in a melancholy state. He had even the mortification to see Monsieur de Bourdeaux, who till then had been his Resident in England, appointed Ambassador by the French Court (3), upon Cromwell's being declared Protector. This alteration convinced the King, that France designed an alliance with Cromwell, and he did not doubt but the treaty would be followed with a request to him to depart the Kingdom. Wherefore, to prevent this compliment, he let Cardinal Mazarin know, that he intended to withdraw, which was welcome news to the Cardinal. To facilitate the execution of this design, the Cardinal promised him the arrears of a pension of six thousand Livres a month, which had been granted him, but never regularly paid, and the continuance of the same, as long as he should be out of France. At the same time, the King received another small relief, which enabled him to discharge his debts. Prince Rupert arrived safely at Nantes with the fleet, after having lost his Brother Maurice in a storm. Besides that the ships were extremely damaged, and the King unable to repair them, he was in great want of money, which determined him to sell the ships, with the ordnance and tackling. Cardinal Mazarin was the purchaser, tho' at a very cheap rate, if we may believe the Lord Clarendon, and paid him the money without delay. After that, Prince Rupert repaired to Paris, and taking leave of the King, withdrew into Germany. The King, as soon as he had received the money, left Paris, and chose Cologne for his retreat, where he continued many years.

The King, before his departure from France, sent William, now Earl of Rochester, Ambassador to the Emperor, and some other Princes of Germany, to procure a supply of money. He even applied to the Pope, by the mediation of Cardinal de Retz, and it is pretended, that in order to succeed, the Cardinal prevailed with him to change his Religion, and privately received his abjuration. At least, Dr. Burnet, in the History of his own Times, assures, that the King embraced the Catholic Religion before he left France, where he returned no more, after the time I am speaking of. But others, who think themselves better informed, assign this change of his Religion to the year 1659.

While the King was in this state of adversity, Cromwell was honoured, respected and feared by all the powers of Europe, who equally courted him. In England, his enemies durst not look up; Scotland was entirely subdued, and Ireland reduced to the last extremity. But before I return to the affairs of England, it will be necessary briefly to relate what passed in Ireland and Scotland, to mis-

Since Cromwell had left Ireland in 1650, Ireton his Son-in-law, who commanded there as his Deputy, treated the Irish rebels, who fell into his hands, with great severity, the Parliament having ordered no mercy to be shewn to the Massacres. But this was not capable to lead the Irish to an union with the Marquis of Ormond. On the contrary, a religious zeal prevailing among them, by the persuasions of their Monks and Clergy, they could not bear to be under a Protestant commander. Nay, they conspired against the life of the Marquis, and in an insurrection at Limerick, raised by a Monk, he was in danger of being killed. At last, the Irish Bishops, in a full Assembly, published a Declaration, protesting, they would have no communion with Hereticks, nor obey the Marquis of Ormond. Then, they required him to resign his command to a Catholic, on whom they could better rely. The Marquis being thus exposed to the suspicions and treacherous designs of the Irish, and utterly unable to restore the King's affairs, made the Marquis of Clanrickard his Deputy, and retired into France, from whence, afterwards, he accompanied the King to Cologne.

Ireton dying of the plague in 1651, the Parliament gave Ireton's the command of their forces in Ireland, to Lieutenant-General Edmund Ludlow, a great Republican, and one of Ludlow Charles the First's Judges.

The Irish were not more obedient to Clanrickard than to Ormond. The Catholic Clergy, and all Officers, refused to have any society with the English, under the command of the Marquis, though a Catholic. It was sufficient that he had received his commission from a Protestant, to render him odious. A certain number of men were therefore chosen to form a Council for the administration of their affairs. This Council judged it expedient to call to their assistance a foreign Catholic Prince, who might be capable to conduct them, and put him in possession of the Government of their Island. They cast their eyes on the Duke of Lorraine, then at Brussels, and resolved to send Deputies to treat with him. This resolution being taken, they demanded of the Marquis of Clanrickard a commission for the Deputies, fearing, they would be ill received, if not authorized by the King's Governor in Ireland. But the Marquis refused to give such a commission, till he knew the King's pleasure. This refusal inflamed their animosities against him. He was exclaimed against with great bitterness, and their Deputies were sent notwithstanding his opposition (1). The Duke of Lorrain judged it not proper to engage in such an undertaking, without better information of some particulars, which it concerned him to know. He sent a certain Abbot into Ireland, who having learned, that the affairs of the Irish were almost desperate, and this resolution taken without the consent of the King's Lieutenant, refused to treat with them. The Irish, enraged with the Marquis of Clanrickard for opposing their design, persecuted him several ways, and at last, treated with Ludlow, by means of a certain Monk, without the Marquis's privity, who feeling himself unable to serve the King, informed him of what passed, and desired leave to retire. The King readily granted his request, as seeing no way to save Ireland, and left the Irish to their own measures, whose affairs from that time daily grew worse.

It was then, and in the following years, that the Irish wholly unable to resist the Parliament forces, were exposed to the utmost severity of the English commanders. The barbarity they had exercised upon the English Protestants, settled in Ireland, was justly retaliated upon them. Many were executed, and others, to the number of a hundred thousand, most of whom perished with hunger and misery, had leave to go into the service of foreign Princes. The families which remained in the country, were for the most part, removed into Connaught, where some lands were assigned them for their subsistence, while the rest was delivered to the Adventurers, who advanced money for the Irish war. Part also of these confiscated lands was given to the officers and soldiers in payment of their arrears, and part was sold to the best bidders. From this time, the nation has been kept so low, that there is no appearance of its ever recovering. In 1654, Fleetwood, who had married Iretton's widow, Cromwell's daughter, was made Governor of Ireland, and two years after, was succeeded by Henry Cromwell, younger son of the Protector.

Though Scotland was subdued, it was not entirely free from disturbances. The general Assemblies of the Kirk had been suppressed by Cromwell, knowing, that from thence flowed all the troubles which had been for so many years in Scotland. Besides, as it was his intention to introduce in that Kingdom a liberty of Conscience as well as in England, he knew, it would be impossible to execute his design so long as these Assemblies subsisted. The people of Scotland were enraged at a liberty so contrary to their Covenant, and the maxims of the Kirk. They sufficiently discovered their sentiments, though to no purpose, since they had neither places, nor forces, nor arms, nor leaders, to enable them to attempt a deliverance. On the other hand, some Lords and Gentlemen of the King's party still kept in the High-lands, with troops under the command of the Earl of Glencairn. But these troops, neither well armed nor disciplined, were defeated by Colonel Morgan (2). Nevertheless, with the remains of their troops, they still kept in some inaccessible places, where it was impossible to attack them. But at last, discord arising among them, they were forced to fend to the King for Colonel Middleton and obtained his consent. On Middleton's arrival, Glencairn quitted them, and made his own peace. Middleton supported the remains of this party about a year, and then was obliged to forsake it, seeing it was not possible to do the King any notable service in that country. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

As, by the Instrument of Government, a Parliament was to assemble the 3d of September, Cromwell called one for that day. But in his writs for election of Members, there was a strict order not to elect any persons, or their sons, who had born arms for the King; and this was punctually obeyed. A new regulation was likewise made to proportion the number of Representatives to the largeness of the Burroughs and Counties, and to their respective shares of the publick expences. This regulation, as being very just in itself, met with universal approbation (3).

(1) The Lord Clarendon says, after he had been inveighed against with great violence, he could not withstand the importunity of the Assembly of commons. He recommended to him. However, the Commissioners were resolved to follow the Instructions.

(2) The State had eight hundred Horse, and three thousand Foot; and Morgan eight hundred and fifty Horse, and sixteen hundred Foot. Whitelock, p. 588.

(3) By the 9th and 10th Articles of the Instrument of Government, (which see in Whitelock, p. 552.) it was provided, that the Persons to be chosen in England and Wales, should not exceed four hundred. Those for Scotland and Ireland, (for the three Kingdoms united in one Commonwealth, and the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey were also included) were to be thirty for each Kingdom. Then the Persons to be chosen in England and Wales were to be in a certain proportion there set down at large. A Proportion, which it would have been well for England, had it been always observed, the little and insignificant Burroughs being omitted, and the number of the Knights of the Shire increased from four to twelve, according to the Extent of the County. Thus says the Lord Clarendon, was then generally looked upon as an atrocious act to be more warrantably made, and in a better time. Tom. III. p. 387.

(4) This year, on November 30, died the learned John Selden. — As also Mr. Doddsworth, who had the chief hand in compiling the Declaration.

(5) By the 11th Article of the Instrument of Government, the Parliament was not, during the space of five months, to be accounted from the day of their first meeting, to be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, without their own consent. Whitelock, p. 572.

(6) See his long Speech in Whitelock, p. 610. — 618. He says, the Parliament was dissolved January 31, p. 610. — Before their dissolution they voted him and his Successors, a Revenue of two hundred thousand pounds a year, p. 609.

The Parliament being assembled, Cromwell made a Speech in the Painted-Chamber, where the House waited on him. He briefly touched upon the disorders of the preceding Government, and endeavoured to justify the present Establishment. After an assurance of his good intentions, he represented to them his services for the nation, since the dissolution of the long Parliament, and told them, he had called a free Parliament, agreeably to the desire of all good Englishmen; adding, that he did not speak to them as one that would be a lord over them, but as one that would be a fellow-servant, in the great affair of settling the Government.

Cromwell hoped, this Parliament, free indeed, excepting the exclusion of the Royalists, who could not have been admitted with safety, would confirm his Protectoral dignity, and that the confirmation of a free Parliament, would stop the mouths of his enemies. Upon his own recommendation, Lenthall, Speaker of the long Parliament, was chosen again to that post. It appeared very soon, that the Parliament had many Members who were enemies of tyranny, and having served in the long Parliament, had imbibed maxims very contrary to those established by Cromwell. The first thing proposed, was to examine by what authority they were assembled; a question unexpected by Cromwell. In all appearance, his enemies designed to give him a mortal blow, by a decision that his authority was imaginary and illegal, as indeed it was. Perhaps too, the Parliament intended to seize the Sovereign Power, tho' convened by an unlawful authority. Cromwell himself had given them an instance of what could be done with the assistance of force. But as he had friends, as well as enemies, in the House, he found means to make them lose time, by the opposition they met with, from the officers and others who espoused his interest, whether thro' friendship or fear. So though he could not hinder the frequent debates on this question, he gave his enemies cause to apprehend, that they should not carry it, when it came to be decided. At last, perceiving they only waited a favorable opportunity to put the question, he sent for the Members to meet him in the Painted-Chamber. Though in his first Speech he told them, that he would only be their fellow-servant, in this he spoke as their Lord, and told them, they were too free in calling an established Government into question, from which themselves had derived their authority, since if they were not lawfully convened, they had no power to debate. At their return to the House they found a guard at the door, refusing entrance to any person, who would not first sign an Engagement in these words — I A. B. do hereby freely promise and engage myself, to be true and faithful to the Lord Protector, and to the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and shall not (according to the tenor of the Indenture, whereby I am returned to serve in this present Parliament) propose or give any consent to alter the Government, as it is settled in one single person and a Parliament. Many refusing to sign this Engagement, were excluded from the House (4).

Notwithstanding all this, the Members themselves, who had signed the Engagement, were not more tractable, and ceased not to shew their ill-will to Cromwell. They had only signed, to have it in their power to destroy him, when a favorable occasion offered, which they hoped would not be long. A plot was formed chiefly by the Cavaliers, but with the privity of many Members of Parliament, to raise an army in several parts of the Kingdom. Cromwell, being informed of it by his spies, prevented the design of his enemies, by a dissolution of the Parliament eleven days before the time fixed for its continuance, by the Instrument of Government (5), namely, on the 22d of January. At the dissolution he told the Members, he was not ignorant of their projects, and that several were engaged in a conspiracy against the Government (6).

It was not without foundation that he mentioned a conspiracy, which was now ready to open. Though he was not informed of all the particulars, he knew, however, in general, that an insurrection was intended in several places, and had the names of some that were to be the principal actors. Two days after the dissolution of the Parliament, Major Wildman was arrested by his order, and a declara-1655, tion was found in his house, containing the reasons which obliged the English to take up arms against Cromwell (1). Some others, as well Republicans as Royalists, were also apprehended.

Since the King's retreat to Cologne, he had received frequent Expresses from his friends, informing him of the general dislike of Cromwell's Government, and of the favourable opportunity for a general Rising. What they said concerning the general discontent, was very true. But they built upon a false principle, which had often deceived Charles I. and now likewise deceived them. They imagined, that all who were displeased with the Government were disposed to serve the King, and restore him without any condition. Indeed, the Presbyterians would have gladly restored the King, provided it was on the terms granted by the King his father in the treaty of Newport, that is, with the limitation of the Royal Power, and the establishment of the Presbyterian Government in the Church. But it was not likely, Charles II. being at liberty, would grant the same conditions as were accepted by Charles I. under confinement. On the other hand, 'tis also true, that in general, the Independents, Anabaptists, and in a word, all the zealous Republicans, were enemies of Cromwell since his seizing the Government, and that in the army itself there was a strong party against him. But nothing was farther from these men's thoughts, than the King's restoration, and yet the Royalists imagined, all Cromwell's enemies would strive to restore the King to the throne, as if there was no possibility of being enemy to the Protector, without being devoted to the King. Upon this foundation it was, that they formed the project of an insurrection in the West, and of another in the North, not doubting of the army's joining, or at least suffering the Cavaliers to act undisturbed against Cromwell. This project was communicated to the King, who approved of it as well as of the day appointed for the execution, namely the 18th of April. The King dispatched the necessary commissions, and privately came into Leam to be ready to pass into England if the undertaking should be crowned with success. At the same time, Wilmot Earl of Rochester repaired secretly to London (2), with Sir Joseph Wagstaff, who had been Major-general in the army of the late King. At London their friends were consulted, and it was resolved, Wagstaff should conduct the insurrection, which was to be in the West, and the Earl of Rochester that in the North (3).

On the day appointed, Wagstaff came within two miles of Salisbury, where he found Penruddock, a Cornish Gentleman, Jones, Grove, and some others, who had assembled about two hundred Horse. With this small force, they entered Salisbury without any opposition. For as it was then the time of the Assizes, little notice was taken of those who entered the city. The market-place was immediately seized, and all the Stables locked up, that the Horses might be at their devotion. After this, the Judges were seized, with the Sheriff, and were in great danger of being hanged for their refusal to proclaim the King, who notwithstanding was proclaimed. But soon after, the conspirators perceiving, that the inhabitants remained in their Houses, without offering to join them, they were discouraged, and leaving the town, took the western rout. A troop of Horse, accidentally quartered in the neighbourhood, pursued and inspired them with such terror, that at their approach, they laid down their arms. Wagstaff fortunately escaped, but Penruddock, Grove and Jones were taken. The two first were beheaded, and the other hanged (4). Notwithstanding the great hopes conceived by the Royalists of a general rising throughout the Kingdom, the people no where attempted to favour the enterprise. It is impossible to know what would have been the behaviour of the army, since there was no necessity of their being assembled, this affair being ended in two or three days. One may here remark, what commonly happens on these occasions, namely, that the contrivers of such projects, keeping company for the most part with only men of their own party, are apt to believe the whole nation to be in the sentiments of those with whom they converse, wherein they are frequently mistaken. This was, as it were, the peculiar weakness of the Royalists, of which the Earl of Clarendon's History furnishes various instances.

The insurrection in the North vanished before it was begun to be executed. The Earl of Rochester repaired to the County of York, where he found some Gentlemen zealous for the King's service. But after an inquiry into what they could perform, he thought it not proper to make any attempt, but returned to the King with an account of what had passed.

The King, having lost the hopes he had been made to conceive, returned to Cologne. Soon after his arrival, it was discovered, that one of his domesticks, named Manning, lately come from England, held a secret correspondence with Thurlo, Cromwell's Secretary, and acquainted him with the transactions of the King's Court. He was apprehended and shot to death in a cattle belonging to the Duke of Neuburg. It is now time to speak of Cromwell's affairs with France and Spain.

In the reign of Charles I. Cardinal Richelieu, as hath been said, was concerned in the troubles of Scotland in the year 1637, from which those of England were afterwards produced. The Court of France all along seemed to espouse the interest of Charles I. during his life, but never gave him any real assistance. Cardinal Richelieu believed, that nothing could more advance his project of humbling the House of Austria, than to prevent England from assisting Spain, in order to preserve the balance of Europe, as the interest of England required. For this reason, that able Minister, instead of assisting Charles I. thought only of fomenting the troubles of England. Cardinal Mazarin his successor, under the minority of Levis XIV. followed the same maxim, and never gave any real assistance to Charles. But it may be said, he carried this Policy too far, since instead of keeping the balance even between the King and Parliament, he gave the Parliament room to acquire a superiority, which might become very prejudicial to France. After the death of Charles I. the Commonwealth of England grew so powerful, that it was too late to endeavour to weaken it, especially as France was then engaged in a war with Spain. If France had assisted Charles II. she would have run the risk of seeing the Parliament in alliance with Spain, which in that juncture was not to be hazarded. For this reason, the interests of Charles II. were entirely abandoned by France, and all his assistance from thence was a pension too inconsiderable for his subsistence. And even this was privately, left the Parliament should be jealous. The English feared her so little, that in 1652, their fleet made no scruple to attack that of France, sent to the relief of Dunkirk besieged by the Spaniards, and taken by them the same year. Notwithstanding that affront, France sent an Ambassador to the Parliament to desire their friendship. Cromwell, when advanced to the Protectorate, held, for some time, the two Crowns of France and Spain in suspense, equally flattering both Kingdoms with hopes of the friendship of England. But it appeared afterwards, he only intended to amuse Spain, being resolved to make an alliance with France.

Spain had given no more assistance to Charles I. than France. On the contrary, Don Alonzo de Cardenas, the Spanish Ambassador in England, had thrown a partiality for the Parliament, which was confided by Charles as a sort of declaration against him. After the death of Charles I. the King of Spain paid great regard to the Parliament, and gave them no just cause to make war upon him. All that England could reproach him with, was, his receiving, though very coldly, in 1649, Lord Cottingham, and Mr. Hyde as ambassadors from Charles II. but without entering with them into any negotiation, that might create jealousy in the Parliament. The sole design of this embassy was, to procure some money from the Spanish Court for the King's subsistence, in which the ambassadors were unsuccessful. The murder of Asham, the Parliament's envoy at Madrid, by some Irish, and the little zeal shewn by the Court of Spain to punish the murderers, might be another cause of complaint. But things of this nature are liable to so many discussions, that it is difficult to know, whether it was in the King of Spain's power to give the Parliament an entire satisfaction. However that be, these causes of complaint did not seem of sufficient weight to breed a war between the two nations. Nevertheless, Cromwell, now made Protector, had no sooner concluded a peace with Holland, than he resolved to attack Spain. The grounds of this war are not easy to be guessed (5), but what may be conjectured is this. Cromwell, as I observed, intended to be confirmed by a Parliament, in his Protectoral dignity received only from the officers of the army. It concerned him therefore First, to render some signal service to the State, in order to make his usurpation pass the more peaceably. Secondly, as Spain was then upon the decline, he believed perhaps, it would be easy to make some conquest upon that Crown, which might render his Protectorate famous, and shew the English that if he fought to advance himself, it was in order to be more serviceable to the Republick. Thirdly, it is likely, Mazarin was concerned in this resolution, in order to give a powerful diversion to Spain.

However this be, Cromwell on his advancement to the Protectorship, sent out two fleets, one under the command of Blake, to the Mediterranean to chastise the Algerines, who frequently took English vessels, and the other under Penn, with thirty Ships, and about five thousand land-soldiers commanded by Venables (1). The two last commanders had sealed orders from Cromwell, which were to be opened at a prefixed time (2). This fleet sailed from Portsmouth the 27th of December, and arrived at Barbadoes the 28th of January, from whence they sailed again the 30th of March 1655. By the sealed orders, the two Commanders were to proceed to Hispaniola and take St. Domingo the capital of the Island. Cromwell's instructions for this undertaking were so particular and circumstantial, that they appeared to be drawn by men thoroughly acquainted with the country (3). At the approach of the English fleet the Spaniards abandoned St. Domingo. But Venables, instead of landing his troops (4), according to his instructions, within a mile of the Place, disembarked them at a much greater distance (5). This gave the inhabitants time to come to themselves, return to the town, and put it in a posture of defence. The English, when they approached Domingo, were so fatigued, by a long march, by the excessive heat, by hunger and thirst, that they were easily repulsed, and forced to retire to their Ships, leaving many dead and wounded in the island.

This attempt miscarrying, the English fleet sailed to Jamaica, and seized the Isle with little opposition. Some troops were left there, which were afterwards re-inforced by Cromwell, in order to preserve this conquest, where the English have since established a rich Colony. Venables was sent to the Tower on his return to London, but soon discharged. The war being sufficiently declared by this attempt which the Spaniards had no cause to expect, the King of Spain ordered the effects of the English merchants in all his dominions to be seized, which was a very considerable loss to them. Nor did the mischief stop there; for by this war so unjustly undertaken, the English forfeited the Spanish trade, which transferred to the Dutch, helped them to repair the losses sustained in the last war.

The war with Spain was soon followed by a peace with France, proclaimed at London the 23d of October. This peace was easily made, since France was willing to forget the injury received from the English in 1652. That point was only to renew the ancient treaties, to which there was no obstacle, after Cromwell's declaration against Spain (6).

Besides the insurrections and conspiracies from the Cavaliers and Presbyterians, Cromwell was also in danger from the male-contenters of his own party, who had effectually served him, without knowing what were his designs, but who were extremely provoked at their having been tools to his private ambition. The Republicans were incited against him. The republican Government was as much their idol as the Covenant was that of the Presbyterians. So Cromwell by being invested with the Protectorship, had offended them no less than the Cavaliers and Presbyterians. It was not easy to curb three Parties, which, if they could have resolved to unite, would have been strong enough to ruin him. But he knew such an union was very difficult, and yet it was not impossible, that particular men of each party, whether openly or privately, might combine for his destruction. The army was his only support, in which too there were republicans who hated him mortally, as appears in the Memoirs of Ludlow, one of the most inveterate against him. Nay, very likely, if he had been obliged to assemble the dispersed army, and the officers could have communicated their thoughts to one another, they would not have entirely obeyed him. As to the Royalists, he never wanted pretences to persecute them, which not only pleased the other Parties, but was agreeable to their interests. As for the Presbyterians, as they were equally enemies of the Cavaliers and Independents, in keeping them low, he obliged these two last Parties, who knew, if the Presbyterians should again be superior, they would treat them no better than Cromwell. But the rigid Republicans were his most dreaded enemies, because he had no pretence against them. They had the more cause to complain, and speak freely, as Cromwell, being their head, had made use of them, under colour of acting for the publick, and brought them to labour for his own private advancement. So, to hold all these parties in subjection, he divided England into eleven districts, and established in each, officers, whom he called Major-Generals, with an almost absolute power, that they might be always ready to prevent or disperse insurrections. In this establishment his principal view was to awe the Republicans, though the pretence was to curb the Cavaliers. These Major-Generals became true tyrants, and so oppressed the People, that Cromwell at last was forced to reduce their power within much narrower bounds (7).

Though Cromwell's ambition inclined him to support by force the dignity conferred on him, he saw the ridiculousness of exercising an authority given by men who had no lawful power to bestow it. He easily perceived it to be a fertile source of plots and conspiracies against his person and government. There was no law by which he could punish the conspirators, since his dignity, far from having any solid foundation, was a pure usurpation. On such occasions therefore it was necessary to use a tyrannical power, and such violences might produce in the end very ill effects. To remedy this inconvenience, he had called a free Parliament in expectation of having his authority confirmed, but was disappointed. He resolved therefore, instead of a free Parliament, to call one, on which he might depend, and to use their authority to establish his own.

The Parliament, according to the natural meaning of the word, is the representative of the Nation, whose decisions and laws are looked upon as conformable to the sentiments of the People in general. The extreme respect, veneration, and attachment which the English have for the Parliament, are therefore not to be thought strange, since in supporting its privileges, they maintain their own liberty. But this supposes a Parliament agreeable to the constitution, composed of King, Lords, and Commons, with an entire freedom in the elections. A Parliament thus composed may truly be called the Nation's representative. It is unnecessary here to observe, that artifices, intrigues and cabals have sometimes altered this happy constitution. The frequent instances which have occurred in this History, render it unquestionable. We have seen Parliaments regardless of their Country's good, and devoted entirely to the will of the Prince. By others, Kings have been deposed, and their Sovereigns deprived of their most lawful prerogatives. But without being obliged to look so far back, it needs only be considered, what passed in the late Reign, particularly since December 1648. A Parliament reduced by force and violence to less than a hundred Members, brought the Sovereign to the Scaffold, abolished the House of Lords, destroyed Monarchy, changed the Government into a Commonwealth, and invested themselves with a supreme authority, under the specious pretence of representing the Nation, tho' without King and House of Peers. Nevertheless, tho' the constitution of the Parliament was entirely subverted, and tho' the name of Parliament, one would have thought, should not have deceived the people, that venerable name was still used to force them to obedience, on a groundless supposition, That an Assembly with only the name of Parliament was invested with all the authority of the most legal Parliament. Upon this foundation, these tyrants claimed a right to enact laws, to ordain, to decree, as the most regular Parliament might have done. I shall not stay to shew the extravagance of this pretension. Very probably, those that claimed it, were not themselves satisfied with it. But as they were destitute of all other foundation, they built upon this, though weak and unsecure.

Cromwell's authority was no better supported. His usurpation was so visible, that a man must have wilfully shut

Ludlow, Tom. II. p. 559. — It is very remarkable, that, in this Treaty, Cromwell would not allow the French King to call himself King of France, but of the French; when he himself assumed the Title of Protector of England and France. They had all the Authority which was before divided among Committee-men, Judges of Peace, and other Officers. They could commit to prison all suspected Persons; levied Monies; frequented those who refused to pay; had power to kill Horse and Foot upon occasion; and from them lay no appeal, but to the Protector himself. He himself was so convinced of the unlawfulness of his power, that he would fain have had it confirmed by a free Parliament, being the only way which could furnish him with a plausible pretence to exercise it. But failing of success, he continued where he was, that is, invested with the dignity of Protector, by men who had no power to confer it. Wherefore, the authority of a Parliament appeared to him absolutely necessary to confirm him in his own. But, as he had experienced what was to be expected from a free Parliament, he resolved to call one which might be more at command. He therefore summoned a Parliament to meet the 17th of September; but he took such just measures, that though the People seemed to enjoy a perfect freedom in the choice of their Representatives, he secured a majority of voices. Besides, he would admit no man into the House, who had not first promised under his hand, to do nothing against the established Government. This Parliament, composed of the Representatives of the three Kingdoms, met on the day appointed (1). But above a hundred Members refusing to sign the Engagement, were denied their seats in the House. The rest appeared ready to perform Cromwell's desires. An Act was forthwith passed, for renouncing the title of Charles Stuart, (for so they called the King) which was signed by all the Members. By another Act it was declared High-treason to attempt the life of the Protector. In short, in the space of some months, the Parliament liberally granted all the money desired by Cromwell, as well for the maintenance of the army and Government, as for the continuation of the war against Spain.

Blake's Attempt upon the Galeons at St. Croix in the Canary Isles. April. Clarendon, III. p. 479.
D-forsy.
1657. Since Blake and Montague had taken the two prizes, they had continued cruising off Cadix, in expectation of the Spanish fleet returning from Peru. As this fleet did not appear, tho' it should now have been arrived, Blake had notice, it was retired to Teneriff, one of the Canaries, till the English fleet should be sailed from Cadix. Whereupon, he stood for the Canaries, the beginning of April, and found there the Spanish fleet, consisting of six Galeons richly laden, and ten other ships of less burthen. The commander of this fleet had anchored in the Bay of Santa Cruz, and taken all imaginable care to secure himself against an attack. The ten smaller ships were moored close to the land, and defended by two forts well mounted with guns, and several batteries erected on the shore. But the Galeons drawing more water, could not come so near the land, but lay farther off, with their broad-sides towards the Sea. Blake seeing no possibility of approaching the ten ships, resolved, notwithstanding the rashness of the undertaking, to attack the Galeons. Accordingly, with a fair wind, he approached the Galeons, received their fire, and boarded them. The particulars of this engagement are very confusedly related by the Historians. Thus much, however, is certain, that Blake, after an obstinate fight, possessed himself of the Galeons, and as the wind, which had brought him into the Bay, would not serve to carry them out, set them on fire. Immediately after, a land-breeze arising, put him safe to sea again. The Spaniards on this occasion sustained a very great loss, in ships, money, men, and merchandise: but the English acquired nothing but glory. Blake dying in his return to England, was pompously buried by Cromwell, in Henry the VIIth's chapel, among the monuments of the Kings.

Clarendon, III. p. 479.

The Parliament, which met the 17th of September, continued their session without interruption, being employed in the most important affair that could ever come under their consideration. Whether Cromwell had now formed the project of his higher advancement, or the disposition of the House in his favour, inspired him with the thought, he suddenly became more popular than ever. He cared not for parties alike. The Presbyterians were told, he was not far from their sentiments; the Nobility met with great respect from him; and he appeared less incensed against the King's party. At last, after his friends and creatures had been long labouring to dispose men in his favour, [Mr. Pack] a Member of Parliament, and one of the City of London Aldermen, proposed, in direct terms, that he might be invested with the title of King. This proposition was immediately seconded by a great many Members (3), and it was even observed, that his known enemies very readily gave their consent to it. These imagined, there was no better way to ruin him, and excite plots against his life. But for the same reason, his principal friends opposed it with all their power. It is, nevertheless, very probable, he was privy to this proposal, though he thought not fit to tell it to Desborough his Brother-in-law, or Fleetwood his Son-in-law, from whom it met with the greatest opposition. This Contrast between Cromwell's friends, held those in suspense, who only intended to make their court to him, and caused them to be irresolute. Wherefore this proposal was debated in the House two days successively. In all appearance, the irresolute were informed, in this interval, what they were to do. However that be, it was at last carried by a majority of voices, that the Crown should be offered to Cromwell. Pursuant to this resolution, the House immediately appointed a Committee, to acquaint his Highness with what had been resolved for the public good. He seemed surprized at the offer, and told the Committee, he thought it very strange, the Parliament should entertain such a design: That he did not believe it proper for them to offer, nor would his conscience give him leave to accept it. The Committee expecting this answer, replied, They did not question but he would grant their desire, when he should be informed of the reasons which had induced the Parliament to take this resolution, and which they besought him only to hear. Whereupon, he appointed a day to hear what they had to say to him (4).

The Committee (5), on the day appointed, entertained him with long discourses, concerning the reasons on which the Parliament founded their request, of which the principal were: "That the people of England had for many ages been accustomed to the government of Kings: "That in changing this Government, there had necessarily been an abolition of many laws, customs, and formalities, and an establishment of others, which would never be endured by the people on account of their novelty: That according to the laws of England, there could be no security to any Act concerning the Government, without the intervention and authority of a King: That hitherto, those concerned in the war, and the late changes, could not be safe, but would remain liable to dangerous inquisitions, agreeable to the laws of the land: That the daily conspiracies against the present Government, clearly shewed, the people were inclined to a King, nor would be satisfied without one: In a word, That the Kingdom would never be in peace, till things were brought back to their ancient channel. That it was very true, the royal family had been rejected on account of their tyrannies; but this was no objection to the choice of a King of another family, nor could any Kingdom be produced, where the like had not happened, as well as in England."

These very reasons had been alledged in the debates in the House, and were answered by the Republicans to this effect: "That an oath had been taken to be faithful to the Commonwealth without a King; and to make a new King, was returning to Egypt. Where was the necessity of recurring to Kings, since it was agreed, they invaded the rights of the Subject? That it was advantageous that all the Subjects should be equally liable to be called to an account, that they might be more united amongst themselves. That if a King was at last necessary, they would chuse rather to have the true Heir to the Crown." Cromwell was not unacquainted with the

The first business of it was, for the Protector: First the Title of King. This Petition and Advice was presented to his Highness by the House. Cromwell desired that a Committee might be appointed to confer with him about it; which was named, and Whitelock one of the Committee, was named Cromwell. When the Committee attended his Highness, Whitelock spoke to him upon the Title of King, giving reasons why he should accept of it. Cromwell urged his reasons against it, and Whitelock replied, The whole debate is in print. Whitelock, p. 675.

1657. reasons alleged on both sides in the House, and therefore to show, he would neither accept nor refuse the offer without deliberation, he appointed the 8th of May for his final answer.

It is pretended, that in this interval, he was in the utmost distraction, not knowing what to determine. His ambition prompted him to accept the offered Crown, the whole intrigue probably being directed by himself. But the disposition of his relations and principal friends made him tremble. For how could he promise himself allegiance from strangers, when he saw his own most intimate friends determined to abandon him? Nay, it is said, some of them threatened to kill him, and that he was informed of a plot to assassinate him, the moment he accepted the Crown. The very day, he was to give his answer, Djebbarow and Flowerwood, walking with him in St. James's Park, told him, if he accepted the Crown, they could serve him no longer. He was discouraged by all these things, at the very instant the Crown was going to be placed on his head. His answer therefore to the Committee was, that he could not accept the Government under the title of a King (1). Whether this refusal was for or against his interest, is a Problem that admits of great dispute. For my part, I believe, that being so able a Politician, he did not think the advantages equal to the inconveniences, of accepting the Crown.

Nevertheless, to reward in some measure for great a moderation, the Parliament confirmed his dignity of Protector, with more power than was annexed to it by the council of officers. This was done by a solemn Instrument, called The Humble Petition and Advice (2), the Parliament thereby showing it was not a Law to be imposed on him but an Advice, which was submitted to his judgment and discretion, with freedom to accept or refuse it, as he should think proper. The substance of it was:

"That his Highness Oliver Cromwell should, under the title of Protector, be pleased to execute the office of chief Magistrate, over England, Scotland and Ireland, and the territories and the dominions thereunto belonging, and to govern according to all things in that Petition and Advice. And also that he would in his lifetime appoint the person that should succeed him in the Government: That he would call a Parliament consisting of two Houses once in a year (3) at farthest: that those persons who are legally chosen by a free election of the People to serve in Parliament, may not be excluded from doing their duties, but by consent of that House whereof they are members: That none but those under the qualifications therein mentioned, should be capable to serve as members in Parliament: That the power of the other House be limited as therein is prescribed: that the laws and statutes of the land be observed and kept; no laws altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed, but by new laws made by Act of Parliament: That the yearly fund of a million of pounds Sterling be settled for the maintenance of the navy and army; and three hundred thousand pounds for the support of the Government; besides other temporary supplies as the Commons in Parliament shall see the necessities of the nation to require: That the number of the Protector's Council shall not exceed one and twenty, whereof seven shall be a Quorum (4). The chief officers of the State, as Chancellors, Keepers of the Great-Seal, &c. to be approved by Parliament: That his Highness would encourage a godly Ministry in these nations; and that such as do revile and disturb them in the worship of God, may be punished according to law; and where laws are defective, new ones to be made: That the Protestant Christian Religion, as it is contained in the Old and New Testament, be asserted and held forth for the publick profession of these nations, and no other; and that a confession of Faith be agreed upon, and recommended to the people of these nations; and none to be permitted, by words, or

"writings, to revile or reproach the said Confession of Faith."

The general terms in which the three last articles of the Instrument, or rather of Cromwell directed them, was, to oblige equally the Presbyterians and Independents, the former supporting the Ministry, upon the present establishment, and the others, by introducing into religion, a latitude which left every man free to believe and practise as he pleased, and both parties, by equally flattering them with a confession of Faith, in which each party should find their account. The Episcopals alone could not expect any advantage.

Cromwell having solemnly sworn the punctual observation of these articles, appointed the 26th of June for the day of his Inauguration, which was performed with great pomp (5). He was, doubtless, of opinion, that this second Inauguration was necessary to supply the defects of the first, which had been made without any lawful authority. This done, the House adjourned to the 20th of January 1657-8.

Since the renewal of the antient treaties between France and England, another negotiation was begun for a league offensive and defensive against Spain. This negotiation set on foot by the Ambassador of France in 1656, at London, was concluded at Paris the 11th of March by a treaty of League, importing, that Cromwell should join six thousand men with the French army; that Mar-dyke and Dunkirk should be besieged, and when taken, delivered to the English (6).

King Charles being informed of this negotiation, sent a King's trusty messenger to Arch-Duke Leopold, still Governor of the Low-Countries, to offer a League with Spain. The King's design was to give himself some reputation by a league with that Crown; and, besides, he wished to reside in the Low-Countries in order to be nearer England, in case his presence there should be necessary. The Arch-Duke accepted the proposal, believing, if the King of England was attached to Spain, he would have credit enough to draw the Irish forces from the French, into the Spanish service. This was all the advantage Spain could expect from a junction with a Prince, who had properly nothing to offer. Besides he was to be subdued, when he should be deserted by France. However this be, the King and the Arch-Duke concluded a treaty, by which the King's residence at Bruges was only to be connived at by Spain, which was little able to maintain him according to his dignity. Spain was moreover to furnish him with six thousand men, as soon as he should be possessed of some good port in England. The King, satisfied with these conditions, because he had nothing to offer to procure better, signed the treaty which was ratified by the King of Spain. With the ratification, Philip settled upon the King April a monthly pension of six thousand Guilders, and another of three thousand upon the Duke of Gloucester, who had been sent for out of France by his brother the King, where his mother was persuading him to change his Religion. So, the King left Cologne in April 1657, and retired to Bruges, at the same time that Arch-Duke Leopold resigned the Government of the Low-Countries to Don John of Austria, natural son of Philip IV. Afterwards, the King prevailed with the Lord Muskerry, Colonel of an Irish regiment in the service of France, to desert that service, and join the Spanish army with his regiment. He also found means to cause four regiments, of English, Scots and Irish, to come in single companies, and enter him their service. These regiments, though not in very good order, served in the Spanish army.

As soon as the Treaty of league between France and England was signed, Cardinal Mazarin signified to the Duke of York, that he was to retire out of the Dominions of France. All the English of the King's party, in the service of France, had the same orders, and amongst the rest the Lord Digby, now become Earl of Bristol upon the

(3) This expression is taken from the clause inserted in most commissions, in which, after the number of commissioners is fixed, the King appoints some particular persons amongst them, who are to be preferred to give a validity to all acts done in virtue of the commission, and this he does by laying, a quorum ego nuncius solvens, &c. Rapin.

(4) A place being prepared at the upper end of Westminster Hall, in the middle of it was set a rich cloth of State, with a chair of State under it, upon an ascent of two steps. Before it a table and chair for the Speaker, and on each side of the Hall covered seats one over another, for the Members. About two o'clock his Highness came, the Earl of Warwick carrying the Sword before him, and being the only Noblemen that was present at that Ceremony. Lys Ludlow, Tom. a. p. 522. and the Lord-Mayor of London, with the City-Guards. His Highness standing under the cloth of State, the Speaker presented to him a Robe of purple velvet lined with Ermine, which Sir I. Widdrington the Speaker, assisted by Whitelock, put upon him. Then he delivered to him the Bible richly gilt and bound; after that he girt on his Sword, and delivered into his hands the Scepter of costly Gold, and then made a Speech to him, and gave him the oath. After this, the People gave several shouts, and the trumpets sounded: The Protector sat in the chair of State, holding the Scepter in his hand; on his right side the Ambassador of France, on the left the Ambassador of the United Provinces: Near him stood his Son Richard, Flowerwood Lord Deputy of Ireland, Clipp Master of the Horse, the Council and others of State. The Earl of Warwick had the Sword on the right, and the Lord Mayor of the City stood on the left side of the Chair. Near the Earl of Warwick stood Viscount Lisle, General Monsieu, and Whitelock, each of them with a drawn sword in their hands. Then the trumpets sounded, and a Herald proclaimed his Highness's Title, and Proclamation was made to the People, crying, God save the Protector. The Ceremonies being ended, he went in State to Westminster Hall Gate, where he took Coach, and went to the House, and pulled out his bills. Whitelock, p. 665.

1657. death of his Father, and a convert to the Catholick Religion. All their English, dismissed from France, retired into the Low Countries, some to their King, and the rest to Don John of Austria, to seek employment in his army.

In consequence of the league, Cromwell sent six thousand men of his best troops into France under the command of Reynolds, who had concluded the Treaty at Paris in quality of his Ambassador. In this Campaign, the French took several places from the Spaniards, and amongst the rest Mardyke which was delivered to the English. Reynolds was unhappily drowned in his return to England, and was succeeded in the command of the English forces in the service of France, by Lockhart a Scotchman, and Ambassador to that Crown.

As by the 2d article of the Humble Petition and Advice, the Protector was every year to summon a Parliament, consisting of two Houses, Cromwell resolved to observe that article, which had been inserted in the instrument by his sole direction. He therefore chose a certain number at his own pleasure, to compose the other House. Most of these were officers, or other persons devoted to him, to whom he added some of the ancient Peers; but they refused to take their seats with these men (1). This choice being made, he issued out Writs for their meeting in Parliament, in a separate House, the 20th of January 1657-8. His intention was to have this House considered as a House of Peers, and invested with the same privileges, the Peers had formerly enjoyed. He durst not however give it that name, but contented himself with calling it the Other House, till a more proper name could be given it (2).

Cromwell, as hath been observed, had created himself many enemies, not only amongst the Royalists and Presbyterians, but even among the Independents themselves. These last were extremely provoked at his having made use of them for his advancement, under colour of labouring with them to establish a Republican government. The Sequel had shewn them, that in suppressing Kingly power, he had never intended to abolish the Monarchy, since under the name of Protector, he had seized the supreme power. They therefore looked upon him as the most perfidious of men, and were not less his enemies than the Presbyterians and Royalists. He was supported only by the army, filled by himself with Fanatics and Enthusiasts, who imagined the time was come to erect a Fifth Monarchy, or the Reign of Jesus Christ upon earth. Cromwell was not ignorant, his enemies had designed to destroy him, on pretence of raising him higher, and this had made him refuse the title of King. It was also to break their measures, that he had asked and obtained a power of erecting another House, to oppose it occasionally to the House of Commons, where he knew he had but too many enemies, of which he had cause very soon to be still more sensible.

His enemies having had time to concert their measures during the adjournment, took another course to destroy him when the Parliament re-assembled. As by the 11th article (3) of the humble Petition and Advice, it was said, the Members legally chosen, should not be excluded without the consent of their House, a motion was made to admit all the elected Members, who had refused to sign the Engagement. This motion was so suddenly received and approved, that Cromwell had not time to oppose it, and he could have done it so much the less, as it was founded on a solemn act, which he had sworn to observe. By this means above a hundred Members, Republicans and Presbyterians, all enemies to the Protector, were admitted into the House of Commons (4). From that time, the face of affairs began to change, Cromwell's enemies having gained the superiority in the very House which would have made him a King. As they had formed great projects against him, their first care was to hinder the Other House, wholly consisting of his creatures, from using their pretended negative voice to break their measures. The authority therefore of the Other House was called in question, and it was affirmed to be absurd, that they should have a negative voice, since the Commons, by whom they were created, never pretended to make Peers, of men who had no other power than what they voted them. It was added, that therefore it was said in the Humble Petition and Advice, that the power of the other House should be limited. Cromwell, perceiving to what all this tended, sent for the Parliament to Whitehall, and in a speech maintained the authority of the other House with such vehemence, that the Commons tearing an immediate dissolution, found it necessary to acknowledge the Other House as an essential part of the Parliament.

Notwithstanding this, the Commons took into consideration the Humble Petition and Advice, and many were of opinion, it was null and void, because it was made when many Members were excluded from the Parliament, without any lawful cause. This manifestly tended to a Revocation of the Act, and withal of the subsequent confirmation of Cromwell's Protectorship. Cromwell was too quick-sighted not to see how much it concerned his interest, not to suffer this Parliament to sit any longer. Wherefore he came to the other House and sending for the Commons, spoke to them in these terms:

"I had very comfortable expectations that God would make the meeting of the Parliament a Blessing; and the Lord be my witness, I desire the carrying on the affairs of the Nation to these ends. The blessing which I mean, and which we ever climbed at, was mercy, truth, righteousness, and peace, which I desire may be improved."

"That which brought me into the capacity I now stand in, was the Petition and Advice given me by you, who, in reference to the ancient Constitution, did draw me to accept of the place of Protector. There is not a man living can say I sought it; no, not a man, nor woman treading upon English ground; but I, contemplating the sad condition of these nations, relieved from an intestine war unto a fix or seven years peace, I did think the nations happy therein. But to be petitioned thereunto, and advised by you to undertake such a Government, a burden too heavy for any creature, and this to be done by the House that then had the legislative capacity, I did look that the same men that made the frame, should make it good unto me: I can say in the presence of God, in comparison of whom we are but like poor creeping ants upon the earth, I would have been glad to have lived under my Wood side, to have kept a flock of sheep, rather than undertook such a government as this is; but undertaking it by the Advice and Petition of you, I did look that you that had offered it unto me should make it good."

"I did tell you, at a conference concerning it, that I would not undertake it, unless there might be some other person that might interpose between me and the House of Commons, who then had the power to prevent tumultuary and popular spirits, and it was granted I should name any other House; and I named it of men that shall meet you wheresoever you go, and shake hands with you, and tell you it is not Titles, nor Lords, nor Party, that they value, but a Christian and an English Interest, men of your own rank and quality, who will not only be a ballance unto you, but to themselves, while you love England and Religion."

"Having proceeded upon these terms, and finding surh a spirit as is too much predominant, every thing being too high or too low, when virtue, honesty, piety and justice are omitted: I thought I had been doing that which was my duty, and thought it would have satisfied you; but if every thing must be too high or too low, you are not to be satisfied."

"Again, I would not have accepted of the Government, unless I knew there would be a just accord between the Governor and the Governed, unless they would take an oath to make good what the Parliament's Petition and Advice advised me unto; upon that I took one oath, and they took another oath upon their part answerable to mine; and did not every one know upon what condition they swore? God knows, I took it upon condition expressed in the Government: And I did think we had been upon a foundation, and upon a bottom; and thereupon I thought my self bound to take it, and to be advised by the two Houses of Parliament. We standing unfetted till we were arrived at that; the consequences would necessarily have been confusion, if that had not been settled. Yet there are not constituted hereditary Lords, nor hereditary Kings; the power consisting in the two Houses and my self. I do not say, that the meaning of your oath was to you, that were to go against my own principles, to enjoin upon another man's conscience: God will judge between me and you: If there had been in you any intention of settlement, you would have settled upon this basis, and have offered your judgment and opinion."

1657-8. "God is my witness, I speak it, it is evident to all the world and people living, that a new business hath been seeking in the army against this actual settlement by your consent; I do not speak to these Gentlemen or Lords, (pointing to his right hand,) whatsoever you will call them, I speak not this to them, but to you; you advised me to run into this place to be in a capacity by your advice; yet instead of owning a thing taken for granted, some must have I know not what; and you have not only disjoined your selves, but the whole nation, which is in likelihood of running into more confusion in this fifteen or sixteen days that you have fate, than it hath been from the rising of the last session to this day, through the intention of devising a Commonwealth again, that some of the people might be the men that might rule all, and they are endeavouring to engage the army to carry that thing; and hath that man been true to this nation, whoever he be, especially that hath taken an oath, thus to prevaricate? These designs have been upon the army, to break and divide us: I speak this in the presence of some of the army, that these things have not been according to God, nor according to truth (pretend what you will.) These things tend to nothing else, but the playing the King of Scots his game, if I may so call him; and I think my self bound before God, to do what I mean to prevent it. That which I told you in the Banquetting-House was true, that there were preparations of force to invade us; God is my witness it hath been confirmed to me since within a day, that the King of Scots hath an army at the Water-side ready to be shipped for England. I have it from those who have been Eye-witnesses of it. And while it is doing, there are endeavourers from some who are not far from this place, to stir up the people of this town into a tumult: What if I said into a rebellion? and I hope I shall make it appear to be no better, if God assist me; it hath been not only your endeavour to pervert the army, while you have been sitting, and to draw them to state the question about a Commonwealth, but some of you have been lifting of persons by commission from Charles Stuart, to join with any insurrection that may be made: And what is like to come upon this (the Enemy being ready to invade us) but even preface blood and confusion? And if this be so, as I do assign to this cause your not assenting to what you did invite me to by the Petition and Advice, as that which might be the settlement of the nation, and if this be the end of your sitting, and this be your carriage, I think it high time than an end be put unto your sitting, and I do dissolve this Parliament: And let God judge between me and you." At which many of the Commons cried Amen.

1658. When the Parliament was dissolved, Cromwell suspecting, or perhaps being informed, that Lambert was one of the principal authors of the plot formed against him, dismissed him from all his employments (1). Fleetwood was recalled from Ireland to succeed Lambert in the Lieutenant-Generalship, and Henry Cromwell, younger Son of the Protector, was sent into Ireland in Fleetwood's room. Since Cromwell had been confirmed in the Protectorate, he had called his eldest Son Richard to Court (2), and made him Chancellor of the University of Oxford. He had married his second daughter to the Lord Falconbridge, and his third to Mr. Rich, Grand-son to the Earl of Warwick. His eldest had been long since married to Mr. Cloyale, and a fourth lived unmarried, if I am not mistaken, till the reign of William III. (3). Soon after the dissolution of Lambert's power, Cromwell sought to reduce the authority of the Major-Generals, that they had no longer the power, as they had before, of oppressing the people. In all appearance, they were deeply concerned in the plot to gain the army, mentioned by Cromwell in his Speech to the Parliament. It is pretended, he meant to make a greater reform in his army, and was resolved to dismiss every person of suspected fidelity. But he had not time to execute this project.

It was not without reason that Cromwell spoke of a conspiracy forming in England in favour of the King. The Royalists ever believing, that all who were enemies either of Cromwell's person or government, were the King's secret friends; built upon that foundation to place him on the throne by the assistance of his greatest enemies. This would appear incredible, if they had not given frequent instances of their prejudice. The project was, as usual, to raise insurrections in several parts of the Kingdom, in the belief, that the King's private Friends would not lose the occasion of joining those who should be in arms. The principal managers of this plot were John Mordaunt brother of the Earl of Peterborough, Sir Henry Slingsby a rich and popular man in the county of York, and Dr. Hewet a Minister of the Church of England. This Plot had been represented to the King in so advantageous a manner, by reason of the general discontent under the present Government, that he conceived hopes of success. And therefore he had himself made some preparations in the Low-Countries, and the four regiments raised by him, and after the miscarriage of the design, added to the Spanish army, were intended for his service. He had moreover sent commissions into England, for those who would engage in his interest. One of these Commissions to raise a regiment of Horse had been granted to one Mr. Stapley, whose father had been Cromwell's great friend, and one of the King's Judges. Cromwell, upon some intimation, sent for Stapley, and artfully drew from him a confession of whatever he knew, and that he had received his commission from Mr. Mordaunt. He also told him, the Marquis of Ormond had been at London, and stayed there three weeks to concert measures with the conspirators, and give them his directions; which was true. The Earl of Clarendon intimates, the Marquis had not found things in England ripe for the execution of what was intended, and yet the great number of Commissions show, that the Court had a better opinion of the undertaking. However this be, the Marquis had the good fortune to leave England, and return to the King, before Cromwell knew, he had been there. Immediately after the dissolution of the Parliament, Mordaunt, Slingsby and Hewet were committed to the Tower, and many of their accomplices, were apprehended in all parts of the Kingdom. After which, Cromwell erected a High-Court of Justice (4) for trial of the criminals, and especially of the three principal. Mr. Mordaunt escaped death by means of his wife, who bribed some of the Judges, and prevailed with [Colonel Mallory (5),] one of the two witnesses against her husband, to make his escape. Sir Henry Slingsby and Dr. Hewet were condemned and executed (6). Before the same Court were tried, condemned, hanged and quartered for the same crime, Afston, Stacy, and Battely. Some others were condemned, and pardoned by Cromwell, not to multiply any more the number of his enemies. It is certain he had a great many, and that those who had been most attached to him while he was believed to be in their views, hated him mortally, when they found themselves deceived.

The Earl of Clarendon relates on this occasion a long address to the King, from several Independents, Quakers, Jews, and Anabaptists, brought him by a young Gentleman (7), wherein they supplicated the death of Cromwell to be near, which seemed to intimate a design to assassinate him. To these addresses were annexed some conditions required of the King, with which certainly he could not comply. Wherefore he contented himself with returning a general answer, that he did not intend to persecute or trouble any men for their opinions, if their actions were peaceable, and that they might hope for his favour, if he received service from them; by which he seemed to encourage them to execute their design. It is certain, these men abhorred Cromwell, but depended too much on their own strength, and filled their heads with chimerical designs. After all, though their projects should have succeeded, the King would have received no advantage, their principles being so opposite to his. Probably, their intention was to make use of the King to accomplish their aim, but not to place him on

(2) He had till this time lived privately at Bury in Hampshire, upon the fortune brought him by his wife, who was Dorothy, eldest Daughter of Richard Marquis of Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 469.

(3) The marriages of his Daughters; Mary to the Lord Falconbridge, and Frances to Mr. Rich, the Earl of Warwick's Grandson, were celebrated first according to ceremonies then in use, but privately afterwards, according to the rites of the Church of England. Ibid. Brigden had two Handmaids, Ireton and Fleetwood; and Elizabeth (whom Rapin by mistake says lived unmarried) was wife to Cloyale. The Lady Falconbridge lived to extreme old age.

He was for trying the conspirators in the ordinary course of Common Law; but, Lys he, his Highness was too much in love with the new way, which he thought to be more effectual, and would the more vitally the offenders. Memo, p. 671.

(5) He had been trusted by Mr. Mordaunt in the business of Salisbury, and apprehended about the same time with Stapley. He was brought from the Tower in custody, to give in evidence against Mr. Mordaunt, but was prevailed with, when he was brought to the Hall, to withdraw from his gaud, and slip away in the crowd. Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 486.

(6) They were both beheaded on Tower-hill, June 8. State-Trials, Tom. 2. p. 296. Hewet's greatest crime was collecting and sending money to the King, and stirring his commissions. Mrs. Cloyale used all her interest with her Father the Protector, to save the Doctor's life, but without success; which proved to his ruin, that it was reported to be one cause of her death; see Dr. Joseph b. Idem, p. 485. Ludlow, Tom. 2. p. 607.

(7) Stacy was not the person sent with the address, as Rapin says by mistake, though he was an Agent both for these people and the Spaniards. He was an illiterate but insinuating man, of no family, and at first only a common Soldier in Cromwell's troops. The person that brought the Address, was the Lord Clarendon says, a young Gentleman of an honourable extraction. Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 488, 499.

1658. the throne in the manner he desired, accordingly this project came to nothing.

In June, this year, Marshal Turenne, General of the French army, besieged Dunkirk, contrary to the opinion of Don John of Austria, who expected that he would have opened the campaign with the siege of Cambray. As this belief had made him neglect to provide for the defence of Dunkirk, he was forced to hazard a battle to save that place, which was not in a condition to make a long resistance. But this battle proved fatal to the Spaniards, who were entirely defeated (1), and the siege was continued by Turenne, who made himself master of Dunkirk the 26th of June. The town, in pursuance of the treaty with England, was surrendered to Cromwell, who placed a strong garrison in it, and made Lockhart the Governor of it.

Cromwell had for some time, appeared more uneasy and fearful than ever. This is not very strange, since he had informations from divers parts, of a design to assassinate him, by some of his former most zealous adherents. This caused him to use new precautions, as not to lie two nights together in the same chamber, nor appear in public without a strong guard. But all these precautions to avoid a violent, could not secure him from a natural death.

In August, this year, he was seized with a fever at Hatfield-Great, which at first had no dangerous symptoms, but his distemper daily increasing, he was removed to Whitehall, where, after nominating his eldest son Richard for his successor, he expired in the 60th year of his age, on the 3d of September, on which day he had gained the two great battles, of Dunbar in 1650, and of Worcester in 1651.

Cromwell's family was originally of Glamorganshire in Wales, and called Williams, one of which marrying a Sister of Cromwell's Vicar-General in the Reign of Henry VIII. assumed the name of Cromwell, and transmitted it to his posterity. Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntington, April 25, 1599. His Education had nothing extraordinary (4), nor is it known how he spent his time before he arrived at the age of thirty five years, when he began seriously to reform his manners and lead a very regular life, without indulging himself in any indecent or ill action. Probably he then, if not sooner, engaged in the Presbyterian party (5). The reputation he had acquired of an honest man and good Christian, and doubtless his principles concerning the government, were the cause of his being returned for the town of Cambridge, to the Parliament which met the 3d of November 1640 (6). He sat two years without being distinguished, not having a genius for speaking to place him upon a level with some of the Members of that Parliament. His delivery was ungraceful, and his Speeches prolix and confused. It was, probably, in these two years that he was gained by the Independents, and lifted in their party, though concealed under the name of rigid Presbyterians. Agreeably to the views and interests of that party, Cromwell affected an extraordinary zeal for Presbyterianism, and the liberty of the Nation against the usurpations of the Court, in which he followed the directions of the then leading Members of the House. So, when the civil war began in 1642, he had a Post in the army, as a man entirely devoted to the House of Commons, of which he was Member. He was at first a Major of Horse, and though he was two and forty years of age before he had drawn a sword, he was so distinguished by his valour in that office, that he had soon after a Regiment given him. There was not in the army an officer that faced danger with more intrepidity, or that more ardently sought occasions to signalize himself. His reputation increased to such a degree, that he became Major-General, then Lieutenant-General under Fairfax, and at last his Successor. His great talents for war gave him occasion to show that he had no less genius for civil affairs. He entered into the deepest designs of his party, and at last became one of the principal leaders, advancing here with the same rapidity as in the army. It was he, who accusing the Earl of Manchester of not having done his duty in the second battle of Newbury, broke the ice, and gave occasion to the new model of the army, which was the first step to the triumph of the Independents. From that time, he was looked upon as the chief of the Independent party, and, properly as General of the army, Fairfax acting only as directed by Cromwell. I shall no further insist upon what has been related at large, but only observe, that the troops believed themselves invincible under his command, and that he was never once forced to turn his back. The Victory gained over Prince Rupert at Marston-Moor, was chiefly ascribed to his valour. The reduction of Ireland in less than a year, greatly increased his fame, and the battles of Dunbar and Worcester carried it to the highest degree.

Let us now view him in his government after he was Protector. If his government be compared with those of the two last Kings, there will appear a very great disparity with regard to the glory and reputation of the English Nation. James I. and Charles I. seemed to have studied to disgrace the English name, whereas Cromwell, in the space of four or five years carried the glory of his Nation as far as possible, and in that respect was not inferior to Elizabeth (7). He made himself equally dreaded by France and Spain, and the United-Provinces. These three States courted his alliance and friendship with such ardor, that they may be said to cringe to him beyond what was becoming. Charles Gustavus, King of Sweden, thought himself honoured in being his ally and particular friend. His greatest enemies cannot help praising him on this account.

As for his morals and conduct, as a private person, they may be said to have been very regular. He was guilty of none of the vices to which men are commonly addicted, Gluttony, Drunkenness, Gaming, Luxury, Avarice, were vices with which he was never reproached. On the contrary, it is certain, he promoted virtuous men; as, on the other hand, he was inflexible in his punishments of vice and ill actions. It is true, his own preservation obliged him sometimes to employ men of ill principles, but this is not uncommon to those, who are at the head of a Government.

Though, as to his Religion, he was an Independent, his principle was to leave every man at liberty in the Religion he had chosen, and never persecuted any person on that account. He even connived at the private meetings of those, who remained attached to the Church of England, though he was well informed of them. If they were not favoured with the free and public exercise of their Religion, it was because they were considered by him as Royalists, always ready to form plots in the King's favour, and from whom, consequently, he had great reason to secure himself. Though he was in the sentiments of the Independents, and therefore averse to all union with the national Church, he however considered all Protestant Churches, as part of the Protestant Church in general; and without aiming to establish Independency and Fanaticism by force and violence, he expressed, on all occasions, an extreme zeal for the Protestant Religion. Dr. Burnet, in the History of his own Times, says, That if Cromwell had accepted the title of King, he intended to establish a Council, in imitation of the Congregation de propaganda fide at Rome, to have an eye to what passed all over the world, with regard to the interests of the Protestant Religion. He adds, that a fund was to have been settled upon this Council, of ten thousand pounds a year, for ordinary emergencies, besides a salary of five hundred pounds a-piece to four Secretaries.

It may also be added, to Cromwell's honour, that never man was better acquainted with the inward springs of human actions, though he seemed not to have made it his particular study: Never man had more address to manage people, and lead them to his ends, nor more natural capacity for affairs, which had received no assistance from learning; for he scarce remembered the little Latin he had brought from school: In a word, never man chose at once his most advantageous course with more judgment, or executed a design with more vigour and readiness. Such, in short, were the virtues and shining qualities of Cromwell; but we must not conceal the vices and imperfections with which he is charged.

This charge turns solely upon three points. The first, that through a boundless ambition, he seized a Government

(1) Cromwell was master of Lockhart, (who had married Cromwell's Niece) and his six thousand English Foot. Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 502. — There was also a great number of Spaniards slain, and two thousand taken prisoners. Whitelock, p. 673.

(2) Cromwell had secret orders not to deliver that place to the English. But Cromwell had an information of it, though it was known but to four persons, and rendered that place in fact, as the Romans may see in Whitelock, p. 96.

(3) Cromwell was the first who went to rest in the grave the same day he had obtained the victories at Dunbar and Worcester: after his many great actions and troubles, he now died quietly in his bed. Some were of opinion he was poisoned. Mem. p. 674. — There was that day one of the greatest storms of wind that ever was known. Clarendon, Tom. 3. p. 500.

(4) His education was in English: he being first sent to Cambridge, and then to Lincoln's Inn.

(5) In 1637, Cromwell, Ellis, Widdowes, and some others, resolved to take refuge into New-England, (on account of the persecution raised by Archbishop Widdowes against the Presbyterians), and were actually embarked for that purpose; but they were prevented, by a proclamation against transporting the Majesty's Subjects to the Plantations in that year; and by an order of Council, for stopping eight ships in the river of Thames, prepared to go to New-England, in one of which Cromwell was. Life of Cromwell, p. 3.

(6) The reason of his being chosen, was, because he opposed the draining the Fen-lands in the Isle of Ely, which was then proposed, and not liked by the towns of Cambridge, &c.

(7) Dr. Burnet says, "That he hoped he should make the name of an Englishman, as great as ever that of a Roman had been." Burnet, p. 81.

1658. to which he had no right. The second, that he maintained himself in his post, by an excessive diffimulation. The third, that he put to death many of his private enemies, without any regard to Laws immemorably practised in England. Upon these three articles I shall offer some considerations to the Reader, to assist him in forming a just idea of Cromwell's character.

Upon the first, it must be considered, that though the Royalist Authors traduce Cromwell's memory as much as possible, and though in particular, the action by which he was possessed of the Government, is the principal foundation of all their complaints, it is certain, the King was no way interested in the change it produced. It was not Charles II., but a Republican Parliament, that was deprived of the supreme power by Cromwell. Though he had been subjected to this Parliament; though he had miscarried, and himself been ruined by his ambition, the King's affairs would have received no advantage, since the Parliament was not less his enemy than Cromwell. Of what therefore do they complain with respect to the King? It must be one of these two things, either that Cromwell was too wise, to suffer himself to be supplanted by all the efforts of the Royalists; or that, after seizing the supreme power, he did not restore it to the King, to whom alone it belonged; that is, that Cromwell did not at once turn Royalist, and entirely change his principles. But this charge lies no more against Cromwell, than against all the Independents and Presbyterians, who were at least three parts in four of the Kingdom, and who, no more than Cromwell, thought it proper to declare for the King.

As for the Republicans, they have not left us many writings on their side. The only Memoirs of that party, which I know of, are those of Edmund Ludlow. It appears there, that the Republicans were enraged against Cromwell, and deemed him the most perfidious of men. This is not very strange, since he had wrested from that Parliament the sovereign power, seized by these Republicans without any lawful authority. But, what was this Parliament? It was an assembly of Independents, Anabaptists, Fanatics, Enthusiasts, and others of no Religion, who, under colour of establishing a free Commonwealth, held the nation in servitude; who, to confirm their own authority, had treated their fellow-members with unheard of violence, and dared to embroil their hands in the blood of the late King, at a time when he had almost granted every thing that was desired; who, in short, were industrious to break the union of the Church, to subvert all Religion, or introduce the most ridiculous and extravagant one. Was it therefore more eligible for England to be governed by these men, than by a Cromwell? If, therefore, Cromwell be blameable, it is not for dissolving a Parliament, which certainly deserved to continue no longer, and had frangely abused the power they had assumed. But if, after the dissolution of that Parliament, Cromwell had restored the King, (for this, in all appearance, is what the Royalists would have) he had drawn upon himself the hatred and curses of all England, which, at that time, was by no means disposed to such a restoration, whatever the Royalists may say. He was, therefore, to do one of these three things; either to restore the King, contrary both to his own principles, and to those of the Presbyterians and Independents; or to abandon the State to a horrible Anarchy, which must have followed, if he had left things in the state they were in after the dissolution; or to take himself the administration of the Government, unless he had intrusted it with some other person, which, in respect of the justice of the action, had been the same. Let it now be examined, which was most advantageous for England, considering her circumstances, and whether it was not better, he should himself take the Government, than attempt a restoration, in which he could never have succeeded? Since his sole support was the army, which at that time was very opposite to the King, not to mention the opposition he would have met from the Republicans and Presbyterians. On supposition that he was in the right to dissolve the Parliament, was it not also better for him to assume the Government, than relinquish the State to a fatal Anarchy? Those who pretend, he had long before projected his advancement, speak only by conjecture. They consider not, that they had never been in a condition to form such a design, before the battle of Worcester; nor that this Parliament, which he dissolved, had, in seeking to ruin him, reduced him to a necessity of destroying them, for his own preservation.

But what cannot be justified in his conduct, is, his throwing himself, from the beginning of the Parliament, into a violent party, which aimed at the ruin of Church and State; his directing afterwards that party, and his being the chief author of the violences put upon the Parliament and the King. This, however, is slightly passed over, because it is common to him with the whole Independent party; and yet, it is, in my opinion, the only thing he can justly be reproached with, and on which it is hardly possible to excuse him.

The second charge against him is, his excessive diffimulation; but here we are to distinguish. If it be true, as is pretended, though without proof, that he carried his diffimulation so far, as to mock God and Religion, by expressing a piety and devotion which he had not, and by making long prayers, full of seeming zeal. If it be true, that his mouth uttered what his heart never meant, no man ought to endeavour to vindicate him. But his strong bias to Enthusiasm is well known; and who can affirm, it was rather out of hypocrisy than real persuasion? We are not rashly to ascribe to men inward motives, which no mortal can know. His diffimulation, practised for the better management of the several parties, all equally his enemies, has nothing, that I can see, very blameable in it, unless it was a crime, not to leave it in the power of his enemies to destroy him with ease. I shall just mention some of his methods, to maintain himself in his dignity, by which it may be judged, whether Cromwell's diffimulation is to be justly imputed to him as a crime.

The Parliament he dissolved, was composed of Independents, Republicans, Enthusiasts, or Fifth-Monarchy-men. If this Parliament had continued longer, things would have been carried to the last extremity. They began to talk of pulling down the Churches, [discharging the Tithes] destroying the Clergy, and every thing that looked like the union of a national Church. The Presbyterians, who knew this, were in continual apprehensions of their executing their designs, and consequently, the dissolution of this Parliament was considered by them, as a great happiness. Cromwell, to gain their confidence, positively promised, he would maintain their Ministry on the foot of the present establishment, and kept his word, though he was far from being Presbyterian. By this means, the Presbyterians were attached to his interest, by reason of their dread to fall again under the tyranny of the Independents.

In the Republican party were two sorts of men, whom it was very difficult to govern. The one were Deists, or men very indifferent as to Religion, who acted only upon the principles of civil liberty. The others were Enthusiasts, who expected every day when Christ should appear to reign upon earth. These were the most difficult to manage, because they would not hear reason, when it contradicted their headstrong and violent zeal. Cromwell's accepting the Protectorship, was considered by them as a step to Kingship, to which they were such enemies, that they affirmed it to be the great Antichrist, that hindered Christ's reign upon earth. Cromwell found means to divide these two parties, that all combinations betwixt them, for his ruin, became impossible. To the Deists, he made himself merry with the extravagant zeal of the Fanatics; and to these last, he talked of the others as of Heathens and Infidels. But as the Enthusiasts were the most obstinate, he intimated to some of them, that he would rather have taken a Shepherd's staff than the Protectorship, had it not been to prevent every thing from running into confusion: That he would resign this dignity with more joy than he accepted it, as soon as things should be settled: That nothing was more contrary to his inclination, and principles, than a grandeur which obliged him to assume an outward superiority over his fellow labourers. To convince them of what he said, he frequently called them into his closet, and shutting the door, made them sit covered, familiarly talking with them as his equals. Commonly these discourses ended in a long prayer. It is not to be doubted, but there was in this much diffimulation. The question is, whether it was so criminal as it is pretended?

He had likewise Chaplains of all sorts. So, hinting sometimes to one, sometimes to another, that he was not averse to their principles; the report was spread throughout the whole party, and made each hope for an advantageous change.

He took care to have spies amongst all the parties, and was thereby fully informed of what was contriving against his person or Government (1). Among others, he gained Sir Richard Willis, Chancellor Hyde's agent, for conveying the King's orders to his friends in England. All the Royalists confided in Willis, knowing he received the King's orders, and yet he betrayed them. But to keep the correspondence more secret, Cromwell assured him, that the in-

(1) He laid it down for a maxim, to serve no cost or charge in order to procure intelligence. When he understood what dealers the Jews were every where in that Trade, that depends upon News, the advancing Money upon high or low Interest, in proportion to the risk they run, or the gain to be made as the Times might turn, and in the buying and selling of the actions of Money is advanced, he brought a Company of them over to England, for which some say, he received a consideration of two hundred thousand pounds, and gave them leave to build a Synagogue. Burnet, p. 71.—Among other good regulations, he also appointed a Council of Trade, to consider how to improve, order, and regulate, the Trade and Navigation of the Commonwealth. Ludlow, p. 632.

1658. formations from him should only be used to disconcert the plots of his enemies, that none might ever suffer for them; and if he imprisoned any of them, it should only be for a little time, and on other pretences. By that means, he defeated their designs, as by accident, in committing them to prison for supposed crimes, and releasing them when their measures were broken.

He sometimes intimated a willingness to treat with the King. Probably, his aim was to engage the Royalists to offer propositions, which would have given him opportunity to amuse them, and prevented any conspiracies against his person; for he was informed from several parts, of designs to assassinate him. Wherefore he affected to speak publicly of assassinations with the utmost detestation, and to declare, he would never begin them, but if an attempt was made upon his life, and miscarried, he should not scruple to use the same method, and that he did not want instruments to execute it, nor money to reward them. This declaration kept the Royalists in awe, through a fear of their own danger, or that of the King and Royal Family.

If this conduct of Cromwell be considered impartially, it will, doubtless, appear, that his dissimulation and artifices for his own preservation, were not so criminal as they have been represented. What has most offended those who speak of them with most passion, is, that they were proper to disconcert the projects of his enemies. The dissimulation of Queen Elizabeth, for the same reason, has been extolled, though she used it only for her own preservation.

The third and last charge against Cromwell, is, cruelty, for having, whilst Protector, put some men to death, for conspiring against his person and government. That is, according to this reproach, he should have patiently suffered the Plots against him, and when one failed, liberty should have been given for a second and a third, till some one had succeeded. This deserves no confutation. But to show, that Cromwell was not for an unnecessary effusion of blood, we need only recite what is owned by the Earl of Clarendon in his History, who assures, that when it was proposed in a council of officers, that there might be a general massacre of the Royalists, Cromwell would never consent to it.

To finish Cromwell's character, I will add, that in the beginning of the Long-Parliament, he was Presbyterian. After that, he threw himself into the Independent party, and was even one of their leaders, and affected to be of the number of the Enthusiasts. But when he had accepted the Protectorship, he was neither Presbyterian, nor Independent, nor Republican, nor Enthusiast. As he had to manage all these different Parties, who were equally opposite to him, he was not to appear an enemy to any in particular, and this management furnishes convincing proofs of his great ability.

It is nevertheless certain, that Cromwell was very much hated, while he lived, by all the parties then in England, though they could not help fearing and esteeming him. But if it be now considered, that the prejudices against him are not so strong as they were then, it will be found that the hatred of him was owing to interest, and founded chiefly upon his ability to disconcert the measures and designs of all the Parties. This general hatred is solely referred to his principal action; that is, to the usurpation of the Government, which equally disgusted the Royalists, Presbyterians, and Republicans. The Royalists thereby saw their hopes more desperate than ever of the King's restoration. The Presbyterians could hardly expect, by their intrigues to render themselves once more superior in the Parliament, after the dissolution. The Republicans were enraged to see the supreme power, which they had assumed, wrested from them. It is therefore no wonder, that he has incurred so much censure, since all the people of England, that is these three parties, were equally concerned to avenge him. It was not for the enormity of the action, but because, by his advancement, each party despaired of acquiring the superiority over the rest. This is what has drawn from many writers, expressions so injurious to his memory. The Lord Clarendon speaks thus of him, and his usurpation. Without doubt no man with more wickedness ever attempted any thing, or brought to pass what he desired more wickedly, more in the face and contempt of Religion, and moral honesty. Yet wickedness, as great as his, could never have accomplished those designs, without the assistance of a great spirit, an admirable circumspection and sagacity, and a most magnanimous resolution. It is easily seen, that this wickedness is referred only to his usurpation of the Government. In a word, (continues the same author) as he p. 509. was guilty of many crimes, against which damnation is denounced, and for which hell-fire is prepared, so he had some good qualities which have caused the memory of some men in all ages to be celebrated, and he will be looked upon by posterity as a brave wicked man. Here, the author, no doubt, has an eye to the murder of Charles I. in which Cromwell was too deeply concerned for me to pretend to excuse him. I shall only observe, that this accusation is not peculiar to him, but is common to him with the whole Independent-Parliament.

To form a just and rational idea of Cromwell's character, his conduct and actions in themselves, must be examined, and joined to the juncture of the time, independently of the opinions of his enemies. We have no other Historians of those times than the Royalists, who have laid down certain principles, by which he is condemned. But, it must be observed, these principles were, not generally received, in England, during his life. What can never be entirely excused in him, is the death of Charles I, to which he contributed to the utmost of his power, and which will be an indelible blot upon his memory. Another principle, and of which he made great use, is likewise to be condemned in him: which was, that moral Laws were only binding on ordinary occasions, but might be dispensed with upon extraordinary cases, which is absolutely false. His usurpation of the Government has been already considered, and the Reader is left to his judgment. I shall only observe, that the confusion which prevailed in England, soon after the death of Cromwell, clearly shows the necessity of this usurpation.

In general it can't be denied, that Cromwell was one of the greatest men of his age, if 'tis considered, that without the advantages of birth or fortune, he rose to near a throne, that it was in his power to mount it. History furnishes very few instances of this kind (1).

Cromwell's death was followed with so many alterations in the Government, that the interval between that and the restoration, may be justly called a time of true Anarchy. Cromwell should have had a successor like himself, to finish what he had so ably begun. But two so great men are not commonly found so near one another, nor often in the same age.

RICHARD CROMWELL, PROTECTOR.

1658. IN the last days of Cromwell's illness, some of his most intimate friends, seeing him in danger, asked him twice concerning the succession, and he readily answered, he would have his Son Richard to succeed him. He had however, in the time of his Protectorship, signed an instrument by which he appointed Fleetwood his Son-in-law for his successor; but probably he had burnt that paper, for it could never be found (2). An hour after his death, the Privy-Council met, and upon the report made of the will of the deceased, as also upon the Instrument of Government, empowering them to chuse a Protector, they immediately elected Richard Cromwell.

1658. Fleetwood even relinquished before them, the right, he might have, in case the paper signed in his favour, should be found. Presently after, the Lord-Mayor of London was acquainted with the election, and the day following Richard was proclaimed Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The same proclamation was made in all the principal towns of the three Kingdoms, without the least opposition. On the contrary, Addresses were presented to Richard from all parts, signed by many thousands to congratulate him upon his accession to the dignity of Protector, and to assure him, they would willingly hazard their lives and fortunes to

(2) Some say, that Oliver had actually made Fleetwood his Heir; but one of his Daughters knowing where his Will was, took it away, and burnt it, before Fleetwood could come at it. support him. But such Addresses are not always to be depended upon, experience having often shown, they are far from being sincere, though carefully expressed in the strongest terms. Thus Richard was installed successor to his father Oliver, and took the same oath. The first care of the new Protector, after his installation, was to gain Monk, Governor of Scotland, to his interests. After the voluntary resignation of Fleetwood his Brother-in-law, of Derborough his uncle, and all the officers of the army, as well as Presbyterians, he seemed to have nothing to fear from England. Henry Cromwell his brother, then governor of Ireland, held that island in subjection. Scotland therefore only remained to be secured to his interests. Monk had commanded in that Kingdom, ever since his reduction of it, and had so artfully managed the Scots, sometimes by rigour, sometimes by gentleness, and the exact discipline of his army, that he had acquired their esteem and affection, who were never more happy than under his Government, though the Earl of Clarendon insinuates that he ruled like a tyrant, which seems to have no other foundation, than his disabling the Scots to withdraw their obedience from the Parliament or the Protector, by means of forts erected in convenient places. However this be, it is certain, Monk was master of Scotland, and Cromwell himself would have found it difficult to deprive him of that Government against his consent. Many blamed the confidence Cromwell reposed in Monk, who had born arms for the late King, and only engaged in the service of the Parliament, to free himself from captivity after the battle of Nantwich, where he was taken prisoner. It was, perhaps, for these suspicions, that Richard thought himself obliged to neglect nothing to gain him to his interests. For this purpose, knowing Monk's esteem and affection for Clarges his Brother-in-law, he sent him to desire his friendship. But Clarges, as well as Monk, had been zealously attached to the King, and was still so in his heart, though outwardly he complied with the times. So, in the discharge of this commission, he took occasion to found him, and easily found he was far from being the King's enemy. From that time Monk and Clarges held a strict correspondence. Clarges informed Monk of the transactions at London, and, in all appearance, designed then to serve the King, though perhaps he thought it not yet proper to explain himself to Monk, who was very reserved. Clarges, according to his instructions, acquainted Monk with the new Protector's great esteem for him, in which he followed the sentiments of Oliver his father, who had expressly charged him to be entirely directed by his advice. Monk readily submitted to Richard's Government. He obligingly acknowledged his civilities, and only told him, in general, that having no particular advice to give him, by reason of his distance, he recommended to him to encourage a learned, pious, and moderate Ministry in the Church, to permit no councils of officers, a liberty they had too often abused, and to endeavour to be master of the army.

At the beginning of his Protectorship Richard had, as I said, the pleasure of receiving Addresses from Burroughs, Cities, and Counties, to the number of fourscore and ten, and afterwards, he had the like compliment paid him from all the regiments, without any exception, so that he had reason to believe his power sufficiently established. Mean while, preparations were making for Oliver's funeral, which was solemnized with great magnificence, large sums of money being borrowed for that purpose by the new Protector (1). After the ceremonies usually paid to deceased sovereign princes, his body was deposited in Henry VII's Chapel, amongst those of the Kings and Queens of England (2).

Though the late Protector was both careful and capable to preserve himself amidst the parties then in England, and to keep them in awe, it was not however in his power to extinguish them. When he was taken out of the world, each party hoped to gain the advantage under the Protectorate of Richard, who had not his Father's qualities, and to these hopes perhaps must be ascribed, their ready concurrence in declaring him Protector. The Royalists justly flattered themselves, that the different parties into which their enemies were divided, having no longer a common head capable to govern them all together, would disunite, and that division be serviceable to the King, and perhaps procure his restoration. Those who had approved of the Government by a single person in the deceased Protector, and had been most trusted by him, hoped to preserve the same credit under the Son, which they had enjoyed under the Father, and to direct the new Protector according to their pleasure. These were the principal members of the Council, though they had also amongst them a mixture of Republicans and Fanatics.

If the Republicans had consented to acknowledge Richard, it was because they were unprepared to make any opposition. The army, chiefly composed of this party, being dispersed in several counties, the officers had neither time nor opportunity to consult together. But they despaired not of finding an occasion to displace the new Protector, and restore the Commonwealth to the state it was in, till the year 1653, when Oliver dissolved the Parliament which had formed it.

The Anabaptists were all of the Republican party, because they perceived the impossibility of establishing their Fifth Monarchy under a Protector. These were the most zealous Republicans, and the hardest to be managed, on account of their singular notions, which caused them to refer every thing to their extravagant Religion, and rendered them deaf to any reasons not drawn from their principles.

There was another set of Republicans, who, regardless of Religion, were governed by political views. They were accused of having no Religion, or of being properly Deists.

As for the Presbyterians, who were very numerous in England and Ireland, besides the Scots, who were almost all of this Sect, they had not changed their principles, since their expulsion from the Parliament in 1648. They would have gladly admitted the King with a limited power, and the firm establishment of Presbyterian Government in the Church. This principle had always caused them to remain by themselves, without being able to unite either with the Royalists, who would hearken to no limitation upon the King's power, and were averse to their Church Government, or with the Republicans, who would have neither King nor Protector. Besides, these last granted an entire liberty to all Sects, which had joined the Independent party, liberty which was inconsistent with the principles of the Presbyterians. For, though the Presbyterians had under the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., taken it very ill to be denied the free exercise of their Religion, they were by no means inclined to grant others the same liberty they had demanded for themselves. Nevertheless, as their number was considerable, and they might at last find a leader capable to conduct their affairs, the deceased Protector thought it proper to manage them, and preserve their Government in the Church, but without obliging any person to conform to it. This moderation kept the Presbyterians quiet under Oliver's Government, and the more, as they could expect no assistance from the army, as it was then modelled. But in remaining thus separate from all the other parties, they disabled themselves from making any great progress against the Independent party, who took care to keep them low. This gave the Royalists room to hope, the Presbyterians would at last be obliged to unite with them, to free themselves from the servitude in which they were held by the Independents and Republicans. The sequel will show, this hope was not groundless.

This short recapitulation of the interests of the several parties, plainly demonstrates Cromwell's capacity, who could keep them all in awe, without a positive declaration in favour of any one party. Richard proposed to begin his Protectorate with his Father's maxims. He formed the design of making himself master of the deliberations of his Council, and of reducing the army to receive his orders with submission. By these two things Oliver maintained his authority, and if he had lived, he would not have left an officer in the army of suspected fidelity. But to pursue these maxims, and execute this project, Richard should have had his Father's capacity for civil and military affairs, his bravery and resolution, and, in a word, by a series of victories, should have been able to strike terror into all who could oppose his designs. But Richard had none of those great talents to command fear and respect, or to inspire his friends with hopes of a powerful protection. So, heading no party, and being incapable to govern all, he stood exposed to their ambition and violence, without being sure of an effectual assistance when he should want it. Mean while, knowing that the bare election of his person by the Council, and the Addresses presented to him, were insufficient to establish his authority, he believed it expedient to have his dignity confirmed by Parliament, and accordingly summoned one to meet the 27th day of January 1658-9. This Parliament was to consist of two Houses, namely, a House of Commons, containing four hundred English, thirty Scotch, and thirty Irish members; and of the Other House (for as yet it had no other name) which was instead of a House of Peers, and consisted chiefly of officers. They were generally men of no birth, who had advanced themselves by military posts, during the last war.

Richard's Design to become master of the Council and the Army.

Call's Parliament of 1658-9.

(1) The Charges of it came to sixty thousand pounds. Monsey, p. 279.

(2) The Corps was removed, September 26, privately in the night, from Whitball, to Somersfort-house, where it lay in State till the 23d of November; and then it was carried, in a very solemn and magnificent manner, to Westminster-hall, where it was deposited. Some say, that it was deposited, as it outwardly appeared there, but that in reality, it was carried below Bridge, and thrown into the Tamises. And again, others affirm, that it was buried in Norfolk. See Compl. Hist. and Life of Cromwell, p. 418.—42.

1688-9. Richard had made no change in his Father's Council, but he was soon sensible, that this Council, which was entirely directed by Oliver, was aspiring to more power under his successor. On the other hand, the army appeared less devoted to the Son than to the Father. They had even begun before Oliver's death, to appear less submissive, which had obliged him to remove Lambert, and some other Colonels and Officers, who were sowing division among the troops. His design was to make other changes, by degrees, in the army, in order to reduce them to an entire obedience, but he was prevented by death. He wanted no assistance nor advice for such purposes, and commonly his designs were executed before they were publicly known, and so well established was his authority, that no officer whatsoever retained any credit amongst the troops, the moment he was cashiered. This Lambert and some others had lately experienced. Richard was delirious to tread in his Father's steps, but being sensible that his authority was not great enough, he thought he should attempt nothing, without consulting some of his principal friends. He therefore held a Privy-Council, in which he proposed, first, the admission of more new Councilors, to secure a majority, - and make himself master of the debates, in spite of the old Councilors, who were less tractable than in the time of his Father. Secondly, he proposed to reduce the army to an entire dependence upon him (1).

His friends, whom he consulted on this occasion, were self-interested, and attached to him, only in hopes of governing in his name. They apprehended, the Protector's proposal might be prejudicial to themselves, and that in procuring him an absolute power, they might be the first sufferers. He therefore found a strong opposition in these pretended friends. Instead of approving his design, they devoted him to call into his Council two Colonels, wholly devoted to the Republican party. Nor was this all; some of the leading officers of the army were informed of the Protector's designs, and that was sufficient to put them in motion. Flitwood his Brother-in-law, and Desborough his Uncle, were the first to combine against him, and cabal with the officers, to deprive him of the Generalship of the army, to which they were authorized by the Instrument of Government. But, probably, they would never have thought of using that power, if Richard had not discovered his intentions of becoming absolute master of the army, and putting himself in a condition not to want their assistance. However, as the army lay dispersed, and it was necessary, that the officers should consult together, and act in concert, for the preservation of their authority, and the opposing the Protector's designs, a snare was laid, in which he suffered himself to be taken. It was insinuated, that the Parliament which was going to sit, might prove dangerous to his authority, should they not be tractable, and therefore it was necessary to fortify himself with a good number of officers, as well to consult them, as to show the Parliament, he was supported by the army, which could not but produce a good effect. Richard believing, this advice proceeded from their zeal for his service, was easily persuaded to order every regiment to send to London as many officers as could be spared. This order was punctually executed, and immediately a great number of officers appeared in London, who formed amongst them a Council, which frequently met, and assumed the title of the Great Council of the Army.

Besides this great Council, some members of the Privy-Council, and officers of the army met also at Desborough's house, as well to consult how to deprive Richard of the Generalship, as to direct the great Council, which being composed of many inferior officers, wanted to be directed in their deliberations. The result of this Council was, that Desborough, attended with several officers, waited on the Protector with a petition, "That no officer or follower should be turned out but by sentence of a Council of war: That no member of the army should be proceeded against capitally, otherwise than by martial law: And lastly, That the army might have power to chuse their own General." As nothing was more contrary to Richard's designs than this demand, he positively rejected it, and threatened even to cashier them if they brought him any more such proposals.

The Parliament assembling the 27th of January (2), it was immediately debated in the lower House, by what right the Scots and Irish sent representatives to the English Parliament. The authority of the other House was also taken into consideration, and the same objections made to it, as had been in Oliver's last Parliament. As there were many Republicans in the House of Commons (3), great endeavours were used to suppress the other House, for fear of its becoming a last House of Lords, and opposing the re-establishment of the Commonwealth, which was the object of their most ardent wishes. The debate upon these two articles held two whole months, and it was the 28th of March, before it was resolved, by a majority of voices, that the other House should subsist, and the Scotch and Irish Representatives continue to sit in the House of Commons. After that, the Parliament made an Act, to recognize Richard Cromwell for Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland (4).

While these things were transacting in Parliament, the Great Council of Officers at Fleetwood's house, and the private Council at Deborah's continued their conferences and deliberations. At last, they presented a Petition to the Protector, desiring Fleetwood for their General. This was directly depriving the Protector of the command of the army, to which he could not consent, without exposing himself to the caprices of the principal officers, who directed the army as they pleased. Wherefore, instead of returning a favorable answer to their petition, he sharply reprimanded them, ordering them to dissolve their Council, and return to their quarters. On the other hand, the House of Commons perceiving, the officers were contriving some plot which might be prejudicial to the Parliament, voted against the holding a Council of Officers during the session of the Parliament; and, moreover, that no person should have any employ in the army, till he had taken an oath not to disturb the deliberations of the Parliament. Immediately after, these votes were sent to the other House, now called the Upper-House, for their concurrence. But as the officers were most prevalent there, they believed it no part of their duty to contradict what their comrades were doing. So, the votes of the Commons were no more capable, than the orders of the Protector, to dissipate the councils of the Officers who still continued to assemble.

At last, on the 22d of April, Richard had notice, that the officers had resolved to force him to dissolve the Parliament. He immediately assembled his Council to prevent, by their advice, this attempt. Some were of opinion, that he ought absolutely to refuse such a demand, and adhere to the Parliament, as his only support. But he was not directed to the means to defend himself against the officers, who began to assemble in the neighbourhood of Whitehall, and would probably have been too strong for his guards. Others advised him to leave Whitehall, and suffer the officers to do as they pleased with the Parliament, without any promise to dissolve it. But the officers, foreseeing, he might take that course, had now seized all the avenues about Whitehall. In short, every man proposed expedients, to which others objected insuperable difficulties. During these irresolutions, Deisborough, with a strong retinue, demanded an audience of the Protector, and required him, in the name of the officers, to dissolve the Parliament (5). Richard at first refused to grant this demand; but he was told, his refusal would be attended with danger to himself, and that, in a word, they were resolved to obtain, by fair means or foul, what they demanded. In fine, Richard, who, before Deisborough came, had not been able to take any resolution, was still more incapable to consider what was to be done, after he was surrounded with men who showed but little regard for his authority. He therefore promised to dissolve the Parliament by commission under the Great Seal. But as the Commons, informed of what passed, had adjourned themselves for three days, the Parliament was dissolved by Proclamation.

From that time, Richard was no longer regarded, though Richard still bore the title of Protector. The officers considered him as an impotent enemy, incapable of hurting them. So he lost on a sudden the support of the Parliament, without gaining that of the army. This was what cannot be denied. But those who imagine, that if he had lost by the Parliament, he would have engaged the People in his interests, and been supported by Mont and his army, build their conjecture upon a very uncertain supposition. Besides, was it in his power to refuse a dissolution of the 1659. Parliament, without hazarding his own life, or to support himself, till he should have received a sufficient aid, against the violence of the army? Be this as it will, after the Parliament was dissolved, the great council of officers thought themselves impowered to settle the Government as they pleased, without consulting the Protector, who was now regarded but as a private person (1). This Anarchy however lasted only a few days, during which the officers elected Fleetwood for their General. They discharged also by their own authority five Colonels, who advised Richard to adhere to the Parliament, namely, Ingoldby, Geffs, Whaley, Lord Falconbridge Brother-in-law to Richard, and Howard afterwards Earl of Carlisle, and restored Lambert and others dismissed by Cromwell a little before his death. After this, they considered of settling the Government, it being impossible for things to continue long in their present situation.

Lambert was a man of immoderate ambition, and would not have scrupled to follow the example of Oliver, had the juncture seemed favorable to him. But Fleetwood being his General, and the idol of the army, he could not hope to succeed in an attempt to seize the Government. He therefore thought proper to wait a more favorable opportunity, and, in the mean time, hinder Fleetwood from putting himself at the head of the Government, whether under the name of Protector, or any other title, to which he had several reasons to believe he was aspiring. First, Cromwell had once named him for his successor by an instrument under his own hand, and many believed this instrument had been artfully conveyed out of the way, either during Cromwell's life, or after his death, lest it should obstruct his Son Richard's election. It was even said, that Cromwell's nomination of his Son in the time of his illness, was only the contrivance of Secretary Thurlo, and another person, to procure the succession for Richard. Secondly, Fleetwood was one of the most zealous Enthusiasts, of whom the army was full, and therefore looked upon with veneration by the soldiers, and judged most worthy to be Cromwell's successor. Thirdly, it was hardly to be doubted, that it was the interest of the army to chuse a Protector, who should depend on them, and in his turn support their credit. This Lambert considered, but as it was not for his advantage to have Fleetwood raised to a Dignity to which he himself aspired, he secretly engaged Colonel Liburn to cabal among the inferior officers, and break Fleetwood's measures, if they pointed to the Protectorship, whilst he regularly made his court to him, and endeavoured by his flatteries to influence him as Cromwell had formerly influenced Fairfax. This example made Lambert hope, that he might the same way put himself one day at the head of the Government.

Lambert's cabal being made with the greatest secrecy, Fleetwood, as General, convened his officers to Wallingford House to settle the Government. All the superior officers came, but at the same time the inferior, by the intrigues of Lambert and Liburn, assembled at St. James's in much greater numbers. In this assembly the settlement of the Government was likewise debated, and occasion taken, to magnify the happiness which England enjoyed under the administration of the Parliament, from the 6th of December 1648, to the 20th of April 1653, when it was dissolved by Cromwell. Their prudence, steadiness, and happy success in England, Scotland, Ireland, and in the Dutch war were extolled, with more intimations of advice, that nothing could be more advantageous to the three nations, than the restoration of that Parliament (2).

This debate was carried no farther; but it sufficed to convince the assembly at Wallingford House that a division between them and the inferior officers could not be dangerous to both, and that their best way was to join with the inferior officers in restoring the Long-Parliament. It is not known what was the design of the chief officers with regard to the Government, but it is certain, the proposal of the inferior officers was contrary neither to the principles nor the sentiments of the army in general. This will be easily perceived, when it is considered, that the officers and soldiers, for the most part, were Independents, Anabaptists, Enthusiasts, Republicans, such in a manner as were the members of the Parliament dissolved in 1653, and now proposed to be restored. However this be, all the officers being united, declared for the good Old Cause, that is, for the cause supported by the Parliament, which brought the King to the scaffold, and turned the Monarchy into a Commonwealth. It was therefore resolved in a General Council at Fleetwood's house, to restore the Long-Parliament.

Mean while, as this Parliament had no reason to be pleased with the army, which, in 1653, took part with Cromwell against them, the great officers were afraid, that when the members were restored to their authority, they would think of being revenged. Besides, they knew the resolution and firmness of these members, who would infallibly keep the army in a state of dependence. The officers therefore judged it absolutely necessary, before they proceeded, to demand certain conditions, and to be previously assured of the compliance of the Parliament, when they should resume their authority. For this purpose, they had conferences with some of the members, who had been the leading men in that Parliament, namely, Vanie, Hogstrig, Sest, Salway to engage them to promise, these conditions should be granted. But these members would not make any such promise, under colour, it did not belong to them to preclude the resolutions of the Parliament. This refusal rendered them suspected to the superior officers, but the inferior, being the most numerous, overlooked this difficulty, and were contented with a verbal promise from these four members, that they would use their endeavours to procure a grant of these conditions.

THINGS being thus settled, Lambert at the head of a considerable number of officers (3), repaired to the house of Lentiball, Speaker of the Long-Parliament, and presented to him the Declaration of the great Council of Officers, by which the members of the Parliament, dissolved by Cromwell April the 20th 1653, were invited to return to the exercise of their authority. Lentiball answered, he would communicate the Declaration to the members then in London, which he did the next day, and the invitation being accepted, they met in Parliament the 7th of May, to the number of only forty-two (4). Thus the three nations were once more under the tyrannical dominion of a Parliament, which had not feared to imbue their hands in the blood of their Sovereign: but with this difference, that the number was reduced to the half of what it was in 1648, when the Presbyterian members were excluded. Hence they were called in derision the Rump-Parliament, in allusion to a fowl all devoured but the Rump. The Presbyterian members, who had been expelled in 1648, would have resumed their seats, but none were admitted besides those who had sat, from the first of January 1648, to the 20th of April 1653, and in this the pretended Parliament was supported by the officers, whose interest it was, not to suffer the Presbyterians to prevail in the House.

When the Parliament was restored to their authority, they sent Clarges to Monk, to engage him to submit to the new Government. They knew, Monk was not of their principles, and if they had dared, instead of desiring his acquiescence, they would have sent him a successor, to govern Scotland. But Monk had so established himself in that country, that being master of the fortified Places, and assured of the affection of the Scots and of his army, it would have been dangerous to deprive him of his Government against his will. It was therefore judged safest by the Parliament to gain him by fair means, and undermine by degrees his credit and authority in the army. Monk had so little foreseen the late change in England, that he had not time to take any measures to regulate his conduct. When he founded his officers, he found they were pre-engaged by letters from their friends in London. So, all he could do after the arrival of Clarges, was to acquiesce, and express his satisfaction to see the Parliament restored, though he was convinced, the leading-men both in the Parliament and army were not his friends.

Four days after the Parliament met, Lambert, attended by several officers, presented a petition and address from the general Council of officers, in which, after some compliments, they demanded,

"1. That the liberty of the persons, and property of the estates of all free People of these nations, be main-

(1) Ludlow says, one great offence given by Richard to the Nation was, by his Irreligion. For an Officer having murmured at the advancement of persons, who had been Cavaliers, to Commissions in the Army, was brought to Whitehall to answer for it. Richard, in a deriding manner, asked him, "Whether he would have him prefer none but those that were golly? Here, continued he, is Dick Ingoldby, who can neither pray nor preach, and yet I will trust him before you all." Mem. Tom. 2. p. 633.

(2) Whitelock says, upon the Dissolution of the Parliament, all matters were at a stand; the Army had thoughts of raising Money without a Parliament; but upon advice, they durst not adventure upon it, but thought it a safer way to restore the Members of the Long Parliament. The great Officers of the Army were advised to consider better of their design of bringing in the Members of the Old Parliament, who were most of them discontented, for their being end in bringing in the King; but the Officers had resolved on it. "2. That there may be such a just and due regulation "of Law, and Courts of Justice and Equity, as that they "may be a protection, and not vexatious or oppressive to "the People of these nations.

"3. That by an Act of oblivion, all and every person "and persons, who have, since the 19th of April 1653,
"mediately or immediately advised, acted, or done any "matter or thing whatsoever, in reference to the several "changes or alterations in the Government of these na-

"and interests of these nations.

"11. That to the end the legislative authority of this "Commonwealth may not, by their long sitting, become "burthenome or inconvenient, there may be effectual pro"vision made for a due succession thereof.

"12. And for the better satisfaction, and more firm
"union of the forces of this Commonwealth, in this jun"cture of affairs, for preserving and maintaining the prin"ciples, and other matters thereunto subservient, we do
"appoint, make, take, and own the Lord Charles "Fleetwood Lieutenant-General of the army, to be commander in chief of the land-forces of this Common"wealth.

"13. That in order to the establishing and securing the "peace, welfare, and freedom of the people of these na"tions, for the ends before expressed, the legislative power
"thereof may be in a representative of the people, con"sisting of a House, successively chosen by the people, in "such a way and manner as this Parliament shall judge
"meet, and of a select Senate, co-ordinate in power, of "able and faithful persons, eminent for godliness, and such "as continue adhering to this cause.

"14. That the administration of all executive power "of Government, may be in a Council of State, consist"ing of a convenient number of persons qualified, in all "respects, as aforesaid.

"15. That all debts contracted by his late Highness, "or his Father, since the 15th of December 1653, may "be satisfied, and that an honourable revenue of ten thou"sand pounds per Annum, with a convenient house, may "be settled upon him and his heirs for ever; and ten thou"sand pounds per Annum more upon him during life; and "upon his honourable Mother, eight thousand pounds per "Annum during her life, to the end a mark of the high "esteem this nation hath of the good service done by "his Father, our ever renowned General, may remain to "posterity."

The Parliament returned a general answer to this petition,
"and thanked the army for their affection to the publick.
"Then, taking it into consideration, they approved of all "the articles in general, but appointed a particular Committee "to examine those which concerned the Government. As "to what related to Richard Cromwell and his Mother, it "was not to be debated, till they should be assured of his sub"mission to the Government. For this purpose, a Commit"tee was sent to inform him of the resolutions of the House, "and to require his acquiescence in the late change. The "day after, Richard delivered to them the following answer
"in writing:

"I have perused the resolve and declaration which you "were pleased to deliver to me the other night, and for "information touching what is mentioned in the said re"solve, I have caused a true state of my debts to be trans"cribed, and annexed to this paper, which will shew what "they are, and how they were contracted.

"As to that part of the resolve, whereby the Committee "are to inform themselves, how far I do acquiesce in the "Government of this Commonwealth, as it is declared
"by this Parliament:

"I trust, my past carriage hitherto hath manifested my "acquiescence in the will and disposition of God, and that I "love and value the peace of this Commonwealth much a"bove my own concerns; and I desire, that by this,
"a measure of my future deportment may be taken, which,
"through the assistance of God, shall be such as shall bear
"the same witness, having, I hope, in some degree, "learned rather to reverence and submit to the hand of "God, than to be unquiet under it. And (as to the late "providences that have fallen out amongst us) however,
"in respect of particular engagements that lay upon me,
"I could not be active in making a change in the govern"ment of the Nations; yet, thorough the goodness of "God, I can freely acquiesce in it being made; and do
"hold myself obliged, as (with other men) I expect pro"tection from the present Government, for to demean my "self with all peaceableness under it, and to procure to the "utmost of my power, that all in whom I have any inter"est do the same."

RICHARD CROMWELL.

When the Parliament examined the account of Richard's The Parlia-
"debts, the article of expences for his Father's funeral was ment great "rejected, so that Richard was forced to pay that debt out sum but
"of his inheritance, which swept away the greatest part 20000*l.* to "of his estate, which was not very large, considering Cromwell's pay his "advancement during his life. As to the revenue, and an- Debt, and "nual pension desired by the officers for Richard and his order him to "Mother, the Parliament referred the consideration of them quit White-
"to another opportunity, and contented themselves with hall.
"assigning twenty thousand pounds for the payment of his private Philipps "debts (1.) The Members had but too much cause to Whitestocke.
"complain of Oliver Cromwell, who had deceived, and "shamefully dismissed them, to think themselves obliged to "do so much honour to his memory, and bestow so great "advantages on his Widow and Son. When they granted "him the twenty thousand pounds, they required him to re"move from Whitehall in six days (2.)

(1) Wentworth says, That his Debts were 30,000*l.* but that he had paid 10,000*l.* and that the Parliament ordered 20,000*l.* to be paid to him, and gave him 10,000*l.* to pay the Debts he had contracted on the publick account. Tom. 2.

(2) Wentworth says, That he went to France, and continued five years in exile; at Paris, but upon the rumour of a War between France and England, he returned to England, and was at Cambridge in 1642. 1. of the

It may be observed in the 12th article of the petition of the officers, that, as they expressed themselves, they did not intend to leave to the Parliament the liberty of not appointing a General, or of naming any other than Fleetwood, since, instead of petitioning, they said in that article, We do unanimously acknowledge the Lord Charles Fleetwood to be commander in chief of the land-forces of the Commonwealth. The Parliament thought it not proper then to examine the manner in which this article was expressed, for fear of raising some difference between them and the army, at a time when they derived their authority only from the declaration of the officers who had restored them.

Fleetwood therefore was appointed commander in chief of the land-forces of England, Scotland, and Ireland, but only for one year. This resolution being taken, the Parliament voted, That Fleetwood should have power to sign and seal such commissions, for the constituting of officers under him, as should be approved by the Parliament, and nominated by Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, and the Colonels Lambert, Desboroughs, Ludlow, Berry, or the major part of them, who were made commissioners for that purpose. But upon the second reading of the Bill, the clause empowering Fleetwood to sign commissions was altered, and it was ordered, that all commissions, both to the commission-officers of the army, and the captains of the fleet, should be signed by the Speaker of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, to be written by the Clerks attending the Council of State (1), and delivered to the officers gratis by the Speaker, in the Parliament-House. This was a plain indication, that the Parliament pretended, that the officers should owe their advancement to them alone. The same day the Parliament voted, That the Government of Ireland should be by commissioners, nominated and appointed by Parliament, and not by one person, and that Henry Cromwell should be acquainted with the order, and required forthwith to repair to the Parliament. He peaceably submitted, though, in all probability, if he had been inclined to resist, the new Governors would have found it difficult to remove him. He was extremely beloved in Ireland, both by the army and the English inhabitants, having never injured any person, but, on the contrary, obliged every one, as far as lay in his power. But, doubtless, not thinking himself secure of success, and receiving no orders from his Brother, he was unwilling to undertake so important an affair. All the Historians are unanimous in their praises of him, and generally believe, that if he had been Protector instead of his elder Brother, the officers would have met with their match, or not attempted what they undertook against Richard.

Fleetwood, Desborough, Lambert, and the rest of the principal officers, were by no means pleased with the proceedings of the Parliament, but knowing, the inferior officers considered their dependence on the Parliament as an advantage, they dissembled their resentments, and received their commissions from the Speaker. On the other hand, the Parliament believed it of the utmost importance, to be master of the army; which they flattered themselves, would enable them to rule peaceably and absolutely, and, without doubt, perpetuate their authority. But till this was done, they saw they were to expect a strong opposition, considering the restless temper of the principal officers, who were ever seeking to make themselves necessary, for fear of losing their posts. This was the first, and almost open design of the Parliament. For this purpose, the Committee appointed to examine commissions was continued, who knowing the intentions of the House, made great alterations in the army, displacing such as were suspected, and substituting others of more assured fidelity. The same thing was done to the army commanded by Monk, and many officers being removed, others were appointed to succeed them, and those that were displaced were most confided in by Monk. Clerges had now acquainted Monk with the Parliament's designs, which were so manifest, and Monk had but too much cause to perceive them, by the alterations, the Committee would have made in the army of Scotland. He writ to the Committee, for, as to show them, he plainly saw their design to undermine his authority. He used some expressions in his letter, which made the Parliament apprehensive there would be danger of driving a man to extremities, who had twelve thousand men, and all Scotland at his disposal. For this reason, the officers, appointed by the committee to go into Scotland, received orders, not to proceed on their journey. But this was only to gain time, in expectation of a more favorable opportunity.

The 18th of June the Parliament voted the continuation of the monthly assessment of thirty-five thousand pounds, imposed by the Parliament of the year 1656. Then, commissioners were named for the civil Government of Ireland, land, and a commission granted to Edmund Ludlow, who was one of the King's Judges, and a most zealous Republican, to command the forces of that Country.

Mean time, the Parliament having received confused intimations of a plot forming in favour of the King, the Royalists had orders to withdraw twenty miles from London. This intimation was not groundless. In March this year, the King, by a declaration, had empowered commissioners to treat in his name with those, who having been against him, or his Father, were willing to return to his obedience. These commissioners spared neither pains nor promises, to increase the number of the King's friends, and certainly there could not be a more favorable opportunity. All were weary of the tyranny of an Independent Parliament, consisting of forty persons, and of an army, whose officers were mostly Fanatics, and who, under colour of promoting piety, and extending the Kingdom of Christ, had only their interest in view. The Presbyterians themselves, and the members of that party, who had been expelled the House in 1648, seeing little appearance of ever recovering the ground they had lost, and that nevertheless they remained exposed to the tyranny of the Independents and Fanatics, agreed at last with the King's party, to deliver the nation from the servitude to which it was reduced. The particulars and terms of this union are not known, because the Historians who speak of it, being all Royalists, have not thought fit to do so much honour to the Presbyterians. But it can't be concealed, that from this time, the Presbyterians no longer appeared as the King's enemies, but on the contrary, as will hereafter be seen, very much promoted his restoration.

It was on the hopes, that the Presbyterians would assist, or at least not oppose them, that the Royalists projected an insurrection in several parts of the Kingdom, in expectation, it would at last become general. For this purpose, they intended to seize at once Gloucester, Lynn, Plymouth, Exeter and Chester. They believed their measures so well taken, that they doubted not of success. For they still relied on the People's affection for the King, in which they were often mistaken. Mr. Mordaunt crossed the sea, to inform the King of the project, which he thought so well laid, that he repaired secretly to Calais (2), and then to St. Malo's, to be nearer England, in case the Plot succeeded. But this project vanished like the rest. Sir Richard Willis, who, as I have said, betrayed the King's Party, informed Thurolo of it, and Thurolo the Council of State, who immediately put the Militia in safe hands, and took other precautions, which inevitably obstructed the execution of the project. Maffey was taken in attempting to surprize Chester, but found means to escape. Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir Horatio Townshend, who were gone to the West (3) to serve the King, were arrested and sent to prison. There was only Sir George Booth, who assembling about four or five thousand men, took Chester, and published a Manifesto against the tyranny of the Parliament, without any mention of the King, intending to make the publick believe, that the People's discontent was the sole motive of his taking arms. Sir Thomas Middleton joined him with some troops, but these two united bodies were so inconsiderable, that Lambert, who marched against them, by order of Parliament, easily defeated them, and re-took Chester. Sir George Booth had the good fortune at first to escape, but was taken some days after in woman's clothes, and brought to the Tower of London. Middleton retired to a castle of his own, which held out but few days. It did not appear on this occasion that the People had the King's interest much at heart (4).

During these transactions, the King's friends not doubting of success, sent the Reverend Nicolas Monk, the General's brother, into Scotland, to engage him in the King's party. Some have pretended, that Monk, full of hopes, that the King's party in England would succeed, was upon the point of marching to support them, but was stopped by the news of Booth's defeat, and forced to feign

(1) The Parliament had named a Council of State, but the more immediate executive power. It was to consist of thirty-one Persons, whereof five were to be Members of Parliament, and ten more. The twenty-one were, Whitechek, Sir John Haslerig, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Sir Henry Vane, Sir William Gouster, Henry Meade, Charles Jullier, Sir John, Thomas Scott, Robert Reynolds, Wallop, Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, Major Sawney, Colonel Montagu, Argemont Sidney, Walton, Drowel, Thompson, Sydenham, Jones, Downes, and Ludlow. The ten were, Richard Brinsford, Lord Fairfax, Major General Lambert, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir Horatio Townshend, Colonel Desborough, Berry, Bannet, Talbot, and Heywood. Ludlow, Tom. 2. p. 676. They had also nominated the Judges and Commissioners of the Great Seal, a new one being made different from the old one. Whitechek, p. 130.

devoted to the Parliament. I cannot easily believe that Monk so early thought of serving the King. However, it can't be denied, that the Parliament looked on Monk as a man in whom they could not confide, because his principles were very far from Fanaticism, which then infected both Parliament and army. This the Parliament plainly showed, immediately after Booth's and Middleton's defeat by Lambert. For judging that victory would keep Monk in awe, they readily confirmed the changes before intended in the army of Scotland. Monk was so offended with this proceeding, that he writ to the Speaker, to desire his dismissal, but Clarges his Brother-in-law prevailed with the Speaker not to communicate this letter to the Parliament, who doubtless would not have failed to grant his request.

As the peace between France and Spain was to be treated at St. Jean de Luz, by the prime Ministers of the two Crowns, the King believed his presence at this negotiation might procure him some advantage. He therefore departed for Fontarabia in September, and crossed the Kingdom of France inognito. I shall speak presently of the success of this journey, but must first relate the change which happened in England.

The principal officers of the army, who kept in London, were still highly displeased with the Parliament, plainly perceiving, their design was to become master of the army. Wherefore, they began to think of means to prevent this design, and maintain themselves in their credit and posts. They had for this purpose several secret meetings. But one difficulty was to be surmounted, before any resolution could be taken. This was, that the inferior officers were very well pleased with the Parliament, who greatly cared themselves, intending to use them, to get rid of their commanders. Lambert, who commanded the forces about Chyler, was entirely in the party of Fleetwood and Deborah, knowing, the Parliament had no better intentions for him, than for the others. Besides, his chief aim was to procure a perpetual confirmation of the Generalship to Fleetwood, in hopes to govern and make use of him for his own advancement to that post, as Cromwell had before done to Fairfax. Though he was absent from London, he was informed of what passed at their meetings, and gave his advice. At last, after many deliberations, it was resolved, that Lambert should try to gain the inferior officers of his army, which was less difficult, than to gain the officers of the rest of the army, who were dispersed in different quarters. Pursuant to this resolution, Lambert coming to Derby, so managed, that his officers, whom he had carefully inspired with discontent, met to draw a petition, which, before it was offered to the Parliament, was to be communicated to Fleetwood, for the approbation of the general-council of officers. Sir Aribur Haslerig having received advice that the petition was come to London, informed the Commons, and told them, the army was contriving a very dangerous plot, of which it was necessary to prevent the consequences. Upon this declaration Fleetwood was examined by the Parliament, whether he knew any thing of the petition? He answered, he had a copy of it, and the original was in the hands of three officers, whom he named. Whereupon he was ordered to give notice to these officers to attend the House that afternoon with the Petition, which was done, and the petition read. The stile was in the fashionable language of that time, amongst those who pretended to a more exalted piety. The substance of it was to this effect:

1. That the Parliament would be pleased not to suffer the petition of the general-council of officers at Wallingford House to be laid asleep, as it was the best expedient yet offered to a happy and durable settlement.

2. That since a great many ill-affected persons, were endeavouring to sow division in the army, the Parliament would be pleased, for the preservation of that union, wherein its greatest strength lay, to establish firmly the Lord Fleetwood in the command of the army, whose commission was to expire in a few months, with Lambert for his Lieutenant-general, Deborah for the command of the Horse, and Monk of the Foot.

3. That considering the negligence of a great many persons intrusted with public employments; the ill-designs of the enemies of the good Cause; the activity of some to favour those designs, and the affection and zeal shewn by others for a blameable neutrality, at a time, when their assistance is most wanted; the Parliament would be pleased to make a diligent inquiry upon this Subject, and proceed to the depriving of the guilty of all their employs: That on the contrary, such as in this distracted juncture declared willingly and cheerfully for the good Cause, either in the county-troops, or Militia-voluntiers, or otherwise, may be looked on as friends, encouraged, satisfied in their arrears, and invested with authority in their several countries.

4. That in the late insurrections some considerable corporations having assisted the enemy, received and furnished them with arms; the Parliament would be pleased to give some signal mark of their disfavour against them; and for the future to regulate the corporations, that persons well qualified, according to the government of a well constituted Commonwealth, may be intrusted with authority of the magistracy in any of the several towns, that to the footsteps of monarchy may be rooted out.

5. That all persons whatsoever, Magistrates, Ministers, or others, who have secretly stirred up the inhabitants of these nations to war and commotions against the Parliament, and particularly to the late Insurrections, may be proceeded against as the Parliament in their judgment shall think fit.

The House, in a debate upon this petition, the next morning voted, That to have any more general officers in the army than are already settled by the Parliament, is needless, chargeable, and dangerous to the Commonwealth; and that Fleetwood shall acquaint them with this resolve (1).

Fleetwood having communicated this vote to some officers at his own house, it was resolved, That the petition should not be infixed on, but, on the contrary, an address offered to the Parliament, to profess an adherence to their authority against the common enemy, and that they would stand by them in the settlement of the Commonwealth, against all disturbances whatsoever; and that this should be prepared and brought to be read, and considered by a general Council of officers, to meet for that purpose, the 27th of September.

Those who had the care of preparing this address, discharged their trust, in a manner little agreeable to the intention of the persons who ordered it, as will be seen presently. However, the address was approved in the general Council of officers, by a majority of voices, and signed by Phillips, two hundred and thirty officers, who were in and about London, but was not presented till the 5th of October. In this interval of seven or eight days, the officers sent a copy of the petition to General Monk for his concurrence, tho' they were resolved not to stay for his answer. On the other hand, the Parliament took all possible measures to hinder its being presented, whether by satisfying the army in its arrears, or by sowing division amongst the officers, as they knew the address was not universally approved, the visible aim whereof was, to beget a breach between the army and the Parliament. But all their endeavours were fruitless. The 5th of October, Deborah, with many other officers, went to the House to present the petition. It was introduced by a long Preamble, in which it was pretended, That the intentions of the army were maliciously represented to the Parliament by ill-affected persons, to create division betwixt the Parliament and the Army; and that it was in justification of themselves, from such false accusations, that they presented this humble address, containing the four following assertions:

1. We do humbly and plainly declare, That notwithstanding what any persons may suggest, or say to the contrary, We are not for, but against the setting up any single person whatsoever in supreme authority: And for a demonstration hereof we may appeal to your own judgments, upon our late actions, wherein, since our Declaration of the sixth of May last, we have, with all industry and faithfulness, endeavoured to render ourselves servicable to you and the Commonwealth, and have cheerfully observed your commands, some of us with our lives in your late service: Wherein to our great encouragement, the Lord hath once more appeared to own you and your army, and the Good Old Cause, for which we have contended. And at the late return of this Parliament to the discharge of their remaining trust, we did with simplicity and plainness, in our humble Petition and Address presented to you, manifest our hearts and desires, and that with much unanimity and fullness of consent, which we apprehend was well accepted by you.

2. That we have not since changed our principles leading to a well-regulated Commonwealth, wherein the liberties of the People thereof, both spiritual and civil, may be fully secured, and persons of known integrity, piety, and ability, employed in places of trust and concernment; but resolve, by the assistance of God, to remain constant to them: And make it our humble prayer to God, that he would incline your hearts effectually to prosecute the same, and make you instrumental in bringing forth such a foundation of Government, whereby all the good people of these nations may rationally expect,

(1) This Vote was contrived and promoted by Haslerig, Neail, &c. Whitelock, p. 684.

659. "that such liberties and rights shall be preserved to them and their posterities. And we can truly say, that it is in our hearts earnestly to desire that God would crown you with the honour of making these nations happy, by such a Settlement as may not be liable to every change of Governors, and to have the peace thereof disturbed by introducing new Governments.

"3. Whereas a Petition and Proposals were lately drawn up by the officers of the Brigade, that (under the command of Major-General Lambert) hazarded themselves in your service with good success, whereby, through the blessing of God upon them, and others of your faithful friends and servants, the peace of this Commonwealth is still continued: And the said Petition was sent up to some officers here, to be presented to the Lord Fleetwood; which had been by some interpreted to evil and sinister ends, and from thence suggestions derived, as if they were intentions to violate the Parliament, to set up a single Person, or another General: In order thereto, we do sincerely profess (whatever the design of any persons may be to promote such causeless jealousies) we have had no other than faithfulness and candour in our hearts and actions towards the Parliament; nor do we apprehend (with submission we may speak it) any reason or cause of offence to be conceived against your faithful servants, who lately gave so ample proof of their fidelity and courage.

"4. We cannot but esteem our selves unhappy to have been so misrepresented to the Parliament, as should occasion such a public admonition upon record; and considering what evil use may be made of these things by the public enemy, and to the end they may be disappointed of their hopes, and all such persons discouraged, as shall go about for the future to promote jealousies, or by misinformation, to beget divisions between the Parliament and their faithful servants the army: And that a good understanding may be preserved between them, we humbly pray:

"1. That the officers of the army, and particularly those who have reason to bear the marks of your favour for their faithfulness in the late northern expedition, may stand right in your opinion, and have your countenance.

"2. That whatsoever person or persons shall for the future groundlessly and causelessly, inform the House against your servants, thereby creating jealousies, and scandalous imputations upon them, may be brought to examination, justice, and condign punishment.

"3. That it being an undoubted right of the people to have a liberty, in a peaceable and submissive way, to petition the supreme authority, which liberty hath been by your selves asserted, allowed, and approved of; We cannot but also assert the said liberty, and humbly conceive, that your faithful servants of the army, have no ways forfeited their rights as freemen, and that therefore they hope it will be no offence for them to submit their humble desires to the Parliament.

"4. That you would be pleased to take into your serious consideration, the necessitous condition of the poor soldiers of your armies, and that all possible care may be taken for their timely supply, their wants being such as earnestly call for it: And that some speedy and effectual course may be taken to provide for the maimed soldiers, and the poor widows and orphans of such as have been slain in your service, that the blessing of God may be upon you.

"5. That such who have freely offered themselves in the several counties and cities of these nations, to own and stand by you and your cause in the late insurrections, with the hazard of all which is dear unto them, may have your encouragement, and be employed in places of trust and command.

"6. That it being a thing granted by all, that without due execution of martial Discipline, the peace, union, and good-government of an army cannot be preserved; the discipline of the army may be preserved inviolable, and in particular, that no officer or soldier of the army may be cashiered, or dismissed from their places, without a due proceeding at a Court-Martial, or by his own consent, except in cases of reduction or disbanding.

"7. That it being judged necessary by the Parliament, for the keeping of the army under such a conduct, as may render the same serviceable to the Commonwealth, to appoint a Committee of Nominations, for the proposing of officers to the Parliament, for their approbation; We humbly pray, that no officers may be brought into the army, but such as shall first come under the consideration of the said Committee, and be by them presented.

"8. The office of the commander in chief of the army, being of so great concernment to the peace of this Commonwealth, and his commission at present (as we conceive) expiring within a few months, we humbly pray, that the consideration of that matter may come before you, and some such effectual course be taken therein, as may prevent our fears, and the hazard of leaving the army to confusion.

"9. And that you would retain a good opinion of your army, and, against all discouragement whatsoever, proceed in the carrying on of that good work intrusted in your hands, for the glory of God, and advantage of these nations. In the prosecution whereof, thro' the help of our God, we shall be found (notwithstanding all endeavours to the contrary) faithful to you and this Commonwealth."

How respectful sverer the terms of this address might be, the Parliament were not pleased with the contents, as it seemed to teach them their duty, or rather to reproach them for neglecting it. They had forgot, that this was the language of the army to the Presbyterian Parliament, in support of the Independent-party, and how grateful it had been to them. It was manifest, the officers fought an occasion of quarrel, and the Parliament was but too sensible of it. But they had no support against the army, and the hopes of division amongst the officers, because many opposed the presenting this address, was their only resource. For this reason, after some Members had warmly inveighed against the insolence of the officers, the House, however, returned a moderate answer, to gain time, and keep them in temper, whom they were unable to resist. The officers therefore, who had delivered the address, were called in and thanked by the Speaker, for their affection and faithfulness to the Parliament; to which he added, that the Parliament had already taken into consideration the relief of the maimed soldiers, orphans, and widows; and had also settled a way for satisfaction of the arrears due to the army, and would endeavour to bring the same to speedy effect.

Desborough brought this answer to the general Council of officers, who assembled that day. But as they were informed of the Speeches against them in the House, it was suspected, that the Parliament intended only to gain time, to strengthen themselves, or to change the constitution of the army. Wherefore, they resolved to cause their address to be signed by all the regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and to write to them on that subject, which was done the same day.

Two days after, the Parliament receiving a letter from Monk, with assurances of his entire obedience, returned him a gracious answer, letting him know the high esteem they had of his services, with a promise to revoke all the orders which might have given him any cause of disgust. The Parliament and officers thought it of great importance to gain Monk to their interest. The Parliament's hopes of that General's good disposition towards them, gave them a little more firmness than they had at first shown. So, in their debates upon the proposals of the officers, a particular answer was returned to each article, and the officers given to understand, that their complaints were causeless, and the Parliament neither obliged nor pleased to give them an account of their conduct. This answer convinced the officers, Lambert to submit to the Parliament, or endeavour a dissolution. But they could not resolve to submit, without trying first to render themselves superior. To this end, Lambert marched his Brigade towards London, and appeared there himself to support his friends. The Parliament, on their side, seeing a breach with the army was not very remote, hastily passed an Act, to declare it High-treason to levy money upon the People, without the consent of Parliament. Herein their aim was to hinder the army's subsistence. They did still more: For Monk the Clergyman being arrived from Scotland, with assurances from his brother the General of his supporting the Parliament, and marching to their assistance, if required, Lambert, Desborough, and some other principal officers, who had signed the address, were displaced by the Parliament. Then they annulled Fleetwood's commission, and named commissioners (11) for the government of the army, from the 11th of October to the 22d of February. But these proceedings not being supported with power, the officers received the Parliament's orders with scorn.

Mean time, the Council of State, being informed that Lambert was assembling the army, ordered two regiments to Westminster, to guard the Parliament, whose colonels and officers were devoted to them, and had refused to sign the address. This did not prevent Lambert from executing his design. Having drawn some regiments into London, on the 13th of October he secured all the avenues, to the Parliament (1). Presently after, the Speaker appearing in his coach as he was going to the House, was stopped by Lambert, and forced to return. Then he sent to the colonels of the two regiments in Palace-yard, to retire to their quarters, which they refusing to do, he smiled and bid them stay there as long as they pleased. But at the same time, he took care to stop all the members who were going to the House, and hinder them from entering (2). So the Parliament, as well for want of a sufficient number of members, as for the absence of the Speaker, not being able to sit that day, the two Regiments placed at Westminster to secure them from violence retired, after having remained there till night. They were no sooner gone, than Fleetwood seized the posts, and placed a strong guard at the door of the Parliament-house, to hinder the members from assembling. Next day, the discontented officers were appointed to guard the Parliament, and sent others to fill their places. The soldiers obeyed their new officers, and abandoned the old.

This ANARCHY lasted ten days, before the officers, now grown superior, thought of settling any form of Government. All they did, was to nominate ten of their own body to form a Council, to take care of the most urgent affairs. Then they declared Fleetwood their General, Lambert their Lieutenant-general, and Desborough Com-missary-general of the Horse. They established likewise a Council of Seven to nominate such officers as were not suspected, with orders to exclude those, in whom they could not confide. Mean while a discipline so exact was observed by the troops, that it was wonderful to see soldiers so submissive to their officers, and so inoffensive to the People during such an anarchy. As the officers were still uneasy about Monk, whom they suspected, because he was not of their principles, and besides, was an enemy to Lambert, Colonel Cobbet was sent to try to gain him to their party, with secret orders, in case he could not succeed, to endeavour to corrupt his troops, and, if possible, put him under an arrest. Clarges gave Monk intelligence of Cobbet's secret commission.

During these transactions in England, the King was in his journey to Fontenabia, where he arrived but very little time before the treaty between the two Crowns was concluded, having by mistake (3) proceeded to Saragossa, where he had no business, while the two Ministers of France and Spain finished their treaty. But in all likelihood, he would have received no advantage from that treaty, tho' he had arrived at the beginning. Nay, it is difficult to conceive, what advantages he proposed to himself from this journey, nor has the Earl of Clarendon thought fit to inform his readers. Don Lewis de Haro, prime Minister of Spain, received him very civilly, and expressed a sense of his unhappy condition, by making him a present of seven thousand pistoles. But Cardinal Mazarin, for fear of rendering himself suspected to the Parliament, would not so much as see him. So the King left Fontenabia, in order for Brussels, where he arrived the latter end of December.

disposition of the Parliament, they agreed to establish a Committee of Safety (4), and put the Government into their hands. Sir Henry Vane, who, since the last change, had come into the measures of the army, was of this committee, with Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborough, Ludlow, &c. The Great-Council of Officers as sole sovereign then of the three Kingdoms, authorized this Committee to execute all the Powers of the late Council of State, with authority to punish Delinquents concerned in the late conspiracy: to give indemnity to all who had acted for the Commonwealth since the year 1649: to oppose and suppress all rebellions and insurrections: to dispose of all places of trust that were void, and remove such as were scandalous: [to treat with foreign States: to raise the Militia:] and lastly, to make sale and composition for the estates of Delinquents. At the same time, a declaration was published, to annul the Acts or Orders of the Parliament, of the 10th, 11th, and 12th of October. In this Paper the officers declared, that they had no design to erect a military Government, but had already lodged the executive part in a Committee of Safety, who were to prepare such a form of Government as might best comport with a free state and Commonwealth, without a single Person, Kingship, or House of Lords. This declaration ended with some scriptural expressions, adapted to the taste and practice of the Godly Party.

While the officers ruled in England, Monk was greatly embarrassed in Scotland. He was indeed at the head of the Government, and of twelve thousand men, most of whom he could rely on, though many of the officers were Fanatics, or inclined to be so, and consequently justly suspected by him. But this army was supported by money regularly paid from England, Scotland being unable to maintain them. Monk had thereby been able to keep the army under strict discipline, and to procure Scotland a tranquillity, to which she had long been a stranger, tho' the Clergy were dissatisfied with the liberty of Conscience granted to all except Catholics and Prelates. But forts erected by Monk in several parts of the Kingdom, and well garrisoned by him, prevented all insurrections. The changes in England since Cromwell's death, disturbed Monk's peaceable state in Scotland. For though he was equally cared for by the army and Parliament, because they either wanted or feared him, he perceived, that on which side soever the advantage should turn, he was to be the victim. He had already experienced it in the Parliament's endeavours to undermine his credit, and could not doubt, if that Parliament had subsisted, he should have been, by one means or other, displaced, because he was feared. On the other hand, his hopes were no better from the army, which was properly commanded by Lambert, under the name of Fleetwood. Lambert considered Monk as a formidable rival, who would never suffer him to execute his designs, if it was in his power to prevent him (5). Monk, for his part, would never have been willing to submit to Lambert. He was nevertheless under an absolute necessity of taking one of the two courses. A neutrality would have exposed him to the danger of being sacrificed by both, if they should be reconciled, which was not impossible. Besides, on such occasions, the victorious party never thinks any great regard due to those who have stood neutral. In fine, a neutrality would have entirely deprived him of the supplies received from England for the subsistence of his army. He therefore determined to side with the Parliament, and, without any evasion, sent his resolution to Fleetwood. For this purpose, he prepared for a speedy march into England with the best part of his army.

When this resolution is considered, it is difficult to believe, that Monk could take it, without being influenced by other motives than what appear at first sight. First, he had no cause to be pleased with this Parliament, nor is it seen what interest, either public or private, he could have, to restore a Parliament generally hated, and which had been always distrustful of him. Secondly, Monk had joined with the Republicans only to free himself from confinement. Thirdly, though he had twelve thousand men, he could, at most, take with him but half, unless he would give the Scots opportunity to shake off the English yoke. How therefore could he venture to go with five or six thousand men, to encounter an army stronger than his own? Lastly, The people of England hitherto had declared for neither Parliament nor army, but equally hated both. Monk therefore could not expect the People's assistance, to restore a Parliament which had ever held them in servitude. This was not, at least, the interest of the Royalists or Presbyterians, who properly were the body of the nation, there being but very few who were really attached to the Parliament or the army, tho' fear compelled them to obedience. And, by the way, the small interest which the Parliament had in the Boroughs and Counties, was the true reason that they never filled the vacant seats, because they could not be assured that such members would be chosen as they desired. These are the considerations which naturally create a belief, that Monk, when he resolved to march into England, under colour of re-establishing the Parliament, secretly intended to serve and restore the King. This is almost universally agreed. But it is not equally clear what was his plan, or his means to accomplish such a design. If the Royalist authors are to be credited, he marched into England with only five thousand men; and the terror of that army, joined to the wishes of the nation, and Monk's prudent conduct, produced this happy reformation. All this is true, but it is not the whole of the truth, party-interest having obliged the Historians to conceal, or speak confusedly of some things. For my part, I shall give my opinion, and leave it to the judgment of the unprejudiced reader. I own, I cannot support it with the clear and undeniable testimony of the Historians of those times. But I think, I can ground it upon something stronger than the testimony of the Historians; I mean, upon the facts themselves, and General Monk's whole conduct. The Reader will judge of it hereafter.

Since the Presbyterians had been expelled from the Parliament in 1648, they had been kept extremely low, because their number ever rendered them formidable to the Independent Parliament, and afterwards to Cromwell. They had never been able to recover their seats in Parliament, a few only excepted, who had thrust themselves in by dissimulation, which nevertheless, as appears in Ludlow's Memoirs, could not deceive the Independents. Sir William Waller, one of their Generals, was not in condition to head an army, and Maffey had espoused the King's cause. So, having nothing more to say in the Parliament, and wanting a leader to head them, they had remained in subjection to the Independent Parliament, and afterwards to Cromwell, without any likelihood of reviving their humbled party. They had for enemies Cromwell, the army, the Parliament, the Royalists, and were in no places of trust which might give them credit. We have already seen, that being weary of this situation, they had discovered an inclination to unite with the King's party, or at least shewn, that they should not be displeased with the good success of that party's design for an insurrection in several parts of the Kingdom. The miscarriage of that undertaking was double the reason, that the union was carried no farther. Nevertheless, Monk knowing how the Presbyterians stood disposed, employed, in all likelihood, Charges his confidant, to make a secret agreement with some of their chiefs for restoring the King by their means. The scheme formed for that purpose, and which could not be executed without the Presbyterians, was, as appears by the sequel, briefly this:

Monk engaged, no doubt, to march into England and restore the Rump-Parliament, dispersed by the officers. This was the first step he was to take. The Parliament being restored, Monk was to join with the city of London, wholly Presbyterian, and demand that the members expelled in 1648, might resume their seats, or, if the Rump refused to admit them, to introduce them by force. These restored members could not but, by their number, have a great majority in the House, and compose properly a Presbyterian Parliament. It was agreed, that this Parliament should dissolve itself, after summoning another free Parliament, composed, agreeably to the ancient constitution, of a House of Lords and a House of Commons. This new Parliament must have naturally consisted of Royalists and Presbyterians (the Independents having too little credit to carry any elections) and was to restore the King, to which the Presbyterians should consent. In all likelihood these last stipulated some conditions, the particulars whereof are not known. It cannot however be doubted, that there were conditions, since, after the restoration of Charles II., they complained bitterly of breach of promise. This also appears in that, to vindicate Charles II., for not keeping his word with the Presbyterians, 'tis pretended, it was not in his power to dispense with the laws, and consequently his promise was void. This was the scheme for restoring the King, which, as will hereafter be seen, was closely pursued. If, on some occasion, Monk seemed to swerve from it, 'twas because he believed dissimulation absolutely necessary, and that he could not discover his intention without danger of rendering the project abortive. It was to be done on a sudden, and under other pretences, before the enemies to Royalty should have time to oppose it. Now he could not use more proper instruments than the Presbyterians, who were little suspected of desiring the King's restoration. But the Historians are very unwilling to allow the Presbyterians any share in this unexpected event, though they are forced in some measure to follow, in their Histories, the scheme I have explained. They are contented to insinuate, that this restoration was owing to the prayers of the People, as if the Presbyterians had not been a considerable, and perhaps the major part of the People. This scheme being supposed, all difficulties will vanish, and Monk's proceedings appear natural, and consequences of it. But if it be supposed, that Monk restored the Presbyterian members, expelled from the Parliament in 1648, without any previous agreement, it can never be conceived, that he should think it necessary to restore a Presbyterian Parliament, in order to place the King on the throne without any conditions.

The first thing done by the Committee of Safety, lately established by the general Council of officers, was to send Charges to Monk, to bring him to some agreement. They were not ignorant of the error committed by the officers, in usurping the sovereign power, without the approbation of a General at the head of twelve thousand men, and would have gladly repaired it. But they could not chuse a worse messenger than Charges, whose sole aim was to serve the King, and who, probably, had engaged Monk in the same design.

Mean while, Monk was preparing with all possible diligence for his expedition, tho' not without several obstacles. 1. His forces being dispersed through all Scotland, required, at least, six weeks to draw them together. 2. Ready money was to be provided for their maintenance, because he could expect no more from England. For this purpose, the taxes were to be anticipated, and even extraordinary supplies obtained of the Scots. 3. In his troops were some officers, on whose fidelity he could not rely. 4. In short, it was absolutely necessary to his design, to have some towns on the frontiers of England, to facilitate his entrance, as he knew that Lambert was marching to oppose him. All these difficulties were happily surmounted, except the first, because of the remissness of his forces. As to the rest, he began with cashiering several of his suspected officers, and substituting others in their room. He kept those whom the Parliament had displaced, and whose successors were not yet come. Then he summoned to Edinburgh the officers of the nearest regiments, and communicating to them his design of marching into England, to restore the Parliament, he had the satisfaction to meet with their concurrence.

This done, he found means to secure Berwick, and arrest Colonel Cobbet, who was there, and whose secret instructions were told him by Charges. Cobbet was sent to Edinburgh, and there imprisoned. Monk also attempted to surprize Newcastle, but was disappointed. As to the money he wanted, he raised as much as was possible, and while his army was assembling, solicited the Scots for an extraordinary supply.

While Monk was making these preparations, Charges his Brother-in-law arrived in Scotland, with a proposal for a treaty with the Committee of Safety. It was resolved betwixt them to accept the proposal, not with design to conclude the treaty, but to gain time till Monk's army was ready (1). Pursuant to this resolution, Monk, with the consent of his officers, made choice of Colonel Wilks, Lieutenant-Colonel Clobergy, and Major Knight to go and treat in his name with the Committee, and sent them away with such instructions, as he thought would raise insurmountable obstacles to the conclusion of the treaty. These three commissioners met Lambert at York, who told them, but he was sufficiently empowered to treat with them (2). But to their demand for restoring the Parliament, he answered, his power did not extend to that article, and so they were obliged to go on to London.

These Commissioners, ignorant of Monk's secret intentions, were no sooner at London, than they made all possible haste to conclude with the Committee of Safety, and the rather, because every thing which they proposed was accepted. So, the treaty was concluded and signed the 15th of November, to the great dissatisfaction of Monk, whose aim was to prolong it, and then break off the negotiation. It would be needless to infer the treaty, because it was never executed. I shall only observe, that by the first article, a vigorous opposition to the King's restoration was agreed to by both parties. Monk, upon receiving the treaty, fought evasions to hinder the ratification, pretending, his Commissioners had acted contrary to their instructions, and thereby became still more suspected by the Committee of Safety.

While Monk was preparing to march into England, the Members of the late Parliament were not idle. They were ardently endeavouring to re-establish themselves, and wrest from the officers their usurped authority, but without the least thought of restoring the King. They believed, or pretended to believe, that Monk had no other view than the restitution of the Parliament, and, in this belief, considered Monk's friends as their own. This was true in general, though some there were of Monk's adherents in Lon-

(2) Monk's Commissioners so far forgot Lambert's the reality of Monk's intentions, that Lambert kept his Forces from marching further northward, When notice of this came to Lambert, Whitelock was for ordering Lambert to advance speedily with all his forces, and attack Monk, before he should be better provided; believing, as he says, that Monk only sought delay. But his advice was not taken. Whitelock, p. 658.

1659. don, better informed than the rest, who knew what they were about. But the means of the Rump united to support Monk's designs, imagining, his sole intention was to restore the Parliament. For that reason, the Members who had formed the Council of State, before the interruption of the Parliament, being privately assembled, sent to Monk a commission, constituting him General of the armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

On the other hand, [Colonel Whetnam] Governor of Portsmouth, Monk's particular friend, declared for the Parliament, and received into his garrison Hofierig, Walton, and Morley, three Members of Parliament, the most incensed against the army. The Committee of Safety, upon the first notice of this defection, sent a detachment of the army to block up Portsmouth, but the soldiers deserted their officers, declared for the Parliament, and were received into Portsmouth as friends. Another detachment sent from the army on the same errand, did almost the same thing, so that the Committee knew not on whom to rely. At the same time, Lawson, Vice-Admiral declared for the Parliament against the army, and entered the Thames with several of his ships, to awe the adherents of the Committee. Lambert, who commanded a body of the army in the North, being informed of the ill situation of the Committee's affairs, detached [Desborough's] regiment to the assistance of his friends in London, but that regiment, at St. Albans, declared for the Parliament.

Mean while, the Committee of Safety seeing all this opposition, seemed to be discouraged. They took no measures for their own preservation, and instead of assembling the army, suffered it to be dispersed into quarters. It is likely, they feared to see the army together, since the soldiers of the two detachments sent to Portsmouth had deserted their officers. Mean while, Hofierig, Walton, and Morley, finding themselves sufficiently strengthened by the soldiers of the army, which had retired to Portsmouth, marched at the head of these troops, towards London. Then it was that Fleetwood, and the rest of the Committee of Safety, were in the utmost perplexity. They durst not trust their own soldiers, and knew not what course to take. Whitelock, as appears in his Memorials, advised Fleetwood either to head the army, or agree with the King (1). He seemed to approve of this last course, but presently after altered his mind, and did neither. At last, his Colleagues and himself wanting capacity and resolution to extricate themselves out of such an emergency, consented to the meeting of the Parliament, and voluntarily resigned their usurped authority. They had no sooner given their consent, than they were entirely abandoned by their whole party.

THUS the Parliament met peaceably the 26th of December, and named a Committee to govern the army in their name, and under their direction. Then they dispatched express orders to Lambert to disperse his forces, and send them into the quarters assigned by the same order. But Lambert's troops hearing the Parliament was restored, had in some measure prevented this order, and put their General under arrest, who was sent prisoner to the Tower of London. At the same time Sir Henry Vane, and some other members of Parliament, who had taken part with the army, were confined to their own houses. Thus, by a revolution little expected, the first and most difficult part of Monk's undertaking, namely, the restitution of the Parliament, was executed even before he left Scotland, and without having any other share in it, than his resolution to march into England (2).

Mean while, this revolution seemed entirely to destroy the hopes of the King, since a Parliament was restored to oppose to him. He was believed to be irrecoverably lost. France and Spain began to think of making a firm and lasting alliance with the Parliament, whereby the King would not have known where to retire for a subsistence. But though he himself feigned to be extremely afflicted, not to discover his secret, very probably, he was informed of Monk's intentions, and of the manner in which they were to be executed. For though the Earl of Clarendon affirms, the King had only a very faint hope of being served by Monk, in order to provide for his own security, yet I cannot believe, that Monk, however reserved he might be to others, concealed his intentions from the King, since there was no danger in the discovery (3).

Be this as it will, Monk, before he left Scotland, by circular letters, assembled at Edinburgh two Commissioners from every Shire, and one from each Burrough, and communicated to them his intention to march into England, to rescue the Parliament from the force put upon them by the army, and restore them to their authority. These Commissioners, who made a sort of Convention of Estates, tho' the union of the two Kingdoms denied them the name, offered Monk to increase his army with [twenty thousand men] of their nation, and granted him thirty thousand pounds [above the assignments] to enable him to maintain them. He accepted the money, but refused the troops, believing he wanted them not. Some Scotch writers affirm, that in dismissing this assembly, he recommended to them, to take all possible care to preserve the peace and tranquillity of the Kingdom, and desired them to abjure the King, and royal Family. But Gumble, who was his Chaplain, and writ his life, positively denies it. Thus much is certain, it was absolutely necessary for him, carefully to conceal his intention to serve the King, and his fear of betraying this secret, made him, on some occasions, carry his dissimulation to excess. He was, however, extremely suspected by those, who would not hear of the King's restoration. These men were very numerous, not to mention the army, which assuredly had no such intention, though, unknown to them, their march was designed for that purpose alone.

Monk entered England with his army the 2d of January 1659-60, and consequently might now be informed of the Rump's re-establishment. Some days after he received a letter from the Speaker, acquainting him with the late transactions, thanking him, in the name of the Parliament, for his kind intentions, and insinuating, that if he thought it proper, he might save himself the trouble of coming to London, since the Parliament was in peaceable possession of their authority. But this letter did not interrupt his march. If it be considered, that the pretence he had hitherto alleged for his expedition into England, was the restitution of the Parliament, and that he continued his march, though the Parliament was restored, it will be easy to perceive, that he had quite another motive than what was at first alleged. This pretence failing him, he was obliged to find another, and that was, to assist the Parliament, to reduce the army to obedience and submission. On his arrival at York, he found the Lord Fairfax, formerly General to the Parliament, at the head of some troops of that County, and in possession of the City, in order to hinder the Committee of Safety from being masters of it. The Lord Fairfax received Monk into York without any difficulty, and they had many conferences together. Fairfax was a Presbyterian, tho' Cromwell had made him subversive to the rise of the Independents. So, it would be hard to conceive what interest he could have in countenancing Monk's designs, if the Presbyterian party had not secretly agreed to concur in the King's restoration.

Whatever dissimulation Monk had used, in pretending that he had no other view than to restore the Rump, the members of that Parliament were too wise not to perceive, he had some other hidden design. But they hesitated between two opinions, in appearance equally probable, namely, that he intended either to advance himself in imitation of Cromwell, or to restore the King. For this reason, the Rump, a few days after their meeting, appointed a Council of State, consisting of twenty eight members, of whom Monk was one, and ordered each Councillor to take the following oath:

I do hereby swear that I do renounce the pretended title of CHARLES STEUART, and the whole line of the late King James, and of every other Person as a single person, as a pretender, or which shall pretend to the Crown or Government of these nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any of them, and the dominions and territories belonging to them, or any of them; and that I will, by the grace and assistance of Almighty God, be true, faithful and constant to the Parliament and Commonwealth, and will oppose the bringing in, or setting up any single Person or House of Lords, and every of them in this Commonwealth.

This precaution however did not remove the fears of the Parliament with regard to Monk, who daily became more suspected, notwithstanding all his care to conceal his intentions. It was therefore resolved to send two of their members to him, under the pretence of doing him honor, but in reality, to observe his proceedings. Scot and Robinson were named, who found him at Leicester the 22d of January (4). In this town (5) he received also Commissioners from London, with an address, to desire the re-ad-

(1) by which means he might make terms with the King for the preservation of himself, and his cause.

(2) But Vane, Desborough, and Berry, coming to Fleetwood in the mean time, made him alter his resolution.

(3) Monk pleased no confidence in Hyde, and when he sent the assurance to his service to the King by Sir John Grenville, it was to the secret. Sir John Grenville, who had it from his own Master, Robert to Sir John Grenville.

1659-60. million of the members secluded in the year 1648. Scott, one of the Commissioners from the Parliament, interrupted the London Commissioner who was reading the address, and commanded him silence, looking upon this proposal as tending directly to the destruction of the Republican Parliament. Nevertheless, Monk received the address. As he continued his march, he received many such, so that it seemed to be the general sense of the nation, that the Presbyterians should refuse the reins of the Government. Let us reflect here a little on this extraordinary change.

It cannot be denied, that the secluded Members in 1648 were Presbyterians, who had, on all occasions, shewn an extreme animosity against the King and the Church of England. If they had testified a desire to restore the late King by the treaty of Neuport, this was owing to conditions, which he looked upon as intolerable, and which necessity alone compelled him to grant. Nay, the Parliament could not resolve to allow some restrictions desired by the King to their demands. If they voted that the King's concessions might serve for foundation to a peace, it was at a time when the army was now in London, ready to execute the violence which was acted the next day. The Presbyterians therefore cannot be considered as having been at any time, favourable to Charles I. Since the 6th of September 1648, they had been kept very low, having constantly had for enemies the Royalists, Parliament, Protector, and Army, so that they were without any power. And yet, during Monk's march, this party not only revives, but even becomes superior to all the rest, and the whole nation seems to conspire to restore them the supreme authority, in demanding the re-admission of the secluded members in 1648. What could be the motive of so great a number of addresses on this account, presented to Monk in his march? And why did Monk receive them so favorably? Certainly, when he left Scotland, his intention, however concealed, was to labour the King's restoration (1). But if the Presbyterians had not engaged to favour this restoration, the raising their party, and putting them in possession of the Government, would have been a very unlikely means to accomplish it. All that Monk could thereby have gained, was, the King's restoration on the same terms which his father had granted in the treaty of Neuport, which, doubtless, was very far from his intention. Let us therefore conclude, that all these addresses were an effect, or consequence of a secret agreement between the Royalists and Presbyterians, whereby these last had consented to the King's restoration, on conditions relating to their Religion alone, without insinuating, as they had before constantly done, on any terms concerning the Government. Without this supposition, the steps, afterwards taken for the King's restoration, can never be conceived, and, with it, all the proceedings are natural.

This agreement was a secret which was carefully to be concealed, lest its discovery should produce an accommodation between the Parliament and the army, in which case Monk, who had but five thousand men, would have been little able to execute his designs. Wherefore, though he received all the addresses, he was very careful not to express the least signs of approbation, but contented himself with a general answer, that they should be laid before the Parliament (2).

Monk, as I said, had but five thousand men (3). With this army it was not possible to withstand the other, which was three times as numerous, and of which several regiments were now in London. If the Parliament and army could have united together, they would, doubtless, have rendered all Monk's projects impracticable. But the Parliament was still more jealous of their own army than of Monk. They only suspected that General of having secret designs, without knowing exactly wherein they consisted. But that the general-officers of the army would become masters, if their assistance was necessary, could not be doubted. It was Monk's interest therefore to foment this disunion, and he could not more successfully do it, than by professing an entire devotion to the Parliament. He thereby removed from the Parliament all thoughts of an union with the army, which appeared unnecessary, while Monk's fidelity could be relied on. This was the true reason of Monk's extreme dissimulation, and of his pretending on all occasions, that his march to London was only to serve and obey the Parliament.

When he came to St. Albans, within twenty miles of London, he wrote to the Parliament, to desire that the regiments in the city, might be sent to more distant quarters, it not being convenient, that troops, which had so lately been in Rebellion, should mix with those which were entirely devoted to the Parliament, and come to offer their service. With this letter he sent the manner in which his soldiers might be lodged in London, and the quarters that might be assigned to the regiments which were to be removed. Though this demand was suspected by many members to have some mystery in it, it was however granted by a majority of voices, and the regiments in the city were ordered to remove. This shews, either that Fleetwood and Desborough were no great politicians, if they did not see that Monk's demand tended to make himself master of the City and Parliament, or that they believed they had not a sufficient influence over their inferior officers, to venture to oppose it. It seems, they could resolve nothing without Lambert, who was now prisoner in the Tower.

However this be, Monk artfully improving the division between the Parliament and the army, entered London, in triumph, the 3d of February 1659-60. After he had given orders for quartering his troops, he repaired to the Council of State, who immediately tendered him the Abjuration-Oath, which all the members were obliged to take. But he asked time to resolve, saying, he had been informed that strong objections had been made to this oath, even in the Parliament itself. Upon this refusal he was denied admittance into the Council of State, till he had taken the oath, and was obliged to withdraw.

The 6th of February he went to the Parliament, where by the mouth of the Speaker, he received the compliments and thanks of the House; to which he returned the following answer:

Mr. Speaker,
"Amongst the many mercies of God to these poor nations, your peaceable restitution is not the least. It is (as you said) his work alone, and to him belongs the glory of it; and I esteem it as a great effect of his goodness to me, that he was pleased to make me, amongst many worthier in your service, some way instrumental in it. I did nothing but my duty, and deserve not to receive so great an honour and respect as you are pleased to give me at this time and place, which I shall ever acknowledge as a high mark of your favour to me.

"Sir, I shall not now trouble you with large narratives, only give me leave to acquaint you, that as I marched from Scotland hither, I observed the People in most counties in great and earnest expectations of a settlement, and several applications were made to me, with numerous subscriptions to them. The chiefest heads of their desires were for a free and a full Parliament, and that you would determine your fitting; a Gospel-Ministry; encouragement of Learning and Universities; and for admittance of the members secluded before the year 1648, without any previous Oath or Engagement. To which I commonly answered, that you are now in a free Parliament; and if there be any force remaining upon you, I would endeavour to remove it; and that you had voted to fill up your House, and then you would be a full Parliament also; and that you had already determined your fitting: And for the Ministry, their maintenance, the Laws, and Universities, you had largely declared concerning them in your last declaration; and I was confident you would adhere to it: But as for those Gentlemen secluded in the year 1648, I told them you had given judgment in it, and all people ought to acquiesce in that judgment; but to admit any members to sit in Parliament without a previous oath or engagement, to preserve the government in being, it was never done in England.

"But although I said it not to them, I must say, with pardon, to you, that the less oaths and engagements are imposed (with respect had to the security of the common Cause) your settlement will be the sooner attained to. I am the more particular in these matters to let you see how grateful your present consultations about these things will be to the People. I know all the sober Gentry will close with you, if they may be tenderly and gently used; and I am sure you will so use them, as knowing it to be the common concern, to amplify, and not to lessen our interest, and to be careful that neither the Cavalier, nor Fanatick Party have yet a share in your civil or military power, of the least whole impatience to Government, you have lately had so severe experience. I shall say something of Ireland and Scotland; indeed Ireland is in an unsettled condition, and made worse by your interruptions, which prevented

(1) Bishop Burnet more reasonably supposes, that Monk had no fixed design any way, but resolved to do as occasion should be offered to him, p. 84.
(2) He kept himself under such a reserve, that he declared all the while in the most solemn manner for a Commonwealth, and against a single Person, in particular against the King. See Ludlow, Tom. II. p. 811. The same day he entered London, Ludlow visiting him, he told Ludlow, "That he was truly relieved to promote the interest of a Commonwealth." Adding, "We must live and die for by a Commonwealth." Ibid. p. 820.
(3) Dr. Skinner says, his Army, upon a Review at High-gate, amounted to five thousand eight hundred Men. (p. 221.) Namely, 10,000 foot, and eight hundred Horse. The Parliament's Regiments in London consisted of two thousand Horse, and eight thousand Foot. Phillips, p. 679.

1659-60. "the passing an Act for the settlement of the estates of adventurers and soldiers there, which I heard you intended to have done in a few days; and I presume, it will be now quickly done, being so necessary at this time, when the wants of the Commonwealth call for supplies; and people will unwillingly pay taxes for those estates, of which they have no legal assurance: I need not tell you how much you were abused in the nomination of your officers of your armies there; their malice that deceived you, hath been sufficiently manifested: I do affirm, that those now that have declared for you will continue faithful, and thereby evince, that as well there as here, it is the sober interest must establish your dominion. As for Scitland, I must say, the people of that nation deserve to be cherished; and I believe your late declaration will much glad their spirits; for nothing was to them more dreadful, than a fear to be over-run with fanatick notions. I humbly recommend them to your affection and esteem; and desire the intended union may be prosecuted, and their taxes made proportionable to those in England, for which I am engaged by promise to become a sutor to you. And truly, Sir, I must ask leave to intreat you to make a speedy provision for the civil Government there, of which they have been destitute near a year, to the ruin of many families: And except commissioners for managing of the Government, and Judges to sit in Courts of Judicature, be speedily appointed, that Country will be very miserable.

"I directed Mr. Gumble lately to present some names to you, both for Commissioners and Judges; but by reason of your great affairs, he was not required to deliver them in writing: But I humbly present them to your consideration."

This speech was not agreeable to all; some of the Members complained, Monk spoke too positively, and assumed too great an authority: that he affected a popularity, which justly rendered him suspected: that he engaged for the fidelity of the Irish officers, which, however, was to be doubted: In short, that in saying, the Cavaliers were not yet to have a share in the Government, he gave that party hopes of being one day admitted.

Two days after, the Parliament had occasion to try Monk's fidelity, and to be assured, whether he was so devoted to their interest as he studied to appear. The Common-Council of the City of London, assembling the 7th of February, resolved to pay no more taxes till the Parliament was filled (1). They knew Monk's design was to restore the Members secluded in 1648, and, doubtless, thought by this resolution to advance the affair. They had nothing to fear from Monk, and knew the Parliament would not recall the regiments which were removed from London, to force the City to obedience. Upon advice of this resolution, the Parliament ordered Monk to lead his army into the City, seize eleven Members of the Common-Council, and pull down the chains, gates, and portcullises. Monk readily and instantly obeyed the order (2). He assembled his forces, entered the City, and arrested the eleven Members of the Common-Council. Then he writ to the Parliament an account of what he had done, praying them withal to moderate their rigour, with respect to the gates and portcullises. But the Parliament, whether it the City, or a farther trial of Monk's fidelity, and perhaps to engage him in an irreconcilable quarrel with the City, insisted upon a punctual compliance with their order, and were immediately obeyed. After that, he returned with his troops to Whitehall, which displeased the Parliament, believing Monk ought not to have quitted the City without their order. The same, or the following day, Praxis-God Borebone, formerly mentioned on occasion of Oliver Cromwell's first Parliament, presented a petition to the House, subscribed by many persons, desiring the cath of abjuration of Charles Stuart might be taken by all persons without exception, and he received the thanks of the House.

Monk's late proceedings astonished both his friends and the City of London. The Magistrates, enraged at this treatment, looked upon him as a perfidious man, who had amused them with hopes of his supporting the re-admission of the secluded Members, in order to know their sentiments, and as one absolutely devoted to the Parliament. On the other hand, his friends represented to him, that he was guilty of an irreparable fault, in quarrelling with the Londoners, who alone were able to support him against the Parliament bent upon his ruin, whatever they might pretend. That this Commission was a snare, which had lost him the confidence of the City, and exposed him to the Parliament's designs against him; besides that, without the assistance of London, he would never, with his finite army, be able to execute his intentions (3).

Monk, convinced by these reasons, that he had carried his dissimulation too far, thought only of repairing his error, by an open rupture with the Parliament. He therefore sent, without loss of time, Clarges his confidant, to Sir Thomas Allayne Lord-Mayor, to tell him, he was very sorry for what he had done, and desired a conference with him, and the Common-Council, to make reparation for his fault. But Clarges could obtain nothing from the Lord-Mayor, who was persuaded that Monk was deceitful and treacherous, and only sought to deceive him. Notwithstanding all this, Monk assembled his forces, with a resolution to march once more into the City, and be reconciled to the Magistrates, whatever might be the consequence. At his departure, he sent a letter to the Parliament, writ with the approbation of his principal officers, complaining, "That they gave too much countenance to Lenthart, Vane, and several that engaged with the late Committee of Safety; and that they had permitted Leadless and some others to sit in their House, that had been, by Sir Charles Gost and some of the Irish officers, accused of High-treason; and had countenanced too much a late petition to exclude the most sober and conscientious, both Ministers and others, by oaths, from all employment and maintenance; and in fine, peremptorily demanded, that by Friday next, they would issue out writs to fill up their House; and when filled, should rise at an appointed time, to give place to a full and free Parliament."

By this letter the Parliament easily perceived, Monk sought an occasion of quarrel, which, as it was difficult to avoid, it was judged the wisest course to vote Monk the thanks of the House, for his care, and that his desires should be satisfied without delay. At the same time, Scot and Robinson were dispatched to him with this resolution. But Monk was now marched into the City, and tho' with great difficulty, prevailed with the Mayor to assemble the Common-Council that afternoon. Mean time, the two Commissioners of the Parliament, having waited on Monk with the message, returned with little satisfaction. He only told them, All would be well, if his letter were complied with. Upon this answer, the Parliament voted, that the command of the army should be lodged in five Commissioners (4), of whom Monk himself was one, and that the Quorum of them should be three; but when it was moved, that Monk should always be one of the three, it was carried in the negative.

In this interval, Monk repairing to the Common-Council, made a Speech, in which he testified his concern for having accepted a Commission, so disagreeable in the execution to the City. That he was forced to accept it, or quit his command, which he had thought proper to keep at such a juncture, for the good of the City, and of the whole Nation, whose happiness and advantages he should always promote to the utmost of his power. To give an unquestionable proof of the sincerity of his intentions, he communicated to the Council his letter to the Parliament, and answer to the two Commissioners. As these last proofs were convincing, the Council was appeased, and Monk looked upon as a friend come to their relief, notwithstanding the transactions of the foregoing day. When the news of this reconciliation was dispersed thro' the City, it was followed with ringing of bells, and bonfire fires in every street, at which were roasted numberless Rumps in contempt of the Parliament (5). Some days after, THE COUNCIL of STATE sent to desire Monk to come and assist them with his counsels, in regulating the affairs of the nation: but he did not think fit to expose himself to this danger. He answered, that the inhabitants of London were so dissatisfied, that he presumed it was not necessary in the City, to keep them in awe. On the other hand, the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen conjured him to stay in the City, acquainting him, that the Parliament was secretly endeavouring to corrupt his army, and that Sir Arthur Haslerig had writ to several persons in London, to that purpose. So Monk took care to avoid the snare laid for him.

Since Monk's union with the City, addresses for the re-admission of the secluded Members were more frequent than ever. Very likely, there were emissaries dispersed in seve-

59-60. ral quarters, to incite the people to offer these petitions, which were always favorably received by Monk, it being necessary for him to support his designs, by the general inclination of the people. He knew what use was to be made of a Presbyterian Parliament, though many who signed the petitions, imagined, that Presbyterianism was going to re-mount the Throne.

At last, on the 18th of February, Monk ordered it, that some of the fitting Members had a conference with some of the secluded, concerning their re-admission. He could have wished, this might have been done by common consent. But the conference was fruitless, because the fitting Members could not, or would not, undertake for the Parliament's accepting the conditions which should be agreed on. They were for leaving that to the determination of the Parliament, who, doubtless, would have found means to prolong the affair. But Monk saw himself indispensably obliged to bring it to a speedy conclusion, for fear a delay might produce an agreement between the army and Parliament. This union was so natural, in the extremity to which the affairs of the Parliament were reduced, that it is astonishing, no endeavours were used to procure it. At last, History is silent upon that head. So Monk, desirous to improve so favorable a juncture, resolved to introduce the secluded Members into the Parliament, in spite of those who were now fitting. But as this could not be done without the assistance of the army, he assembled his officers, to acquaint them with his intentions. All consented, on certain conditions relating to their own interests, and which were positively promised. Then Monk made the secluded Members engage, that after their re-admission, they would call a free Parliament, and dissolve the present (1).

These resolutions being taken, Monk repaired to Whitehall the 21st of February, attended by all the secluded Members, and after an exhortation to take care of the interests of the nation, gave them a guard to conduct them to the Parliament, where they took their seats, without any previous notice to the fitting Members. They were so superior in number to the Independents, that the heads of that party, after a short demur among themselves, thought fit to withdraw, and abandon their cause.

The same day, Monk writ a circular letter to all the regiments, to inform them of the change in the Parliament, to assure them of the zeal of the reformed Members for the interests of the army, and to desire their opposition to all attempts in favour of Charles Stuart. This last clause was thought necessary to keep the army in temper, which was yet far from desiring the King's reformation. This letter was signed by Monk himself, and his principal officers, and sent the same day to the Colonels of the several regiments.

This Parliament continued their Session but twenty five days, during which they did several things, plainly showing they were far from being the King's enemies. Some of their proceedings shall here be laid together, that I may not be obliged to break the thread of the narration. 1. They annulled all votes and orders made by the Parliament since the 6th of December 1648. against the secluded Members. 2. They released all the imprisoned friends of the King, and amongst the rest Sir George Booth (2). 3. They constituted Monk, by Act of Parliament, Captain general of the armies of the three Nations. 4. They repealed the Oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart, and all the Royal Family. 5. They appointed a new Council of State consisting of one and thirty Members, most of them Royalists, and well-disposed to serve the King (3). 6. They made great changes in the Militia of London, and the several counties, and revoked all commissions granted by the Republicans. 7. They abrogated the engagement to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth without a King, or House of Peers, by which the Lords, who were generally the King's Adherents were restored to their right of constituting a separate House in Parliament. Lastly, they dissolved themselves the 16th of March, after having issued out writs for a free Parliament to meet the 25th of April, who were to re-form the King, which was no longer doubted (4). However, as such a change could not please every one, after so long an interruption of Kingly power, the Parliament, before their separation, thought it still necessary to amuse the publick, or at least to leave room to doubt whether the King's Restoration was intended. Wherefore it was voted, first, that no person should be admitted to any military employ, before he had sworn to acknowledge the lawfulness of taking arms against the late King (5). Secondly, that no person who had been in arms against the Parliament, should be chosen a Member of the next Parliament. In all appearance, these resolutions were only taken to prevent disturbances from the Male-contents, in the interval betwixt the two Parliaments. It is at least certain, that the last was neglected in the new elections of Representatives, among whom were great numbers of Royalists. As the non-observance of it was to be questioned by the next Parliament only, there was nothing to be said, till they should meet.

But these deceitful votes were not capable of imposing on the Republicans, who saw but too plainly, that a resolution was taken to restore the King. To prevent this blow which could not but crush them entirely, they endeavoured to persuade Monk to take upon himself the Government, and supply the Place of Oliver Cromwell (6), chusing rather to own him for Governor or even Sovereign, than be exposed to the King's vengeance. Monk having constantly rejected this offer, they applied to Clarges to desire him to persuade the General to accept the Government. But Clarges discovered their plot to the Council of State, who if Monk had not interceded for them, would have punished them severely.

This attempt failing, they privately excited a good number of Officers of their own principles to draw up a Declaration, by which they engaged to support the Republican Government. They brought this Declaration to the General to sign, pretending it should afterwards be subscribed by the whole army. But Monk excused himself, alleging, this precaution was needless after the vote, That no adherent of the King should be elected to serve in the ensuing Parliament. But they made no account of this evasion, knowing, that it belonged to the House of Commons to judge of the qualifications of their Members. In short, as they continued to importune him, he forbade them with an air of authority, to assemble without his permission.

The transactions in England being quickly carried to Cardinal Mazarin, it was not difficult for him to perceive, that Monk had some great design in view. But as he could not judge whether that General was labouring for himself or the King, he ordered Monsieur de Bourdeaux the French Ambassador at London, to offer his friendship to Monk, and every thing in his power, whatever were his designs. Probably, the Cardinal, who had always treated the King with neglect, and was but little, if at all, desirous of his Restoration, would have been glad, Monk had been labouring for himself (7). But in case Monk intended to restore the King, the Cardinal was willing to have some share in it, in order to make amends for his harsh usage of the King, on sundry occasions. The Ambassador applying to Clarges, intimated to him, that the Cardinal was ready to serve the General in all his undertakings, and desired a conference with him. But though Monk would not absolutely refuse a visit from the Ambassador, he ordered Clarges to tell him, it was on condition, he should not propose any thing to him in reference to the English affairs. So, the visit passed in general compliments.

(1) Monk made the secluded Members, before their Admission, subscribe these four Articles. 1. To settle the Conduct of the Armies in the three Nations as in might best secure the peace of the Commonwealth. 2. To provide for the support of the forces by sea and land, and money also for their arrears, and the contingencies of the Government. 3. To constitute a Council of State for the Civil Government of Scotland and Ireland, and to procure Writs for the summoning a Parliament to meet at Westminster the 25th of April. 4. To consent to their own dissolution, by a time that should be limited to them. Stewart, p. 241.

(2) The Earls of Cranfield and Lindelside, and the Lord Stair, were also released.

(3) To let the Reader see who were then the leading men, it may not be amiss to insert the Names of this Council, which Rapin, by mistake, says, consisted but of twenty one Members. General Monk, William Pierpont, John Cress, Colonel Rassiter, Richard Knightley, Colonel Popham, Colonel Ayles, Lord Fairfax, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir Gilbert Gerard, Lord Chief Justice Sir John, Sir John Temple, Lord Commissioner Willoughby, Sir John Evelyn, Sir William Waller, Sir Richard Ouseley, Sir William Lewis, Colonel Edward Montague, Colonel Edward Harley, Colonel Richard Norton, Arthur Ansell, Daniel Hales, Colonel George Thompson, John Trevor, Sir John Holland, Sir John Fetti, Colonel John Birch, Sir Harbottle Grimston, John Swinsin, John Weaver, Sergeant Maynard. Phillips, p. 690.

(4) They also raised an Assessment of one hundred thousand pounds a month, for the payment of the Army, and defraying the publick expences for six months. Clarendon, Tom. III. p. 163.

(5) In the Act of the Militia of London was a Clause, that every Commissioner shall acknowledge and declare, "That the War undertaken by both Houses of Parliament in their Defence against the Forces raised in the Name of the late King, was just and lawful, and that Magistracy and Ministry are the Ordinances of God." Whitelock, p. 659.

(6) Among the rest, Lys Skinner, Sir Arthur Haslerig, to preclude the King's Restoration, offered him one hundred thousand hands that should subscribe his Title, p. 276.

(7) Mr. Luke says, That Monk had agreed with the French Ambassador to take the Government on himself, by whom he had promise from Mazarin of assistance from France, to support him in this undertaking. This bargain was struck between them late at night, but not so secretly, but that Monk's Wife, who had posted herself behind the hangings, where the code hear all that passed, finding what was resolved, sent immediately notice of it by her Brother Clarges to Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper. She was zealous for the Restoration of the King, and promised Sir Anthony, to watch her Husband, and inform him from time to time how matters went. Upon this notice Sir Anthony summoned the Council of State, and before them, indirectly charging Monk with what he had learned, proposed, That to remove all scruples, Monk would at that instant take away their Commissions from such and such Officers in his Army, and give them to those whom he named. By this means the Army ceased to be at Monk's devotion, and was put into hands that would not serve him, in the design he had undertaken. Memoirs of the Earl of Shaftsbury.

1659-60. The day after the dissolution of the Parliament, Sir John Grenville, sent by the King to General Monk, was introduced to him in the night. He told him, the King expected great services from him, and that he would finish a work so happily begun, and even very far advanced. Monk answered, He was always disposed to serve his Majesty to the utmost of his power: But the troops of the two armies were yet so averse to his Restoration, that the design could not be kept too secret, because a discovery would give occasion to the Republicans to subvert it. Dissimulation therefore was yet necessary, till the Parliament which was to meet should complete the work; and, in the mean time, it should be his care to model the army to the King's advantage, by the removal of the most suspected Officers. He added, the better to execute the projected design, he thought it absolutely necessary for the King to prepare a declaration capable of dispelling the fears of those who were most guilty, and promise a free and general pardon to all his Subjects, except such as should be exempted by Parliament; and that he would consent to any Act which should be presented to him for the payment of the arrears due to the army, and for the settlement of public sales and dispositions of lands to officers, soldiers and others; as also for toleration or liberty of conscience, and that no person should be molested on account of his Religion, who should not disturb the public peace. Lastly, his advice was, that the King should remove in time to some town of the United Provinces, to prevent his being arrested by the Spaniards, should they have any such intention, which might ruin the whole undertaking.

The King punctually followed these instructions, as will be presently seen, and removed from Brussels to Breda, not without danger of being stopped at Brussels, according to the Lord Clarendon.

Mean while, Monk made good use of the time, which remained till the meeting of the Parliament. He displaced, on divers pretences, such officers as were most suspected by him, and filled their posts with others in whom he could entirely confide. Moreover, some officers, by his direction, framed an engagement in form of an address to the General, by which they promised a ready obedience to the orders of the Parliament, when assembled. This engagement being presented to Monk, he approved it, and ordered it to be subscribed by all the regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland. This gave him a pretence to remove such as refused to sign it.

1660. While the hopes of the King and his party were daily increasing, an accident happened, which might have been attended with ill-consequences, had it not been speedily remedied. This was Lambert's escape out of the Tower, and his putting himself at the head of some troops (1). As he was greatly esteemed by the soldiers, there was danger that all the Republicans, who were very numerous in the army, would declare for him. Wherefore Monk lost not a moment to prevent this danger before the mischief reached any farther. Lambert having assembled some discontented troops at Daventry, Ingoldby was immediately sent against him, with Monk's own regiment, and ordered to take some other troops in his way, and give him battle. This extreme diligence did the business effectually. As Lambert had not yet time to assemble many troops, Ingoldby met him the 22d of April, thirteen days after his escape, defeated, and sent him to the Tower. Thus the fear which Lambert's escape had infused into the King's party was entirely dispelled.

Two days before the Parliament met, the Republicans made another attempt to prevent the King's Restoration, by dispersing a forged letter from Brussels, in which it was said, that the King only waited his restoration, to be severely revenged upon all his opposers. It was also added, that his party was preparing to put them all to the sword. This forged letter beginning to do mischief, the Lords, and others of the King's party, published a Declaration signed by seventy persons, in which they disavowed the intentions ascribed to them, and protested, that their desire was to live peaceably, without any thoughts of revenge upon the authors of their sufferings.

The new Parliament met the 25th of April, in two Houses, the one of Lords, the other of Commons, agreeably to the ancient Constitution (2). In the House of Commons, it was found, that many Royalists were elected, notwithstanding the above-mentioned vote. Some Presbyterians, who were not in the secret, had a mind to complain, and moved for an examination of the elections, but were not heard. Most of the Presbyterian members were no less zealous than the Royalists for the King's restoration, which every one wished, not so much, perhaps, out of affection to him, as to deliver the Kingdom from the dominion of the Independents and Fanatics, and from the tyranny of the army, which had lasted twelve years.

Two days after the opening of the Parliament, Grenville, returning from Brussels, waited on Monk, with a commission from the King, constituting him Captain-General of all the forces of the three Kingdoms, and also with a letter from his Majesty to be communicated to the Council of State, and the officers of the army. But Monk declined to open the letter, till he had received the Parliament's directions. Mean time, the Commons having adjourned themselves for two or three days, Grenville applied himself to the Lords, and presented to them a letter from the King, with a Declaration dated the 14th of April.

In the letter the King told the Lords, that hearing, they were again acknowledged to have the authority, belonging to them by their birth, he hoped they would make use of it for the public good, for composing the distractions of the Kingdom, and for restoring him to his just Prerogatives, the Parliament to their privileges, and the People to their liberties. As for the Declaration, it will be necessary to insert it at large.

CHARLES REX.

"CHARLES by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all our loving Subjects, of what degree or quality soever, greeting. If the general distraction and confusion which is spread over the whole Kingdom, doth not awaken all men to a desire and longing, that those wounds which have so many years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all we can say will be to no purpose: However, after this long silence, We have thought it our duty to declare how much we desire to contribute thereto: And that as we can never give over the hope, in good time to obtain the possession of that right, which God and Nature hath made our due; so we do make it our daily suit to the Divine Providence, that he will, in compassion to us and our Subjects, after so long misery and sufferings, remit, and put us into a quiet and peaceable possession of that our right, with as little blood and damage to our People as is possible; nor do we desire more to enjoy what is ours, than that all our Subjects may enjoy what by law is theirs, by a full and entire Administration of Justice throughout the land, and by extending our mercy where 'tis wanted and deserved.

"And to the end that fear of punishment may not engage any, conscious to themselves of what is past, to a perference in guilt for the future, by opposing the quiet and happiness of their country, in the restoration both of King, Peers, and People, to their just, antient, and fundamental rights; We do by these presents declare, That we do grant a Free and General Pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to pass under our Great Seal of England, to all our Subjects of what degree or quality soever, who within forty days after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this our Grace and Favour, and shall by any publick Act declare their doing so, and that they return to the loyalty and obedience of good Subjects, excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament: Those only excepted, Let all our Subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the word of a King, solemnly given by this present declaration, That no crime whatsoever, committed against us, or our royal Father, before the publication of this, shall ever rise in judgment, or be brought in question against any of them, to the least endamagement of them, either in their lives, liberties, or estates, or (as far forth as lies in our power) so much as to the prejudice of their reputations, by any reproach, or terms of distinction from the rest of our best Subjects; we desiring and ordaining, That henceforward all notes of discord, separation, and difference of parties, be utterly abolished among all our Subjects, whom we invite and conjure to a perfect union among themselves, under our protection, for the settlement of our just rights and theirs, in a Free Parliament, by which, upon the word of a King, we will be advised.

"And because the passion and uncharitableness of the Times have produced several Opinions in Religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animosities against each other, which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of conversation, will be composed, or better understood; We do declare a liberty to tender consciences; and that no man shall be disquieted, or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the Kingdom, and that we shall be ready to consent to such an Act of 1660. "Parliament, as upon mature deliberation shall be offered unto us, for the full granting that indulgence.

"And because in the continued distractions of so many years, and to many and great revolutions, many grants and purchases of estates have been made to and by many officers, soldiers, and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to actions at law, upon several titles; We are likewise willing, that all such differences and all things relating to such grants, sales and purchases, shall be determined in Parliament, which can best provide for the just satisfaction of all Men who are concerned.

"And we do further declare, that we will be ready to consent to any Act or Acts of Parliament, to the purposes aforesaid, And for the full satisfaction of all arrears due to the officers and soldiers of the army under the command of General Monk, and that they shall be received into our service upon as good pay and conditions as they now enjoy."

Immediately after the reading of this declaration, the Lords voted, That, according to the antient and fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, the Government is, and ought to be by Kings, Lords, and Commons.

Then, Sir John Grenville came to the House of Commons, and presented a Letter to them from his Majesty, with the same declaration inclosed, which was read, as well as the Letter directed to General Monk to be communicated to the Council of State and the Army. These papers, which, three months before, would have lain unregarded on the table, were now consider'd as convincing proofs of the King's good intentions, and sufficient reasons to restore him to the exercise of the Kingly power, without requiring other conditions than what he should himself be pleased to grant. The Commons therefore readily agreed to the vote of the Lords, and so the King saw himself restored without any of the conditions which had caus'd so long a war, and so great an effusion of blood. This is a clear evidence, either that the Royalists were much superior in number in the House, which nevertheless is not very probable, or that the Presbyterians were willing to desist from conditions which they had formerly so ardently demanded, for certain terms relating to their religion, which had been positively promised, but which, as they were never performed, gave afterwards too just cause of complaint.

The King being effectually recognized, by the vote of both Houses, the Commons order'd, that fifty thousand pounds should be presented to him, ten thousand to the Duke of York, and five thousand to the Duke of Gloucester. These Princes had never before been masters of such Sums (1).

Then the Commons order'd, that all the Journals should be searched, and those Acts and Orders razed out which were inconsistent with the Government of King, Lords and Commons. The army, the navy, and the city of London prepared Addresses to congratulate his Majesty on his restoration, and to promise him perfect obedience, and these Addresses were delivered to Clarges, who undertook to carry them to the King. The 8th of May, the King was proclaimed in London with great solemnity, and Commissioners from the Parliament and City departed on the 11th to wait on the King, who expected them at the Hague. Some Pre-byterian Ministers also repaired thither, as well to imprint on the King a sense of the service lately done him by their sect, as to found his inclinations with regard to the liberty, which they had probably stipulated, before they engaged in the affair of his restoration.

The King confirm'd by word of mouth what he had promised by his declaration. But when they besought him not to revive the use of the Common-Prayer in his Chapel, and that the Surplice might be discontinued, he warmly answered, That whilst he gave them liberty, he would not have his own taken from him (2).

After the King had given audience to the Parliament's Commissioners the 16th of May, and received the homage of Admiral Montague, and the other officers of the navy, who waited on him at Scheveling, he still remained some days at the Hague, as well to prepare for his departure, as to receive the compliments of the States (3), and embarked on the 23d. He arrived at Dover the 25th, and the same day at Canterbury, where on the morrow, he honoured Monk with the Order of the Garter. The 29th, his Birth-day, he arrived at Whitehall, thro' a numberless multitude of People, who, by their acclamations, demonstrated their joy at his restoration (4).

(1) The City of London sent also ten thousand pounds to the King, and a thousand pounds a-piece to his two Brothers. Phil 91, p. 707.

(2) Whitelock says, "The Ministers had discourse with the King, and were much satisfied with him," p. 702. But the Lord Clarendon's words are: "Though they were much unsatisfied with him, they ceased farther troubling him." Tom. 3. p. 602.

(3) Who made him a present of six thousand pounds. Whitelock, p. 702.

(4) Burnet observes, in the History of his own Times, that such unanimity appeared in the proceedings of the Parliament for the King's Restoration, that there was not the least dispute among them, but upon one single point, yet that was a very important one. Hill, afterwards the famous Chief-Justice, moved, "That the Committee might be appointed to look into the propositions that had been made, and the concessions that had been offered by the late King, and from thence digest such propositions, as they should think fit to be sent over to the King. This was seconded, but by whom the Bishop forgot. At such a motion was presented, Monk was intrusted how to answer it: He told the House, That he had information of such numbers of incendiaries still in the Kingdom, that if any delay was put to the sending for the King, he could not answer for the peace either of the Nation or Army. And as the King was to bring neither Army nor Treasure with him, either to fright or corrupt them, propositions might be as well offered to him when he should come over, as he moved for sending Commissioners immediately. This was echoed with such a shout over the House, that the motion was no more insist'd on. And this, says Burnet, was indeed the great service Monk did. To the King's coming in without conditions, may be well imputed all the errors of his Reign, and it may be added, many mischiefs that followed afterwards, p. 88, 89.

The Parliament, on April 25. 1649, agreed upon a new sort of Coin, whereof there were coined, Crowns, Half-Crowns, Shillings, Six-pences, Pence, and Half-pence. The larger pieces were inscribed on one side, THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND, and had St. George's Cross in a Shield, betwixt a Palm branch and a Laurel; Reverse, the same Shield conjoined to another, in which is a Harp for Ireland, (vulgarly called the Breches) above which there is XII. the Legend GOD WITH US. The Six pence has VI. above the Shields. The Two pence and Pence have no inscription, only the Initial Figures 1 and the Half-penny only the single Shield, with the Harp on the Reverse. There were likewise coined pieces of fine Gold, of the same Form and Money, Queen Elizabeth's being only marked on the flat edge. The Copper Farthing has the Cross under a Garland, ENGLAND. FARTHING. Reverse, a Harp, FOR NECESSARY CHANGE. Oliver Cromwell's Crown-piece is imitatively performed, and preserved as a choice Medal in the Cabinet of the Curious, being the first metal Money that has an inscription upon the Rim. It has his Head Laureat, OLIVAR. D. G. RP. ANG. SCO. HIB. CEC. PRO. Reverie, in a Shield crowned with the Imperial Crown of England, St. George's Cross in the first and fourth quarters; St. Andrew's for Scotland in the BELLO. 1658. upon the Rim, HAS. NISI. PERITVRVS. MIHI. ADIMAT. NEMO. The Dye of this piece having received a Flaw or Crack the first strike, leaves a Mark upon the Money just below the Neck; a sure token to distinguish the true Crown-pieces from the counterfeit. The Half-Crown is equally beautiful, though not so rare. The Shilling is likewise a very fair piece, milled on the Edge, and very rare. (Fig. 1.)

26. CHARLES II.

1660.
Aspects of the Federal Parties at the King's Assembly.
Burnet.

AT the arrival of the King, the face of England was entirely changed, and joy, pleasures, publick and private rejoicings succeeded to trouble, fear, and consternation. The People were so tired of the life they had led for twenty years past, that they did not believe it possible to be in a worse state. Every one rejoiced to see at last a calm after so long a storm, and expected to enjoy a tranquillity, fought in vain for so many years. The Royalists and Episcopalians were at once raised to the height of their wishes, in beholding Charles II. on the throne of his ancestors, and the Church of England about to resume her former lustre. The Presbyterians flattered themselves, that their late services for the King, would at least, procure them an entire Liberty of Conscience, and the free exercise of their Religion. The Republicans, Independents, Anabaptists could not, indeed, hope to be restored to the state they had enjoyed so many years, but expected at least an entire impunity, agreeably to the Breda declaration. The Regicides, that is, the late King's Judges, were the only persons that could not but expect the punishment, they justly deserved, and yet, even they despaired not of the King's clemency, as indeed, such as cast themselves upon it, were not wholly disappointed. It is not therefore strange that the whole Kingdom should resound with joyful transports, and unite in receiving with loud acclamations a King, who, according to the general expectation, was to restore the publick tranquillity and happiness, and put all things in their natural order.

Extreme pre-possession in favor of the King.
idem.

Charles II. at the time of his restoration, was thirty years of age, and but little known to most of his Subjects, because he had long lived out of his Dominions. His actions in the West, during his youth, where he commanded for the King his father, had been distinguished by no advantageous event. His conduct in Scotland, when he was called to the Crown of that Kingdom, had not redounded to his honour, since, in his Declaration published there, he had not scrupled to sacrifice the King his father to his own private advantage. In short, the battle of Worcester had acquired him no reputation, in which some pretend he had been too careful of his person, though others speak of his valour on that occasion with great commendation. However this be, his defeat did not contribute to raise his fame as a General. Nevertheless, his friends, with a view to his restoration, had published such extravagant praises of him, and with such assurance, that, before his arrival in England, he passed there for an accomplished Prince, endowed with all the virtues and noble qualities of a hero. This prepossession did more mischief to England, than all the calumnies thrown upon the last King. Every one was thereby almost equally disposed to put an entire confidence in the new King, in the belief, that a Prince of such a character could never abuse it (1). It was hoped, that content with restoring the Government to the state it was in under Queen Elizabeth, he would avoid treading in the steps of his Father and Grandfather, without attempting to extend his Prerogative. This hope was the more readily entertained, as it was not doubted, that the example of his Father had made a strong impression upon him. It will hereafter appear, to what excess this confidence was carried, and what use

Charles made of it to begin the ruin of the Liberty and Religion of the English, which his successor James II. had certainly accomplished, had not God, by a revolution the most wonderful, blasted his designs, when he thought himself most secure of success. This project to render the King absolute, and equally employ for that purpose the assistance of Catholics and Protestants, begun by James I. vigorously pursued by Charles I. interrupted by twenty years troubles, was eagerly resumed under Charles II. If this be not laid down as the basis of the events of this reign, I don't think it possible to account for the conduct of King Charles II. unless it be believed, that he acted by mere caprice, without principles, maxims, or any design, which can't be thought of a Prince, who had as much wit and sense as any Prince in Europe. But it is not yet time to descend to these particulars, especially as it is uncertain whether this project was formed at the beginning of his reign, or owing to some favorable junctures. At least, the conduct of Charles immediately after his restoration, gives no occasion to suspect he had already thought of it.

Charles had, as I have said, embraced the Catholic Religion, before his return into England. Some say, he abjured the Protestant Religion to Cardinal de Retz, before he left France the last time. Others pretend, it was in the year 1659, in his journey to Fontarabia, in order to procure his restoration, by the assistance of the two Crowns of France and Spain. However this be, the secret, known only to the Earl of Bristol, and Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington, was so well concealed, that the publick was ignorant of it, till after the King's death, when his successor, James II. was pleased to divulge it. But at present, it is a thing of which there is no room to doubt. It may be affirmed, his embracing the Catholic Religion was not through a principle of Conscience, since, in the whole course of his life, he showed no sense of Religion. The greatest compliment a famous Author thinks fit to pay him, is, to say he was no Atheist (2). This is confirmed by the character given of him by the Earl of Mulgrave, who cannot be suspected of a design to slander him. His sentiments of Religion in general may be judged of, by what Dr. Burnet says of him, in the History of his own Times, namely, that he scrupled not to communicate the same day in two different Chapels, publicly in the Protestant, and privately in the Popish. However, he lost no opportunity, in his Speeches to the Parliament, to boast of his attachment to the Protestant Religion, and his zeal for its advancement. Such behaviour, so unworthy of a Christian, cannot but be very injurious to his memory. Accordingly, those who have most endeavoured to palliate his failings, have not been able to deny, he was a perfect master of dissimulation.

He had, besides this, a maxim not much less dangerous, namely, that there was neither sincerity nor chastity in the world out of principle, but that some had the one or the other out of humour or vanity; and believed no body served him out of love, and therefore he was quits with all the world, and loved others as little as he thought they loved him. He was extremely affable, and so easy and complaisant, that he seemed to take a pleasure in bestowing favours, by his manner of receiving the requests that were made to him. But he forfeited at last the esteem and af-

(1) When the Earl of Swinton came to see what Charles II. was like to prove, he said once, in great wrath, to Chancellor Hyde, That it was to him they owed all: they either set or trated, so if he had not possessed them, in all his Letters, with such an opinion of the King, they would have taken care to have put it out of his power, either to do himself or them any mischief. Hyde answered, He thought the King had so true a judgment, and so good these Intimations. Burnet, p. 80.

(2) Burnet's words are, "He laid once to my self, he was no Atheist, but could not think God would make a man miserable, only for taking a little pleasure out of the way." Tom. 1. p. 4.

His Faults.

Milgrave.

He was so addicted to his pleasures, that though he was very capable of business, had a good judgment, quick apprehension, and great penetration, his Ministers could hardly prevail with him to suspend his pleasures some hours, and attend to affairs, which required some application. But it happened also, sometimes, that when he would apply himself to business, he dispatched more in one day, than his Ministers in several.

As his Mistress devoured his whole time, so they consumed all his treasures. Though his revenues were larger than those of any of his predecessors, except Henry VIII, and the Parliament often granted him extraordinary supplies, he was ever in want, because he spent his money without measure or discretion, as he received it. This threw him upon his Parliament, and, not to break with the Commons, he was obliged to promise what he never intended to perform.

solution

These are the principal faults imputed to King Charles. But, on the other hand, it cannot be denied, that he had many good qualities, which might have produced happy effects, had he made a better use of them. His wit was lively, his conception wonderful, and his judgment exquisite. He knew the interests of the Princes of Europe, better than any of his Ministers. He had applied himself, during his exile, to the study of Physick and the Mathematics, and more particularly to Navigation, and the building of Ships, in which he had made great progress. With these qualities, he might very easily have governed his Dominions, in a manner glorious to himself, and advantageous to his Subjects, and made himself arbiter of Europe. And yet, his reign cannot be said to be either glorious to himself, or happy to his Subjects. The reason is, that because of his attachment to his pleasures, and natural remissness, he delivered himself up to the counsels of his Ministers, and particularly of his Brother the Duke of York, who, during this whole reign, had but too much influence upon the resolutions of the King's Council, into which he found means to introduce such, as he believed proper for the execution of his projects, with regard to Church and State. The Duke of York was of a temper more active, violent, haughty, and revengeful. He had formed the design of raising the royal authority to a great height, and withal, of reëstoring the Catholic Religion in England. He never ceased, during this whole reign, to pursue these projects, but more especially, after he was assured, the King his Brother could not expect any legitimate children. All the principal events of this reign, depending properly upon the humour and character of these two princes, I thought it necessary to premise this description of them.

Duke of York's Character.

The King was received in London with extraordinary acclamations, and it began then to be perceived, that, under colour of rejoicing for the King's restoration, the English were throwing themselves into a diffluteness, which would not have been endured under the Presbyterians and Independents, but which daily increased during this whole reign, by the ill examples of the King and the Court.

Great Licentiousness in England.
Burnet.

The King's first care was to establish a Council, composed chiefly of those who had shewn most zeal or affection for himself, or the King his Father. He received, however, some men into it, who seemed naturally to have no pretensions thereto (1). This was the effect of his policy : for it appeared, in his conduct at first, that his principal aim was to suppress the former troubles, in which he could not better succeed, than by securing a perfect reliance on his promises, published in his Breda Declaration. His intention was to stifle, as much as was possible, the enmities which had so long divided his Subjects, and to unite them all in an obedience to the Laws, and a sincere attachment to his person as their true center. He laboured this for some time with zeal, even, as I said, to the receiving in to his Council Men, who had professed themselves his greatest enemies. Herein he imitated his Grandfather Henry IV. of France; but, as will be seen hereafter, he was not suffered long to pursue this course.

Chancellor
Hyde bid

Ber.

Edward Hyde Lord Chancellor, and soon after Earl of Clarendon, was the King's Prime Minister, in whom, with great reason, he entirely confided. But, as very visibly appears in his History of the Civil Wars, he was a mortal enemy of the Presbyterians, and consequently, little proper to preserve the King in his resolution of procuring 1660.

tranquillity for all his Subjects without distinction.

As soon as the King was arrived in England, the Assembly, which from the 25th of April had been honoured with the name of Parliament, was only called the Convention, the King being unwilling to own for Parliament, an Assembly which had not been summoned by his writs. But this change of name was of no long continuance. Two days after his arrival, the King went to the House of Lords, where he sent for the Commons, and gave the royal assent to three Acts; the first was, to change the Convention into a Parliament (2); the second, to continue the monthly tax of seventy thousand pounds for three months; and the third, to continue all judicial proceedings.

The Parliament called a Convention.

June 7.

Acts passed by the States, 12 Car. 1.

Had the directions and orders of the foregoing Parliament been followed, this Parliament should have admitted no member, who had either served the last or present King. But this order having been neglected in the elections, all were admitted without distinction, or examination, who had been chosen. As the scheme for the King's reformation was entirely formed, when this Parliament met, the Presbyterians, who were much superior in number, did not think proper to exclude the Royalists, with whom they had agreed to refore the King. Neither was it thought fit to exclude the Republicans, nor the Regicides themselves, who were not considerable enough to obstruct the project agreed on. This Parliament is therefore to be looked upon as an Assembly, where the Presbyterians had certainly a superiority of voices, and it was this Parliament that reformed the King to the Throne of his ancestors, and, during their short continuance, gave him very real marks of their zeal for his service, and the re-establishment of peace and tranquility in the Kingdom (3).

The affairs of this Parliament, after the King's arrival, consisted in three principal points. The first was an Act of Pardon or Indemnity for whatever had passed since the beginning of the troubles. This Act was absolutely necessary for the security both of the Persons and Defendants, of those who had been concerned in these troubles, and were liable to be called to an account, if the laws had been strictly executed. For as, from the year 1642, the King's party had been deemed rebels by those who were in power; the King, coming to rule in his turn, might have declared rebels all who had been in arms either against him or his father. The question of right concerning the war between the King and the Parliament, remaining undecided, it was natural for him who had the power in his hands, to explain the laws in his own favour. But, on the other hand, it was to be feared, that rigour, on this occasion, would kindle a new flame. Besides, it was very difficult precisely to explain wherein consisted the Rights of the King and those of the Subject, considering the arguments on both sides, and the infinite cavils to which such a discussion was liable. In a word, explications of this nature had occasioned the troubles, which, if it was possible, were intended to be buried in eternal oblivion. It was thought therefore that the best means to quiet the minds of the subjects was, an Act of Indemnity for every thing during the troubles.

Indemnity,

The second affair of the Parliament, was to enable the King to disband the army. There was no reason for keeping on foot an army which had been the principal cause of the disorders committed of late years, and which would have been still capable of disturbing the peace of the Kingdom under an able leader.

The Army

The third affair was the settling the King's revenue, since it was absolutely necessary to give him wherewithal to support the Government, and put him in a condition to be courted and feared. On these three important affairs the Parliament bestowed their first care, and began with the Act of Indemnity, as being the most urgent. For this purpose the House of Commons solemnly declared, in an address presented to the King by the whole House, that they accepted, in the name of themselves, and all the Commons of England, the gracious Pardon offered by his Majesty in his declaration from Breda, with reference to the excepting of such as should be excepted in an Act of Pardon. The Lords likewise presented a petition of the like import.

death.

Immediately after, the King published a Proclamation, Proclamation declaring, that all such of the late King's judges as did in favour of not surrender themselves within fourteen days, should be the King's absolutely excluded from the general Pardon. Though, by Judges.

(1) They were thirty in all. The Dukes of York, and Gloucester, Sir Edward Hyde, General Monk, Admiral Montague, [Earl of Sandwich,] the Marquis of Ormond, the Marquis of Dorchester, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earls of Southampton, Lindsey, Berkshire, Norwich, Manchester, Northumberland, St. Albans, and Leicester; Viscount Saye and the Lords Wentworth, Seymour, Colpepper, and Roberts, Denzil Holles, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir George Carteret, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, &c.

ter, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Colonel Howard, Arthur Ansell, Sir Charles Berkley, Sir Edward Nicolai, and Sir William Morrice.

(3) Burnet says, these five following Persons, all Presbyterians, had the chief hand in the Restoration; Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, afterwards Earl of Shaftsbury, Sir Arthur Anselm, afterwards Earl of Anglesey, Denzil Holles, created Lord Holles of Ipsich, the Earl of Mancaster, and the Lord Roberts.

1660. the words of this Proclamation, those who surrendered themselves could not be assured of their lives, it was nevertheless understood, that the King made use of this artifice only to have it believed, that he would not limit the power and resolutions of the Parliament on this point, and it was not doubted that the two Houses considered this Proclamation as a sort of Pardon, at least for life, to those who should confide in it. In consequence of this proclamation, twenty of the late King's Judges voluntarily surrendered themselves. Others withdrew out of the Kingdom, and some were taken in attempting to escape.

The Republicans demand of the King particular Letters of Pardon.

While the Parliament proceeded in the Bill of Indemnity, some leading Republicans, who had not been the King's judges but had exercised civil or military employments during the troubles, fearing to be called to account, demanded of the King Letters of Pardon under the Great-Seal, in order to screen themselves from all prosecution. The King very readily granted their request, showing thereby that he really intended to perform his promise in his Breda declaration. For he was persuaded, there was no better way to pacify the troubles, and give his subjects confidence, than the exact observance of his promises.

The King, his Brothers, &c. dine in the City. Phillips, p. 714.

The 5th of July, the City of London invited the King and the two Princes his Brothers, the great Officers of the Crown, and both Houses of Parliament to an entertainment, the magnificence whereof was suitable to the riches of the City which gave it, and the quality of the persons invited.

The Act of Indemnity meets with some warm Opponents. Ibid.

Though the King really intended the Act of Indemnity should be quickly dispatched, it met with great obstacles in the House of Commons with regard to the clauses which were to be inserted. Some were for having no regard to the Breda Declaration, but for making examples of all who had most ardently supported the late usurpation. This raised a suspicion that the King encouraged these men, and intended to suspend the effect of his Declaration by means of the Parliament, till he was revenged of his enemies. This was industriously dispersed amongst the people in libels, tending to destroy all confidence in the King's promises, and revive the troubles by driving to despair those who knew themselves most guilty. To dispel therefore these suspicions, which might have produced ill effects, the King sent a message to the House, to press them to dispatch the Act of Indemnity, and to make it agreeable to his Declaration from Breda. This message so quickened the debates, that a few days after, the Act passed the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords for their concurrence.

Prepared by the Commons. Phillips, p. 710.

In this Bill, the House of Commons excepted for life and estate, but a few of the most notorious and active Regicides. But the Lords, incited by divers petitions of the widows, children, and relations of persons executed by the sentences of the Courts erected during the usurpation, were for excepting from Pardon all who had been Judges in those Courts. The King fearing new delays from this difference of sentiments between the two Houses, came to the House of Lords, the 27th of July, and in a pathetic Speech, endeavoured to persuade them to pass the Bill as sent up by the Commons. He presented to them "that he was obliged in honour to perform what he had promised in his Declaration; that he never thought of excepting any but the immediate murderers of his Father; that the peace and tranquillity of the Kingdom entirely depended upon the performance of his promise, which (says he) if I had not made, I am persuaded neither I nor you had now been here: I pray therefore let us not deceive those who brought or permitted us to come together, and earnestly desire you to depart from all particular animosities and revenge, or memory of past revocations, and pass this Act without other exceptions than of those who were immediately guilty of the murder of my Father."

Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill of the Commons. Phillips, p. 711.

This Speech, and a message sent by the King to both Houses on the same subject, determined the Lords to conform to the Declaration from Breda. They therefore sent the Bill to the Commons with two amendments. The first concerned twenty persons, who by the Commons Bill were liable to all the penalties, it should please the Parliament to inflict, death excepted, though they were not the King's Judges. The Lords refused their consent to this clause (1), because it was contrary to the declaration from Breda. The other amendment related to the twenty Judges of the late King, who had voluntarily surrendered themselves upon the King's Proclamation of the 6th of June. For the Lords included in the pardon, both for life and estate, these twenty, who had distinguished themselves from the rest by their confidence in the King's clemency, whereas the Commons were only for granting them life, leaving them liable to forfeiture of estates, imprisonment, banishment, or such other penalties as the Parliament should think proper. This was the subject of several conferences between the two Houses, which in the end, produced an unanimity of sentiments, according to which the Act was formed. In one of these conferences, Chancellor Hyde declared, That being employed in an embassy to Spain, he was expressly charged by his Majesty to avow, That the horrible murder of his Father was not the Act of the Parliament, or People of England, but of a very wretched and little company of miscreants in the Kingdom. This was agreeable to the Commons, that they ordered such of the Privy-Council, as were Members of the House, to thank the King for this just defence of the Parliament and People of England. At last, the King repairing to the House of Lords the 29th of August, gave the royal assent to the Act of Indemnity, which contained in substance:

Act of Indemnity. Statutes, 12 Car. 2. Phillips.

Penalties against those who should use any words of reproach tending to revive the memory of the late troubles, with an absolute pardon to all who had been engaged in them, excepting the following persons, namely,

Forty nine of those who had been the late King's Judges, with this distinction that as to the twenty, who had voluntarily surrendered themselves, if they were condemned, their execution should be suspended till the King and Parliament should order the same.

Oliver Cromwell, Bradshaw, Pride, and one and twenty others, who were dead, were made subject to confiscations, and other penalties which the King and Parliament should ordain.

Philips and Sir Arthur Haslerig were put in the same condition.

Hutchinson and Laffels were declared incapable of exercising any office, and condemned to one years forfeiture of the revenue of their estates.

It was moreover ordained, that Oliver St John, and seventeen others named in this article, should be excluded from any benefit by this Act, if they accepted, or executed any office in England, either ecclesiastical, civil, or military.

All that had given sentence of death in any of the late illegal High-Courts of Justice, except Colonel Ingoldby and Colonel Thamlingson, were disabled from being Members in any Parliament, or bearing any office in England or Wales.

Those who had converted to their use any goods, belonging to the Church, were excluded from the benefit of this Act.

Sir Henry Vane and Lambert were excepted from pardon, both as to life and estate.

The King likewise passed on this occasion the following Acts.

Other Acts Statutes.

1. An Act for confirmation of Judicial Proceedings from the 1st of May 1642, notwithstanding their illegality.

2. An Act for provision of monies to pay off the armies and navy.

3. An Act to fix the interest of money at six per Cent.

4. An Act for a perpetual Anniversary Thanksgiving on the 29th of May, the day of his Majesty's nativity and restoration.

After the King had given his assent to these five Acts, he made a Speech to both Houses, to testify how much he was pleased with them; concluding, "I am so confident of your affections, that I will not move you in any thing that immediately relates to my self: And yet I must tell you, that I am not richer, that is, I have not so much money in my purse, as when I came to you. The truth is, I have lived principally ever since, upon what I brought with me, which was indeed your money: for you sent it to me, and I thank you for it. The weekly expence of the navy eats up all you have given me by the bill of Tunnage and Poundage; Nor have I been able to give my Brothers one shilling since I came into England, nor to keep any table in my house, but what I eat at my self. And that which troubles me most is, to see many of you come to me at Whitehall, and to think you must go some where else to seek your dinner. I do not mention this to you as any thing that troubles me: Do but take care of the publick, and for what is necessary for the peace and quiet of the Kingdom, and take your own time for my own particular, which I am sure you will provide for, with as much affection and frankness, as I can desire."

The Commons observing what the King said concerning his Brothers, made a present to the Duke of York of ten thousand pounds, and of seven thousand to the Duke of Gloucester. After this, they proceeded to the settling the King's revenue, and resolved to raise it to twelve hundred thousand pounds, which was more than any King of England had ever enjoyed, except Henry VIII. (1). But before this could be completed, the King came to the Parliament the 13th of September, and passing some Bills that were ready, they adjourned themselves to the 6th of November. The Acts passed on this occasion were:

1. An Act for the speedy raising of a hundred thousand pounds for a present supply by way of Land-tax.
2. An Act to empower and direct the Commissioners in what manner to disband the army, and to pay off some part of the Fleet.
3. An Act for raising one hundred and forty thousand pounds, at seventy thousand pounds a month, to begin the first of November.
4. An Act for regulating the Bay trade.
5. An Act for encouraging and increasing Shipping and Navigation.

6. An Act for restoring some Ministers to their places, and confirming others in vacant places.

The same day died the Duke of Gloucester, the King's brother. This Prince, now twenty years of age, was unexpectedly taken out of the world by the small-pox. As he had very good qualities, the King his brother who loved him tenderly, appeared more concerned for this loss, than for any misfortune which had ever befallen him.

During the adjournment, the King appointed Commissioners for trial of the Regicides. The number of those concerned in the late King's death, as Judges, Officers of the Court of Justice, and others, amounted to fourscore and one, of whom twenty-five were dead, nineteen had made their escapes, seven others, for having been less engaged in the crime were thought worthy of the King's clemency, and twenty-nine were condemned to die. But of these, twenty who had surrendered themselves upon the proclamation of the 6th of June, were pardoned as to life, but reserved for other penalties, as imprisonment, banishment, and forfeiture of estate. So, ten only were executed, namely, Harrison, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker, Astle. What was most remarkable in the death of these men was, that not one expressed any signs of repentance, or did not think himself a martyr. Two only were prevailed with to pray for the King. They were almost all Anabaptists, Enthusiasts, Fifth-Monarchy-Men, who believed no violence unlawful to advance the Kingdom of Christ, and all men of mean birth, except Carew and Scroop.

A few days after the adjournment of the Parliament, the King published a proclamation concerning Religion, containing eight articles, most of which prescribed certain rules to the Bishops in the exercise of their spiritual jurisdiction. The two last deserve a particular notice, because they discover that the Presbyterians were not like to continue long undisturbed. The VIIIth ran, that a certain number of Divines should be appointed to revise the Liturgy, and make such alterations in it as should be judged necessary, and that scrupulous persons should not be punished or troubled for not using it at present. The VIIIth was concerning Ceremonies, to which, for the present, no person should be obliged to conform. This restriction, for the present, clearly shews, that those who advised the King to this proclamation, had no intention to leave the Presbyterians in possession of that liberty which had been promised them by the Breda declaration, and doubtless, by General Monk, when they engaged to promote the King's restoration.

There were yet living, nine of the old Bishops, who were restored to their Sees without any difficulty (2). Seven or eight others were newly consecrated for other Dioceses, and Cosins, against whom so many complaints had been brought before the Parliament in 1640, for the See of Durham, where he had once been Prebend (3). Bishopricks and Ecclesiastical Benefices were offered to the most eminent Presbyterian-Ministers, but all refused except Reynolds, who accepted the Bishopricks of Norwich (4).

I shall not enlarge on the embassies to the King from divers Princes of Europe, to congratulate him upon his restoration; the States of the United-Provinces were the first who paid their compliments on this occasion, and at the same time, sent him several excellent pictures, drawn by the best hands.

September the 25th, the Princess Dowager of Orange came to London to congratulate the King her brother upon his restoration. And in November arrived from France the Queen-Mother, who brought with her the Princess Henrietta her daughter, and the Prince Palatine Edward, brother to Prince Rupert. It is pretended, the Queen endeavoured to persuade the King to marry Hortensia Mancini niece to Cardinal Mazarin: but her proposal being coldly received, she advised him to pursue the negotiation already begun, of his marriage with the Infanta of Portugal. Thus much is certain, the proposal to the King the marriage of the Princess Henrietta, with the Duke of Orleans, to which she found no obstacle. If some authors are to be credited, she had two other ends in her view. The first was to draw the King her son into the interest of France, against Spain. The second, to persuade him to remove the Chancellor, whom she did not love, as he himself shews in his History. But the King did not think fit to part with so serviceable and affectionate a Minister, to please his mother.

The Parliament meeting the 6th of November, appointed a Committee to congratulate the Queen-Mother on her return to England. Shortly after, the Commons made a present of ten thousand pounds to each of the two Princesses her daughters.

The Duke of York had, since his return to England, married Ann, Chancellor Hyde's eldest daughter, to which he had been in some measure compelled (5). The young Lady proving with child, there were not wanting persons to dissuade the Duke from so unequal a match. But the King's affection then for the Chancellor, over-ruled all consideration of the injury which the Duke his brother, and the Royal Family, might receive from it. He signified to the Duke, that it would oblige him not to use any shifts, and plainly told him, he must drink as he had brewed, to which the Duke submitted from a motive of obedience. It may easily be imagined, the Queen-Mother, who hated the Chancellor, was not pleased with this marriage. Accordingly she long refused to see her daughter-in-law, and it was at the pressing instances of the King that she at last consented to receive her respects. But during her stay in England, she ever treated her with so much coldness, that her aversion to the marriage was very visible.

The Parliament having, in their first session, dispatched every thing relating to the Act of Indemnity, applied their next care to put the King in a condition to disband the army. For this purpose, several sums were granted him, and as the money was raised, regiments were broke, so that this work was finished in the space of a few months. Thus, the army, which had so long been the terror of England, was reduced to Monk's single regiment. But in disbanding the army, the King introduced a novelty, which displeased many people. He formed, for his ordinary guard, two regiments, one of Horse, and one of Foot, in imitation of the practice in France, and other Kingdoms. This was so much like a standing army, which the English have always opposed, that many began then to fear, the King had ill-designs upon the publick Liberty. His predecessors had no other guards than the Gentlemen Pensioners, established by Henry VII.

The disbanding of the army being in such forwardness, the King told the Parliament, it was his intention to dissolve them in December. Whereupon, the Commons, to give his Majesty a fresh instance of their zeal, confirmed and renewed their former resolution, of granting the King an annual revenue of twelve hundred thousand pounds. But the time being too short to settle the funds on which this revenue was to be raised, the House thought it more proper to employ what remained, in preparing the Bills to be passed, before the dissolution.

Little care has been taken to shew the reasons inducing the King to dissolve a Parliament, which had been so favourable to him, and expressed such zeal for his interest. It is my private opinion, that the Ministry, and particularly the Chancellor, looked with no good eye upon a Parliament, which had so many Members of that of 1640, and who, in all appearance, whatever they might pretend, had not relinquished their antient principles, concerning kingly power. They, doubtless, believed, it would be very difficult to manage and govern such a Parliament, at their pleasure. Besides, very probably, the Chancellor, great enemy of the Presbyterians, had formed the design of depriving them of their promised liberty, which would have 1660. been impossible, if this Parliament had continued. They believed therefore, that in the present favorable disposition of the people to the King, their credit would be sufficient to have a new Parliament, more proper for the execution of their designs. The transactions of the next Parliament confirm this conjecture. It must, however, be said for the Chancellor, that though he detested the maxims of the Parliament of 1640, with respect to the royal authority, yet he went not the lengths of the other side, nor believed it for the interest of England, to have a King, whose will should be a law. This is manifest, from an incident at the very time I am speaking of. A Member of the Commons, Mr. Alexander Popham, who had a considerable influence in the House, offered the King, that provided he was supported by the Court-party, he would undertake to procure an Act, for settling on him and his successors two millions a year, which would free him from any dependence on his Parliament, except in extraordinary cases. The King was pleased with the proposal, and spoke to the Chancellor of it, as of a project advantageous for his interest. But he bravely answered, That the best Revenue his Majesty could have, was the affection of his Subjects, and if he would trust to them, he would never want supplies in time of need. Nor did he rest satisfied with this answer to the King, but even took pains to undeceive the Lord-Treasurer the Earl of Southampton, who had approved of the project, and by very solid reasons, convinced him, that the success of it would be the ruin of the Kingdom. It is pretended, the Chancellor's opposition to Popham's proposal, was one of the chief causes of his disgrace.

The Parliament, before their dissolution, ordered the bodies of Oliver Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and Pride, to be taken out of their graves, drawn on a hurdle to Tyburn, and there hung from ten o'clock till sun-set, and then buried under the gallows. At the same time an Act of Attainder passed, not only against these four, but against the nineteen Judges of the late King, who were fled from justice, among whom was Ludlow, Author of the Memoirs under his name.

About the same time, William Drake, Citizen and Merchant of London, published a Book, intitled, The long Parliament revived, in which he endeavoured to prove, that the said Parliament was not yet legally dissolved. The Commons brought an impeachment of High-treason against the Author, but had not time to bring it to a trial.

At this time likewise several officers, who had served under Cromwell, Desborough, Morgan, Overton, and several others, were arrested upon an uncertain rumour of a plot to secure the King's person, seize the Tower, and kill the Queen-mother, but it did not appear that this rumour had any good foundation.

At last, on the 29th of December, the King came to the Parliament, and gave the royal assent to the following Acts:

1. An Act for levying the arrears of the twelve months assilment.
2. An Act for the farther supplying several defects in the Act for disbanning the army.
3. An Act for six months assilment, at seventy thousand pounds per month, to begin the 1st of January.
4. An Act for the better ordering the selling of Wines by retail, and for preventing abuses in the mingling, corrupting, and limiting the prices of the same.
5. An Act for erecting a Post-Office.
6. An Act for an impost upon Ale, Beer, Cyder, and other liquors, to hold for his Majesty's life.
7. An Act for the raising of seventy thousand pounds for his Majesty's farther supply.
8. An Act for the Attainder of several persons guilty of the horrid murder of Charles I.
9. An Act for confirmation of Leases and Grants for Colleges and Hospitals.
10. An Act to prohibit the exportation of Wool, and Fuller's-earth.
11. An Act for prohibiting the planting of Tobacco in England and Ireland.
12. An Act for taking away the Court of Wards, and Liveries, together with Tenure in Capite, Knights Service, and Purveyances, and for settling a revenue upon his Majesty in lieu thereof (1).

After giving the royal assent to these Acts, the King made the following Speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Will not entertain you with a long discourse, the sum of all I have to say to you, being to give you thanks, very hearty thanks: And I assure you, I find it a very difficult work to satisfy myself in my own expressions of those thanks. Perfunctory thanks, ordinary thanks for ordinary civilities, are easily given; but when "the heart is full as mine, it is a labour to thank you. You have taken great pains to oblige me; and therefore it cannot be easy for me to express the sense I have of it. I will enlarge no further to you upon this occasion, than to tell you, when God brought me hither, I brought with me an extraordinary affection and esteem for Parliaments. I need not tell you how much it is improved by your carriage towards me. You have out-done all the good and obliging Acts of your Predecessors towards the Crown; and therefore you cannot but believe, my heart is exceedingly enlarged with the acknowledgment. Many former Parliaments have had particular denominations for what they have done: They have been titled Learned and Unlearned, and sometimes have had worse Epithets: I pray let us resolve, that this be for ever called the HEALING, and the BLESSED PARLIAMENT. As I thank you, tho' not enough, for what you have done, so I have not the least doubt, by the blessing of God, but when I shall call the next Parliament, (which I shall do as soon as you can reasonably expect or desire) I shall receive your hearty thanks for what I have done, since I parted with you. For I deal truly with you: I shall not more propose any one rule to myself in my actions and counsels than this: What is a Parliament like to think of this action, or this counsel? And it shall be a want of understanding in me if it will not bear that test. I shall conclude with this, which I cannot say too often, nor you too often where you go: That, next to the miraculous blessing of God Almighty, and indeed as an immediate effect of that blessing, I do impute the good disposition and security we are all in, to the happy Act of Indemnity and Oblivion: That is the principal corner-stone which supports this excellent building, that creates kindness in us to each other, and confidence is our joint and common security. You may be sure, I will not only observe it religiously and inviolably myself, but also exact the observance of it from others: And if ever any person shall have the boldness to attempt to persuade me to the contrary, he will find such an acceptance from me, as he would have, who should persuade me to burn Magna Charta, cancel all the old laws, and to erect a new Government after my own invention and appetite."

This flattering speech was received by the people with great applause, every one hoping, that a Prince of this character would have no other view, than the causing his Subjects to live in peace and plenty. After the King had done speaking, the Chancellor made a speech to both Houses, much longer than the King's, but tending to the same end, namely, to persuade them, that the King being extremely tender of his people, all his actions would be directed to render them happy. He forgot not to mention the pretended conspiracy, for the subversion of the present Government. But without entering into any particulars, he contented himself with assuring, that the conspiracy was real, and Ludlow, one of the fugitive Regicides, deeply concerned it. This insinuation was necessary for two purposes. The first was to convince the People of the necessity of putting the Militia into the King's hands, to enable him to suppress the male-contentes. The second, to get a pretence for the breach of the King's promise, in his Breda declaration, by the indispensable necessity of providing for the safety of the State, against the ill-designs of the sectaries. This will appear more clearly hereafter. When the Chancellor had ended his speech, he declared the Parliament dissolved.

This ended this Parliament, about eight months after the first meeting, and seven after the King's restoration. I have already observed, that most of the members were Presbyterians, or at least, that party was superior in the Parliament. For this reason, no doubt, some writers magnifying what this Parliament did for the King, and their disposition in his favour, have insinuated, it was a sort of miracle, that they did not throw up at once all the Liberties of the nation, upon the King's restoration. But this is a groundless exaggeration. For if all the Acts of this Parliament be considered, not one will appear to support this opinion. They recalled the King, but certainly that will not be thought strange. They voted a Revenue of twelve hundred thousand pounds for the King, but it was only a vote which was executed by the next Parliament. They passed the Act of Indemnity at the King's pressing instance, and which was indeed necessary. They granted the King a supply, to pay off the fleet and the army. But could this be avoided without endangering the public tranquillity? They presented the King with, after all, an inconsiderable sum, for his occasions, and his Brothers and Sisters, with thirty-seven thousand pounds. But was any thing more just or more natural than to enable him to maintain his Household, till his revenues were settled? There is nothing therefore in the actions of this Parlia-

1660. ment which infers a disposition, to throw up the liberties of the nation. But it will be seen, that this disposition, which is groundlessly supposed in this Parliament, was really and truly in the next: and that after doing too much, they were forced to alter their measures, and use extraordinary means to oppose the designs of that very King, to whom they had given an almost unlimited power. This second Parliament however has not been censured, whilst the compliance of the first has been industriously aggravated. The reason of this difference is very obvious, namely, that the second Parliament best follows the views and principles of the Writers, who have thus remarked on the former. In short, if it be considered, that the first Parliament sat only seven months after the King's restoration, and that the second continued eighteen years, it will be easily perceived, to which of the two may most justly be ascribed the design of throwing up the Liberties of the nation.

The conclusion of this year brought the King a new cause of affliction in the death of the Princess of Orange his sister, who died of the small pox the 24th of December, at the age of twenty nine years (1). She left but one Son, who was afterwards King of England by the name of William III.

This same year died [William Seymour] Earl of Hertford, lately reitor to the title of Duke of Somerset. He has been often mentioned in the reign of Charles I. Doctor Hammond the famous Divine, died a little before the King's restoration.

It was also this year that the Royal Society was erected by the King's Letters Patents, who besides granted it all the necessary encouragement towards a discovery of the Secrets of Nature, and of what is most curious and necessary in natural Philosophy and Mechanicks.

Before we close this year, it will not be improper briefly to mention the transactions of Scotland, from the time of the King's restoration.

After the King left Scotland, with an army to invade England, the English entirely conquered that Kingdom, under the conduct of General Monk, who served the Parliament. If the King, after that, thought of Scotland, it was only to cherish the dissenters, and try, by means of his adherents, to excite a revolt. For though he had been recognized and crowned in Scotland, he always considered his interests as directly opposite to those of that Kingdom, or at least, of the governing party. He never loved the Scots, and his belief of their selling the King his Father to the English Parliament, greatly inflamed his prejudice against them, nor was it diminished by his residence in that country. His restoration to the English throne rendered him doubly master of Scotland; first, because he was her natural King, and had even been crowned there; secondly, because Scotland had been conquered by the English. Nothing would have been easier than to leave Scotland in dependence upon England, there being no likelihood, that the Scots would ever be able to recover their liberty. It even seems, the King was not averse to this thought, since he left Scotland to be governed by the English, more than two months after his restoration. But at last he resolved to restore that Kingdom to its ancient form of Government. For this purpose, Monk writ in the King's name to the English Commissioners who had been employed as Judges there, to discontinue their functions the 22d of August; and at the same time Proclamation was made, for the convening of the Committee of Estates, till a Parliament should be called. The King named the great officers of the Kingdom, and took care to chuse for these posts and for his Council, such as were believed most firmly devoted to him. The Earl of Glencairn was made Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Crawford, Lord-Treasurer, the Earl of Gofflin, Justice-general, the Earl of Lauderdale, first Secretary of State, and General Middleton, the King's Commissioner. These men, as well as those who formed the Council, had been always firmly attached to the King's interest. Thus the Scots, freed from the yoke laid on them by Cromwell, were exactly in their former state, as before the troubles in 1637, that is, under the Government of a King and Ministers of the very same principles with Charles I, and the Ministers of that time. But there was this disadvantageous difference, that they were no longer able to make themselves feared, being entirely subdued. They had soon occasion to know what they were to expect. Some of their Ministers assembling for the drawing up a Remonstrance concerning their Grievances, were sent to prison by the Committee of Estates, without any examination of the nature, motive, or language, of the Remonstrance, as if the bare design of presenting it had been criminal. Moreover, a Proclamation was published against all unlawful assemblies and seditious writings, on supposition, that the assembly of the Ministers and their petition were of that nature. This might have satisfied the Presbyterians, who were the body of the Scottish nation, what was preparing for them, and that they had no remedy but submission and patience.

They had still another very convincing proof. The Marquis of Argyle repairing to London to pay his duty to the King (2), was arrested, sent to the Tower, and afterwards to Scotland, to be tried on an impeachment of High-treason (3). The King in his declaration from Breda, had not mentioned Scotland. So, the Scots were exposed to the resentment and vengeance of their enemies. Amongst these, Chancellor Hyde was one of the most violent, as he has plainly discovered in his History of the Civil Wars, and, unhappily for the Scots, he was prime Minister in England, and had the principal direction of the King's affairs. Some indeed of the English Council were of opinion, it would be very advantageous to the King, to suffer the Scots to enjoy the benefit of this Breda Declaration. But the contrary advice prevailed, whether from the King's animosity, and that of his counsellors, or from the hopes of such as had faithfully served the King in his troubles, of having the estates of the condemned.

This resolution being taken, the King summoned a Parliament in Scotland, to meet the 12th of December, and published a Proclamation, declaring, that he left it entirely to this Parliament, to examine the conduct of his Subjects of Scotland; and that after his honour was vindicated, and his prerogative established, he would grant a pardon which would witness how much he desired the happiness of his people. It will appear what method he took to procure this happiness to the Scots.

As for Ireland, the King committed the Government of it to Sir Maurice Eustace Chancellor, and the Earls of Ormery, and Monroath, in quality of Lords-Justices, till a Lord-Lieutenant should be appointed.

The year 1661 was ushered in by an extraordinary event. This was an Insurrection of some Fifth-Monarchy-Men, who believed themselves bound in conscience to use their utmost endeavours to advance the Kingdom of Christ on earth. As I have elsewhere spoken of these men, and as their principles are sufficiently known by the tragedies acted by them at Munster, and other places of Germany, it will be needless to give a more particular account of their tenets (4). The 6th of January, while the King was attending the Queen-mother, and the Princess his Sister to Dover, in their return to France, about fifty of these men, under the conduct of one Thomas Venner, assembled in the evening in St. Paul's Church-yard, and killed a man who upon demand, had answered, for God and the King. This giving an alarm to the City, some Trained-bands were sent against them, whom these men quickly routed, and then marched through several streets, and at last retired to Cane Wood (5), from whence a party of Horse and Foot, sent by General Monk, dislodged them, and took some prisoners. But this did not prevent the rest from returning to the City, where they fought furiously, till they were obliged to take Sanctuary in a house. They there defended themselves like men fearless of death, or rather, as secure from all danger, under the protection of Jesus Christ. Here it was that Venner, being wounded, and twenty of his men killed, with as many of the assailants, was taken with the rest of his fellows. A few days after, they were all tried, condemned, and executed, without any confession of guilt, and persisting in their extravagances to the last. Two young men only shewed some signs of repentance.

Though this attempt could not justly be considered as the consequence of a design formed by a whole party, and though the Anabaptists had been all guilty, there was no reason to blame the other Sects, yet the Court urged this insurrection to confirm the rumours of a conspiracy against the Government. The King took occasion to publish a Proclamation, forbidding all Meetings, and Conventicles, under pretence of Religion, and commanding the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to be tendered to all persons affected to the Government, and in case of refusal, they were to be prosecuted on the Statute of the 7th of James I.

It will, doubtless, be thought strange, that by reason of the extravagance of some Anabaptists, all the other Sects should be included in the prohibition of all meetings on account of Religion, contrary to the express terms of the de-

1660-1. declaration from Breda. But it will be immediately seen, that the ruin of the Presbyterian-party was now resolved, and that pretexts were seeking to execute this resolution, particularly, pretences which might create a belief, that what was done, was only for the security of the King's person and government. The end proposed was to insinuate, that Religion was no way concerned, but only the State, and thereby obviate the objection which would naturally be drawn from the Breda declaration, wherein the King solemnly promised, that no person should be molested for his Religion. To succeed the better in this design, an admirable expedient was devised. This was to range under the same denomination, all the Sects differing from the Church of England, in order to impute to the whole body consisting of all these Sects, what could have been imputed but to one, had they been distinguished. This denomination was, that of Dissenters, or Non-conformists, under which were comprehended, as well the Presbyterians, as the Papists, Anabaptists, and other Sects. Thus, by this affected confusion, all the Non-conformists were charged with the faults of one of the Sects comprised under that name, and, as if they had made but one body, punished without distinction, on pretence of keeping them in awe, and preventing them from disturbing the State. The Catholics, the Independents, the Anabaptists, were Non-conformists. Precautions therefore were to be taken against the Non-conformists, and consequently against the Presbyterians, because their enemies were pleased to comprehend them under the same general appellation. Undeniable proofs of what I advance, will hereafter appear. The truth is, the Presbyterians only were properly aimed at, whose ruin was resolved, notwithstanding the declaration from Breda. For indeed, it is not likely, that a King, who had privately embraced the Ramish Religion, would turn persecutor of the Catholics. And the Independents and Anabaptists made then too inconsiderable a figure, that the King's Ministers had but little reason to fear them. But though there had been cause to suspect them, why were they not distinguished from the Presbyterians, who had given no room for such suspicions? All this was only to save, in some measure, the King's honour, at a time when his promises, contained in his declaration from Breda, were openly evaded. This name of Non-conformists, is therefore to be considered as a very ambiguous term, which indeed signifies men who conform not to the Church of England, but not in the sense which was given it, namely, of a body of men inseparably united, composed of all the Dissenters, and acting with the same views, and for the same interest.

Some of the Presbyterian Ministers observing, they were indifferently confounded with Sects, with whom they had no relation, petitioned the King for a conference wherein they and the Bishops, in order to examine wherein consisted their differences, and the objections of the Presbyterians, to the Book of Common-Prayer. The King granted their request, and immediately named twelve Bishops, as Principals, and nine other Clergymen as assistants; and on the Presbyterian side, twelve Ministers as Principals, and nine others as assistants, to confer together at the Bishop of London's house, who then lodged in the Savoy (1). The Commission ran: "That the Commissioners appointed should act for four months, from the 25th of March, and particularly were ordered to advise upon and review the Book of Common-Prayer; — to take into their serious and grave considerations, the several directions and rules, forms of prayer, and things in the said Book of Common-Prayer contained; and to advise and consult upon and about the same, and the several objections and exceptions which shall now be raised against the same; and (if occasion be,) to make such reasonable and necessary Alterations, Corrections, and Amendments, as shall be agreed upon to be needful and expedient, for giving satisfaction to tender consciences, and the restoring and continuance of Peace and Unity in the Churches under his Majesty's government and protection — And to certify to his Majesty in writing, under their several hands, the Matters and Things whereupon they shall so determine, to be by his Majesty approved, &c." Thus the King gave to these twenty one Ministers, a power, they had not desired, to decide, as well for themselves as their Brethren, who were more than two thousand, and for the whole body of the Presbyterians, what was necessary to be altered in the Liturgy, without empowering them to meet beforehand to settle their demands, in order to an union with the Church of England.

From the first day of the conference, it was easy to foresee it would be fruitless. For though the Ministers had already acquainted the King and the Chancellor that they could decide nothing, since they were not authorized by their Brethren, [Sheldon] Bishop of London immediately told them, that as themselves had requested this conference, they were to produce at once all their exceptions to the Liturgy in writing, together with the additional forms and alterations which they desired. The Ministers answered, as they had before done to the King and the Chancellor, That they could decide nothing, without having first consulted their absent brethren, and received from them a commission in form. This tended to a request, that they might be permitted to meet in Synod, and debate together on these matters: But this was never intended to be granted. They were therefore urged, only to declare their own sense, when it was seen, that they could not be brought to act as deputies of a body, by which indeed they were not commissioned. To this it was answered, That they were willing to give in writing their particular sentiments, provided, at the same time, the Bishops would bring in their utmost concessions, that when both were compared, a judgment might be made of the success. But the Bishops absolutely rejected this proposal. At last, the Ministers consented to produce at once all their exceptions, reserving to themselves, however, a power to make additions according to the answers, they should receive, and their offer was accepted. Whereupon, the exceptions were drawn up, and an answer given in by the Bishops, who accepted a reply, and at length some slight alterations in the Liturgy were agreed on. But, besides that the Ministers considered these alterations as insufficient, there was an invincible obstacle to an agreement, which was, that the Ministers not being commissioned, whatever they said, could be esteemed but as their private opinion.

I shall enter no farther into this conference, because, to understand it, requires a competent knowledge of the English Liturgy, and the manner in which divine service is celebrated, which cannot be supplied with regard to the generality of foreigners, for whom this History is designed (2). I shall content myself therefore with some general remarks, to assist the Reader to understand wherein consisted the differences betwixt the Church of England and the Presbyterians, and the conduct of both sides.

During the whole reign of King James, and the fifteen first years of Charles I, the Presbyterians were oppressed, or, at least, may be said, not to be treated by the Church of England as Christian charity seemed to require. From the beginning of the Parliament of the 3d of November 1640, the Church of England was persecuted in her turn, and Episcopacy itself at last entirely abolished. When the Independents were become masters of the Parliament and army, the Episcopalians still continued under oppression, and though the Presbyterian Church-government was outwardly preserved, there was nevertheless an entire liberty for all Protestant sects, which the Presbyterians considered as a violent persecution. This state continued till the beginning of the year 1660, when Monk forming the design of restoring the King, believed it could not be effected without a restitution of that very Presbyterian Parliament which had abolished Episcopacy. This expedient was crowned with success; and by the united endeavours of the Presbyterians and Episcopalians, the King was at last replaced on the throne. The reformation of the King produced that of the Church of England, which was at once in almost the same state he had been before the year 1640. There was, however, this difference, that, during the troubles, the number of the Presbyterians was exceedingly increased, and thereby they were grown much more formidable than under the reign of King James, and the first fifteen years of Charles I. It was therefore the interest of the Church of England, either to ruin entirely the Presbyterian party, which could still raise fresh troubles in Church and State, or oblige them to unite with the national Church, by some small concessions. And for this last purpose, the conference now mentioned seemed to be intended.

But, such conferences upon Religion are seldom attended with a happy success; first, because the two parties must be equally animated with the spirit of peace and charity, which is rarely found amongst men; and, if I may venture to say it, still more rarely amongst Churchmen. Secondly, because in these conferences, one of the parties is usually superior, and in possession of power, and therefore not very ready to quit that advantage, to be reduced to an equality. So, no success can be expected, unless one of the parties will yield every thing to the other. This recalls to my mind a saying of a French Catholic, a man of wit, to a Minister after the conclusion of the religious war in France: Is, said he, you had come to a composition with us while the sword was in your hand, we might have made you some concessions; but now that you are conquered, we would not yield you so much as the christening of bells. The case was much the same in England, at the time I am speaking of. We

(1) Rapin by mistake, has put the number of the Principals of each side for that of the Assistants, and the contrary. See the Account of this Conference, London 1661.

1661. have seen the concessions of Charles I. in the treaty of Newport, with regard to Episcopacy, which, if it was not entirely given up by him, was however reduced to a very small matter. But after the restoration of Charles II. the use of the Surplice was of too great consequence to Religion, to be relinquished. Thirdly, the animosity between the two parties, generally hindered the conferences from succeeding. The one cannot bear to receive laws from the other, nor think of revoking what has been once advanced. Fourthly, instead of thinking seriously on peace, both parties seek only to surprize one another. Lastly, it too often happens, that these conferences are granted by the prevailing, to the oppressed, party, only to have it said, that peace was offered, but rejected by the contrary party. There is room to believe, that in this conference all these circumstances met, and therefore it is no wonder, it succeeded like the rest of the same nature; for, in short, it broke off without any effect, and, as too commonly happens, each party threw the blame upon the other. Mr. Baxter, in his relation of it, says, that the Bishops were absolutely against all concessions. But in another relation it is said, the Presbyterians were so obstinately attached to their opinions, that they would not recede from a single point, and that at last, upon the Bishop of Durham's proposal, being required to declare in writing what they thought sinful in the Liturgy, they put into the list all the articles which kept them from joining with the Church of England, without one exception. They thereby showed, that they considered as sinful, all the forms and practices of the Church of England, even to the use of the Surplice, and by consequence their refusal of an accommodation, unless their opinions were entirely conformed to. These are the mutual accusations of the two parties, on which I am far from deciding any thing as to the truth of the facts. All I can say, without wronging either party, is, that the Presbyterians ought to have receded from several points, which are manifestly indifferent; and that the Bishops should not have scrupled to give up the same points. But people were then very far from being inclined to charity and condescension.

During this conference at the Savoy, the King was magnificently crowned on St. George's day, the 23d of April (1).

The Parliament, which had been summoned for the 8th of May, met on the day appointed. The Representatives, for the most part, were elected agreeably to the wishes, and, without doubt, by the influence of the Court. The greatest part were High-Church-men, that is, violent enemies of the Presbyterians, great assertors of the minutest ceremonies of the Church, and most devoted to the King and the royal Prerogative. They literally followed the principles of Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, which had caused the troubles in the late reign. In a word, this Parliament may be said to be composed by Chancellor Hyde, Prime-Minister, and on the 20th of April created Earl of Clarendon. Let it also be added, that this Parliament was called the Pensionary Parliament, because it was afterwards discovered, that many of the Members received pensions from the Court. It is true, many will not allow that this was so at first, but pretend, that by length of time, and changes upon death, the new Members suffered themselves to be bribed. I cannot however help remarking, that, at the very beginning, this Parliament did things in favour of the King, which no other had ever done, and that it was not till afterwards that they retracted their extravagant maxims, concerning the royal Prerogative. This shows, the Parliament was bribed betimes, notwithstanding the insinuations of some to the contrary. However it be, it may be judged how favorable this Parliament was to the King, since it continued almost eighteen years, on which account it was more justly called the long Parliament, than that of 1640.

As Religion, whether Popery, or Presbyterianism, and the royal Prerogative, are concerned in almost all the transactions of this reign, it is absolutely necessary to acquaint the Reader with some things concerning the Historians. Otherwise, they will be extremely embarrassed, when they read in some Histories things quite contrary to what they read in others. My design is, therefore, by a few remarks upon this subject; first, to prevent their being infensibly, and for want of examination, biased by the opinions or prejudices of the Historians. Secondly, to incline; and thirdly, to assist them, in some measure, to make this examination.

There are three sorts of authors, who have writ the History of this reign. The first are those, who profess to be High-Church with regard to Religion; and with respect to the Government, ascribe to the King an almost unlimited power, provided the King be of their party. These are, in a word, what are called the High-fliers, or rigid Tories. They are good Protestants, but, however, much less enemies of the Papists than of the Presbyterians. For hardly will they allow the latter to be Christians, because they have no Bishops. Now, according to their principles, no valid Ordination can be had without Bishops, and consequently no valid administration of the Sacraments; whence it follows, that Presbyterians baptized by Ministers unordained by Bishops, are not truly baptized.

There is another set of writers of this reign, who, being Protestants, embrace not the extravagant principles of the former, either concerning the Church or the Government. These are of the number of those who are called Whigs, among whom there is a mixture of Churchmen and Presbyterians.

Lastly, there are Popish Historians, whose tenets and principles are sufficiently known.

Each of these Authors has writ the History of this reign according to his principles; for this reason what is praised and approved by one Historian, is blamed and censured by another. For instance, as to this second Parliament, some openly insinuate, that the first years transactions, whether for extending the Royal Power, or oppressing the Presbyterians, were agreeable to reason, justice, and the good of the Kingdom: but what was done, after the breach with the King, was only the effect of corruption and cabal. Others on the contrary maintain, that this Parliament's zeal, whether for the King or against the Presbyterians, was an extravagant zeal which threw them upon measures very detrimental to the nation, and unavoidably engaged them to favour the ill designs of the Court; but perceiving at last the ill use the Court made of this disposition, they espoused the true interests of the Kingdom, in opposing the King's designs.

The Popish Historians are of the same principles with the High-flying Tories concerning the Government. But, whereas King Charles's design of introducing Popery into England is very unwillingly owned by the Tories, the Papists, on the contrary, make it a glorious design, as being very just and religious.

A man must therefore prepare himself to meet these contraries, if he reads several Histories of this reign, and to chuse that scheme which appears most coherent and best supported. For this purpose it will be proper to adhere only to plain facts, without regarding the frequent insinuations of the Historians, most of whom suppose without ceremony their own scheme, even in the facts they relate. I own this is difficult: but I suppose the Reader's search is after truth, which he will never attain, if he implicitly follows, without examination, the first Historian which comes in his way. Wherefore, I thought it proper to inform him before hand of what he is to expect, and wishal to leave him at liberty to examine my scheme as well as that of others. But to return to the Parliament.

The King going thither the 8th of May, made a speech to both Houses, in which, after some expressions of his great affection for his People, he recommended two Bills, which he had prepared to confirm the Act of Indemnity. He repeated the same words he had said to the last Parliament. Adding, that they might be as severe as they pleased against new offenders, but he should not think him a wife man or his friend, who should persuade him to infringe the act of Oblivion, or to consent to a breach of a Promise so solemnly made when he was abroad. Lastly, he communicated to them his intended marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, which had been resolved with the approbation of his whole Council.

The Earl of Clarendon, Lord-Chancellor, afterwards enlarged on the particulars mentioned by the King in his Speech, but chiefly upon two points untouched by the King. The first related to the seditious Sermons of certain Preachers, which tended to renew the old troubles, and whose license it was necessary to curb. The second point on which he insisted, was the late insurrection, which he aggravated in the strongest expressions, intimating, that by intercepted letters it might be concluded, that the combination reached very far, and if the vigilance of the Lord-Mayor had not prevented it, the City had been in danger of being burnt to ashes. He did not name the authors of the seditious Sermons, because his design was not to accuse this or that person, or any particular sect, but only to obtain a general order against the Preachers who were not of the Church of England. As to the pretended conspiracy discovered, as he assured, by a multitude of intercepted letters, it does not appear that any one was prosecuted in consequence of these letters, or that others besides Venner and his companions, were proved to be con-

Remark upon the Histories of Charles II.

(1) For the greater splendor of this Solemnity, the following Titles of Honour were conferred, Sir Arthur Ashley, was made Earl of Ashley; Sir John Grenville, Earl of Bath; Frederick Cornwallis, Lord Cornwallis; Sir George South, Lord De la moire; Sir Horatio Townshend, Lord Townshend; Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Lord Ashley of Wimborne; John Crew, Baron Crew; Sir Charles Howard, Earl of Carlisle; Demetrius Holles, Lord Holles; Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon; Arthur Lord Capel, Earl of Effingham; Thomas Lord Bradstreet, Earl of Cardigan. cerned in it. It is therefore manifest, this Speech tended only to incense the Parliament against the Seculars or Non-conformists in general, under colour of providing for the safety of the King and the State, in a supposition, that it was only from them any danger could be feared. This will appear hereafter to be more than a mere conjecture.

Sir Edward Turner, the Duke of York's Attorney-General, being chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, at the recommendation of the Court, both Houses unanimously voted their thanks to the King for the gracious communication of his resolution to marry, and went in a body to congratulate him. Then the House of Commons ordered all their members to receive the Sacrament according to the prescribed Liturgy within a certain time, upon pain of being expelled the House.

The 20th of May the two Houses jointly ordered, that the writing called the Solemn League and Covenant should be burnt by the common Hangman; which was performed with great triumph. Three days after, the following Acts were also ordered to be burnt. The Act for erecting a High-Court of Justice for trying and judging Charles Stuart, &c. The Act for subscribing the Engagement against a King and House of Peers: The Act for declaring the People of England to be a Commonwealth, &c. The Act for renouncing the title of Charles Stuart, and another for the security of the Protector's person.

The zeal of the two Houses breeding a fear in the Republicans, that the Act of Indemnity passed in the late Parliament, would not be sufficient for their security, if it was not confirmed by the present, they addressed the King for this confirmation. Upon their petition, the King writ to both Houses the 2d of June, earnestly recommending to them to pass the Bill he had prepared for them. He even told them plainly, however necessary the bills might be, that were ready for the royal assent, he had no mind to pass them till the Act of Indemnity was likewise presented to him. This letter having produced the desired effect, the King came to the Parliament the 8th of July, and passed the following Acts.

An Act to confirm the Act of Indemnity passed in the late Parliament.

An Act to empower the King to receive from his Subjects a free and voluntary contribution for his present occasions.

After this, the King made a short Speech to both Houses, to remind them of his Declaration from Breda, and of that signed by his adherents when his Restoration began to be talked of, in which they promised to renounce all memory of former unkindnesses, and vowed all imaginable good will to each other. Therefore, continues he, let it be in no man's power to charge me or you with breach of our word or promise.

These two Acts being dispatched, the Parliament proceeded with vigour in finishing the other Bills which were before them, and in particular, one for the confiscation of the estates of twenty one Regicides deceased, and to punish three, who were spared as to life, but liable to other Penalties. These were the Lord Monson, Sir Henry Ashmole and Robert Wallop. It was ordered, that they should [on January 30.] be drawn upon sledges with ropes about their necks to the gallows at Tyburn, and from thence conveyed to the Tower, there to remain prisoners during their lives.

The 30th of July the King came to the Parliament, and gave the royal assent to several Acts.

1. An Act for the safety and preservation of the King's person and government; which had three remarkable clauses. The first, that if any person should compass, imagine or intend the King's death, destruction, or bodily harm, to imprison or restrain his royal person, or depose him, or should levy war against him within or without his realm, or stir up any foreign power to invade him; or should declare or express such his wicked intention, by printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and advised speaking, he should, being thereof legally convicted, be adjudged a traitor.

The second, that if any man should maliciously or advisedly publish or affirm his Majesty to be an Heretic or a Papist, or that he endeavoured to introduce Popery; or should stir up the people to hatred or dislike of his royal person or government; that every such person should be made incapable of any office or employment either in Church or State.

The third, that if any man should maliciously and advisedly affirm, that the Parliament, begun in Westminster the 3d of November 1640, is yet in being, or that any Covenant or Engagement since that time imposed upon the People, doth oblige them to endeavour a change of the Government either in Church or State, or that either, or both Houses of Parliament have a legislative power without his Majesty, that then every such offender, being legally convicted thereof, should incur the Penalties of a Præmunire mentioned in the Statute of the 16th of Richard II.

The other Acts now passed were:

An Act to repeal the law made in the 17th year of Charles I, for the exclusion of the Bishops from the House of Peers.

An Act to prevent tumults and disorders committed under pretence of preparing, or presenting petitions to the King or Parliament.

An Act to declare the sole right of the Militia to be in the King.

An Act to empower his Majesty to dispose of the Land-forges.

An Act for the regulation and government of his Majesty's Navies and Forces by sea.

An Act to impose certain pains and penalties upon the persons or estates of those who had a hand in the horrible murder of the late King.

An Act for the collection of the great arrears of the duty of Excise.

An Act for providing necessary carriages for the King in all his progresses and removals.

After these Acts had received the royal assent, the King thanked the two Houses for them, and particularly for that which restored the Bishops to their seats in Parliament, and that which concerned the Militia. This done, he gave them leave to adjourn to the 20th of November.

When the King called this Parliament, he had no intention to assemble the Clergy in Convocation, believing, the Savoy conference was equivalent to a Convocation. But Dr. Hoglin, in a letter to a Minister of State, showed, that this conference ought not to hinder the King from assembling the Clergy. He alledged, among other reasons, that the Clergy could not be bound by the Acts of the Savoy assembly. This was precisely what the Presbyterian Ministers, appointed by the King, had alledged, to show they had no power to Act for their brethren. This Convocation did a thing considerable, except granting the King a Benevolence by virtue of the Act above-mentioned (1).

While these things passed in England, the Parliament in Scotland proceeded with no less vigour. Being assembled in January, they began first with abrogating and annulling the solemn League and Covenant of the two Kingdoms; and commanded that none of his Majesty's Subjects presume, on pretence of any authority whatsoever, to require a renewing, or swearing to the said League and Covenant, without his Majesty's special warrant and approbation.

They next declared the power of the Militia to be in the King alone, and the Act of the 16th of January 1647, by which the late King was delivered to the English, to be infamous, disloyal, and contrary to all Laws divine and humane.

Episcopacy was restored in Scotland, and for that purpose, four Presbyterian Ministers, Sharp, Hamilton, Barnard, and Leighton came to London, where, after being ordained Deacons and Priests, they were consecrated Bishops by the Bishops of Hexham, [with two other assisting Prelates.] All four renounced their first Ordination as invalid, and before their departure for Scotland, obtained from the King a declaration of his pleasure to restore in Scotland the Government of the Church by Archbishops and Bishops, as it was in the year 1637. Upon this declaration, the Privy-Council of Scotland strictly discharged all ecclesiastical meetings at Synods and Presbyteries, &c. till they should be authorized by the Archbishops and Bishops. An Act was also passed in the Scotch Parliament to prohibit all Meetings and Conventicles in private houses for religious worship. By another Act the right of Patronage was revived. And lastly, by another, it was ordained, that all persons in any public office, should sign a solemn declaration against the national Covenant in 1638, and the solemn League and Covenant in 1643, in which they declared it unlawful to Subjects upon pretence of Reformation, or any other pretence whatsoever, to enter into Leagues and Covenants, or take up arms against the King, or those commissioned by him.

The Marquis of Argyle having been sent prisoner to Edinburgh, was there tried, and condemned; and beheaded the 27th of May. Many believed, that revenge, and the avarice of some persons (2), who hoped for the confiscation of his estates, were more powerful motives for his 1661. sentence, than justice. A few days before his death, the remains of the unfortunate Marquis of Montrose were solemnly interred, and the head of the Marquis of Argyle was set up in the place where his stood.

In England the bodies of Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle, who were shot at Colchester in 1648, were likewise honorably interred.

During the recess of the English Parliament, the Cavaliers or Royalists made great complaints of the King's ingratitude, for suffering them to perish with hunger, while, by the Act of Indemnity, he procured his enemies the secure enjoyment of immense riches, acquired by illegal means. The city swarmed with libels on this subject. One, amongst the rest, writ by L'eftrange, told the King bold truths with great freedom. But the King thought not proper to take notice of them, believing, the least he could do for the loyal sufferers, was to let them complain, since it was neither in his inclination nor power to reward them.

To suppress these complaints, the city was filled with rumours of projects and plots against the King's person and government (1). But many believed this only an artifice to incense the Parliament against the Non-conformists in general, and the Presbyterians in particular, and afford a pretence to proceed against them. The Presbyterians were always confounded with the other Sects, under the denomination of Non-conformists, who were charged with ill-intentions against the Government, though hitherto the Presbyterians had given no cause of suspicion, at least, nothing was proved against them. The most plausible thing urged, was, that the Independents, Anabaptists, and the other Republicans, seeing the Presbyterians no better treated than themselves, formed great projects, in hopes of being joined by the Presbyterians at a proper time. Thus much is certain, the project of the Act of Uniformity, which will be mentioned hereafter, was now formed, and the rumours, true or false, of Plots carried on by the Non-conformists, might be very useful to palliate the breach of Declaration from Breda, under colour of providing for the safety of the State. For the Presbyterians could not be attacked on account of Religion, without a most manifest violation of the King's promise.

The Earl of Sandwich, Vice-Admiral, being sent with a fleet to Lisbon, to bring home the new Queen, appeared before Algier to make a treaty with the Carfairs, or reduce them to reason by force. But he found them so well prepared, that he was obliged to return to Lisbon without any thing done.

The Parliament re-assembling the 20th of November, the King made a Speech to both Houses, without any necessity, as they had only been adjourned. He gave for reason, that it was to have the pleasure to see the Bishops restored to their places in Parliament. He then desired the Commons, "To think seriously upon settling his revenues, and providing for the expences of his Navy; adding, that he asked nothing for himself, but as his interest was united with that of his People." He told them, "That he was willing they should make a full inspection into his disbursements and receipts, but would not have them believe any loose discourses, of giving away eighty thousand pounds in a morning. That he had much more reason to be sorry, that he had not to reward those who had ever faithfully served the King his Father and himself, than ashamed of any bounty he had exercised towards any man." After this, he told the two Houses, "That he was sorry to find, the general temper and affections of the nation were not so well composed, as might have been expected, after such signal blessings from God Almighty upon all, and after so great indulgence and condescensions from him towards all interests. That there were still many wicked instruments, who laboured night and day to disturb the publick peace, and make all people jealous of each other. That it was worthy of their care and vigilance, to provide proper remedies for the diseases of that kind; and if they found new diseases, they must study new remedies. That the difficulties which concerned Religion were too hard for him, and therefore he recommended them to their care and deliberation, who could best provide for them."

When the King published his declaration at Breda, and expressed so much zeal for passing an Act of Indemnity, agreeably to this declaration, he did not think it out of his power to give a positive promise, that no person should be molested on account of Religion. But, in all appearance, since the elections of the Members for this new Parliament had been made, according to the wish of the Ministry, in favour of High-church, it was suggested to the King, that the best expedient to obtain whatever he desired, was to sacrifice the Non-conformists to the Parliament. It is not very strange, that a Prince of his character, who had secretly embraced the Roman Catholick Religion, or, to speak more properly, had no Religion at all, should not think it a point of honour to support the Presbyterians, at the hazard of losing the affection of his Parliament. He visibly begins therefore, in the conclusion of this Speech, to use evasions; and by talking in general of persons, labouring to trouble the peace of the Kingdom, furnishes his Parliament with a pretence of treating the Non-conformists with rigour, as disturbers of the publick tranquillity. As to Religion, he leaves the care of it to the Parliament, as of a thing too difficult for him. By this he entirely departs from his Breda declaration, and the Act of Indemnity, which till now he had so much insisted on.

This Speech was as the signal to the persecution, which soon after, broke out against the Non-conformists, and particularly the Presbyterians, for they alone were properly aimed at. We shall see presently, that upon rumours of conspiracies forming against the State by the Non-conformists, without distinction of any sect, Acts were grounded, which manifestly destroyed the Breda declaration, as well as that published by the Royalists, when the King's restoration was in view.

I shall briefly state the argument used to support this persecution. It is true, the King generously pardoned the offences committed before this declaration: but he did not promise to pardon such as should be afterwards committed. Now, since the King has been restored, the Non-conformists are plotting to disturb the Government. It is therefore necessary to take all possible precautions, to disable them from executing their designs. In answer to this argument, it is needless to urge the slender foundation of these pretended plots, for which no man was ever punished, or even prosecuted (2). It suffices to remark, that it supposes, what is entirely false, that the Non-conformists made but one body, because their enemies had been pleased to give them all one common name. And yet, upon this supposition so notoriously false, it was thought lawful, to deprive all the Sects, and particularly the Presbyterians, of the benefit of the declaration from Breda, only because their enemies were pleased to confound them with the Independents and Enthusiasts, under the same appellation of Non-conformists. I do not think it necessary to stay any longer to demonstrate the weakness of this argument. But it was sufficiently valid, for men who had the power in their hands.

To prepare the way for the designed alteration, solely founded upon rumours of an imaginary conspiracy, the Parliament thought proper to support these rumours, by a petition to the King for a Proclamation, to order all officers, and disbanded soldiers to depart twenty miles from London. It was natural to infer from thence, that there were grounds for fear, which was indeed the design of this proclamation.

The same day, the Commons voted the King a supply of twelve hundred thousand pounds for his present occasions, that is, to be disposed of as he pleased. This was the first fruits of his condescension, with regard to the Breda declaration.

Then, the Parliament resumed the affair of the nineteen Regicides, who had voluntarily rendered themselves upon the Proclamation of the 6th of June, and yet had been sentenced to death. They were asked, what they had to say, why judgment should not be executed upon them? They alleged the King's proclamation, on which they had relied, believing it was his intention to pardon them. But this did not prevent a Bill from being brought in for their execution, which was read twice, and then dropped, probably, on the King's powerful solicitation in favour of the condemned, who could not have been executed without great prejudice to his honour and faith.

The rumours, as I said, of plots, were absolutely necessary to serve for foundation to what was intended to be done. The Earl of Clarendon had mentioned these plots at the close of the late Parliament, and the King at the opening of this. To strike a greater blow, the Earl of Clarendon, at a conference between the two Houses, affirmed positively, that there was a real conspiracy, which had been forming ever since March, to disturb the peace of the Kingdom. He named several persons engaged, and gave an exact account of the manner how it was to be executed. He said, though the design seemed disconcerted as to the City of London, where the officers and disbanded soldiers had been invited to repair the 11th of the instant December, it was still pursued in the country. The Lords, upon this information, named a Committee of twelve of their House, to whom they desired the Commons to add a proportionable number of their Members, to examine this 1661. having design, that the execution of it might be prevented, and the peace of the Kingdom secured.

Certainly, it cannot but appear strange to all, who are not prejudiced by passion or party, that a plot, of which the Court so well knew all the circumstances, the parties engaged, the day of its designed execution in London, the endeavours still used to promote it in the Country, and concerning which a multitude of Letters had been intercepted, that this plot, which was examined by a numerous Committee of both Houses, should not be attended with the death of any of the complices, nor even with the prosecution of one single person. It was, however, upon this sole foundation, that the Corporation Act, of which I am going to speak, and all the proceedings against the Non-conformists were built.

The 20th of December, the King came to the Parliament, and passed the two following Acts:

An Act to grant the King twelve hundred and sixty thousand pounds, for his present occasions, to be levied by a monthly tax of seventy thousand pounds, for eighteen months.

An Act for regulating Corporations.

This Act, which was called the Corporation Act, ran, That in order to perpetuate the succession in Corporations, in the hands of persons well-affected to the Government, it was ordained, that every Mayor, Alderman, Common-Council-man, or any other officer in a Corporation should be obliged, besides the common oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, and a particular declaration against the solemn League and Covenant, to take an oath, declaring, That it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the King; and that he did abhor that traitorous position, of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those commissioned by him.

If the oath had imported, that it is not lawful, on any pretence, to take arms against the established Government, there had been nothing in it extraordinary. But in this oath, the King was supposed to be sole master of the Government, which is manifestly false, since he can neither make nor repeal a law, without the concurrence of the Parliament, and consequently, the sovereign authority does not reside in him alone. This supposition was exactly like that of the Parliament of 1649, that the supreme authority resided in the people, or their representatives in Parliament, the absurdity of which was exposed by Charles I. in almost every one of his Papers. They are both equally false, and to show that the people of England do not think them true, we need only observe, the absurd consequences they have produced, and which have been constantly rejected by the English. By the maxim of the Parliament of 1649, that Parliament believed, they had a right to abolish Monarchy, and change the established Religion. By the maxim contained in this oath, James II. believed he had a right to introduce a new Religion, and establish an absolute power. But the English nation thought themselves bound by neither the one nor the other of these extravagant maxims. Charles II. was restored, notwithstanding the decision of the Parliament of 1649; and James II. was deposed, notwithstanding the decision of this Parliament, which had ordered the oath we are speaking of, though the King had concurred to the Act. It is impossible in England to mark out the degree of obedience due from the people to the King, or the Parliament, when they are disunited. The reason is evident, because in their union consists the essence of the Government. It is in the King and Parliament united together, that the absolute power, necessary to all Governments, is lodged. Wherefore, to say, that upon any pretence or reason whatsoever, it is not lawful to resist the King or the Parliament, is, properly throwing up the liberties of the nation to the mercy of the one or the other. The High-Churchmen, of which this Parliament was principally composed, had then extraordinary ideas of the royal authority. And I know not whether they have yet entirely lost them. But it is certain, many of them at last opened their eyes, and saw the dangerous consequences of their maxims, and even this Parliament did not think fit to admit them all, as will hereafter appear.

When these Acts were passed, the Parliament was adjourned to the 10th of January.

Elizabeth Stuart, Daughter of James I, Electress Palatine, and Queen of Bohemia, died at London the 13th of January.

The Parliament being assembled the 10th of January, the first thing the Lords did, was to receive the report of the Committee, appointed to examine the conspiracy, supposed to have been forming now almost a year, but which had yet produced no effect. The Earl of Clarendon, who made the report, says, that two persons, namely, Wildman and Salmen were particularly engaged, and that a list of one hundred and forty officers of the late army had been found with the latter: that it was further discovered, that the conspirators were to have had a meeting at London the 10th of December, and designed to have secured Strensbury, Coventry, and Bristol, by the end of January: That where they were prevalent, they were to begin with horrible assassinations, which moved one of them to relate, that the fugitive Judges of the late King were entertained in France, Holland, and Germany, and held a strict correspondence with the English conspirators, and were encouraged by foreign Princes: That they had bought a large quantity of arms, and boasted, if they could once get foot in England, they should not want means to carry on their work. That this had been discovered by one of the complices, and confirmed by such intelligence from abroad, as never failed: That many met at Huntingdon, and rode about the town in the night, to the great terror of his Majesty's good Subjects: That it might be wondered, that some proposals were not made to remedy the impending evil, but the King, having conferred with the Duke of Albemarle, had ordered two troops of Horse to Strensbury, and as many to Coventry, who, in their way, had dispersed a great knot of thieves, and taken twenty: That a rumour was spread, that the appointing of this Committee was only a plot of the Court to govern by an army, but the Committee was very sensible of the reality of the danger, and hoped the two Houses would be too: That since then enemies were united for their destruction, they should also be united for their own preservation.

When it is considered, that after a strict examination of this conspiracy by a numerous Committee of both Houses, the whole amounted only to a list of one hundred and forty officers found upon a man, without any other circumstance; and concerning one of the Complices not named; to secret intelligence that never failed; to a Company of men assembled about Huntingdon, in the night, for some unknown reason; That not any of these pretended conspirators, who might have been known by one of their party who had discovered the whole Plot, was either punished or prosecuted for this supposed crime; that in short the noise of this conspiracy ceased at once after the Uniformity-Act had passed: when these things, I say, are considered, who can help thinking it a mere invention, to give some colour to this Act. The Government durst not attack the Presbyterians directly on account of their Religion. The declaration from Breda was too express on that article. But they were to be charged with new crimes, in order to be deprived of the benefit of that declaration. They were not even accused of attempting to disturb the State, since the King's restoration; but the Non-conformists in general were accused in order to punish the Presbyterians, as if they made but one body with Independents, Anabaptists, Enthusiasts, because to all these Sects was given the common name of Non-conformity.

The 1st of March, the King sent for the Commons to Whitehall, and reproached them, though very civilly, with having done nothing towards the settling of his revenues. He artfully insinuated, that the late troubles had principally been owing to the wants and necessities of the Crown, thereby intimating, that this had obliged his Father to stretch the royal prerogative. He added, that there was still in the Kingdom a Republican-party, who promised themselves a second revolution, and therefore the only way to disappoint their hopes, was to enable the Crown to support it self, and secure them. He continued his speech in this manner.

"Gentlemen, I hear you are very zealous for the Church, and very solicitous, and even jealous, that there is not expedition enough used in that affair. I thank you for it, since I presume it proceeds from a good root of piety and devotion: But I must tell you, I have the worst luck in the world, if after all the reproaches of being a Papist while I was abroad, I am suspected of being a Presbyterian now I am come home. I know you will not take it unkindly, if I tell you that I am as zealous for the Church of England, as any of you can be, and am enough acquainted with the enemies of it on all sides; that I am as much in love with the Book of Common-Prayer as you can wish, and have prejudice enough to those who do not love it, who, I hope, in time will be better informed, and change their minds; and you may be confident I do as much desire to see an Uniformity settled as any amongst you. I pray trust me in that affair: I promise you to hasten the dispatch of it with all convenient speed; you may rely upon me in it. I have transmitted

1661-2. "the Book of Common-Prayer, with those alterations and additions, which have been presented to me by the Convocation, to the House of Peers, with my approbation, that the Act of Uniformity may relate to it (1). So that I presume it will be shortly dispatched there: And when we have done all we can, the well settling of that affair will require great prudence and discretion, and the absence of all passion and precipitation."

The King's design in this part of his Speech, was to obtain, that the execution of the Act of Uniformity when it should be passed, might be left entirely to him, in order to have it in his power to dispense with whom he pleased. This he afterwards discovered in words more clear and precise, though the Parliament would not grant his desire.

The Commons being returned to their House prepared several Bills, and amongst the rest one against the Quakers, for refusing the oaths. Not that they believed themselves freed by this refusal from the obligations imposed by these oaths, but because they considered all oaths as unlawful. This Act, and another for the repairing of the streets and high-ways in and about London, were passed by commission.

At last, on the 17th of May, the King coming to the Parliament, gave his assent to several Acts, of which I shall only mention the most important.

An Act for the Uniformity of publick prayers, and the administration of the Sacraments.

An Act for the better regulation and ordering of the standing forces of the nation.

An Act for laying a perpetual and annual tax of two shillings on every Chimney-hearth in each House, Almshouses excepted.

An Act to empower his Majesty to levy, for the next ensuing three years, a tax of seventy thousand pound per month, if necessity shall so require.

Moreover, the House of Commons ordered sixty thousand pounds which exceeded the sum of twelve hundred thousand pounds, granted by a former Act, to be distributed among the poor Cavaliers, who had been sufferers in the late troubles.

After the passing of these Acts, the Parliament was prorogued to the 18th of February.

Amongst these Acts three are particularly remarkable.

By the Act of Uniformity, every Minister was obliged, on pain of losing all his ecclesiastical Preferments, to conform to the worship of the Church of England, according to the new Book of Common-Prayer, before the Feast of St. Bartholomew next, from whence it was called the Bartholomew Act. Every Minister was also obliged to sign the following declaration. I do here declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing contained and prescribed in and by the Book intitled, the Book of Common-Prayer, &c. Besides this, every Person was obliged to sign a declaration contained in the Militia-Act, in which declaration he was not only to promise to conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England, but likewise to renounce the solemn League and Covenant, declaring it to be an unlawful oath, and imposed upon the Subjects of this realm against the known laws and liberties of the Kingdom.

The penalties annexed to this Act were many, particularly, — No person should be capable of any benefice, or presume to consecrate and administer the holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, before he be ordained Priest by Episcopal Ordination, upon pain to forfeit for every offence the sum of one hundred pounds.

I shall make but three observations upon this Act; the first shall be in the very words of the declaration from Breda. And because the passion and uncharitableness of the times have produced several opinions in Religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animosities against each other, which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of conversation, will be composed or better understood; we do declare a liberty to tender Consciences, and that no man shall be disturbed or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of Religion, which do not disturb the peace of the Kingdom; and that we shall be as ready to consent to such an Act of Parliament, as upon mature deliberation shall be offered to us for the full granting that indulgence.

Let this clause be compared with the Act of Uniformity, and it will easily be seen, what care the King's own Ministers, who were the real authors or promoters of this Act, had of his honour, and what regard he himself paid to his promise. Notwithstanding all this, some did then and do still consider this Act as the great support and bulwark of the Church of England, and extol the authors as deserving the everlasting praises and blessings of the Church; whilst others, perhaps, no less sincerely attached to the Church of England, looked upon it as her reproach.

My second remark is, that to this came the promises made to the Presbyterians by the King's party, upon the assurance of which they had cheerfully laboured for his restoration, according to the directions received from his friends.

My third observation is, that by an artifice the most gross, not only conspiracies were invented which had no reality, but which, though they had been true, could not have been imputed to the Presbyterians, who were not to answer for the crimes of the other Sects.

It will perhaps be imagined, that being a Presbyterian, I speak out of interest and passion. But I protest, I have always had, and still have, a profound respect and extreme veneration for the Church of England, to which I always conformed during my residence there, and am ready to do it again, were I to return. But this does not oblige me to consider all her members as free from failings, passions and prejudices; especially on the present occasion, wherein, as a Historian, truth requires of me to shew clearly to material a point of History, as the treachery which was used to the Presbyterians. For at their ruin it was that the Uniformity Act was principally levelled (2).

The Act concerning the Militia, intitled, An Act for Militia &c the better regulating and ordering the standing forces of the nation, contained amongst others the following clause, Forasmuch as within all his Majesty's realms and dominions, the sole and supreme power, government, command and disposition of the Militia, and of all forces by sea and land, and of all sorts and places of strength, is, and by the laws of England ever was, the undoubted right of his Majesty, and his royal predecessors, Kings and Queens of England; and that both or either of the Houses of Parliament, cannot, nor ought, to pretend to the same; nor can, nor lawfully may raise, or levy any war offensive or defensive against his Majesty, his heirs or lawful successors, &c.

It was ordained by this Act that all Lord-Lieutenants, An Oath Deputy-Lieutenants, Officers, and Soldiers, should take the following oath: — I do declare, and believe, that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take arms against the King; and that I do abhor that traitorous position, that arms may be taken by his Authority against his Person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such military commissions.

When in the latter part of the oath the words, commissioned by him, came to be debated in the House of Commons, a great Lawyer (3) moved, that the word lawfully should be added to make all clear. But the Attorney-General Sir Henage Finch answered, "That it was not necessary, for the very word Commission imported it; since if it was not lawfully issued out to lawful persons, and for a lawful reason, it was no Commission." And the whole House assented to this interpretation. The same difficulty, offered in the House of Lords (4), was removed in the same manner (5). But in supposing that by commissioned could be only meant lawfully commissioned, where would have been the hurt to add the word lawfully, in order to take away all obscurity, if the Parliament had intended to put any restriction upon the Royal Power?

Suppose now, the King invested with such a power, had attempted to abrogate all the old, and substitute new laws, at his pleasure, to abolish the use of Parliaments, and force his subjects to embrace the Popish Religion; which way could they have maintained their Liberties and Religion, since there was no supreme Court to call the King to an account, and since by this oath it was High-treason to take arms against him upon any pretence whatsoever? These are the usual effects of factions in a State. Each party, when superior, thinks only of doing the contrary to what the other has done, without considering the consequences, and generally both parties run into extremes. The Parliament of 1640, incensed against Charles I. for attempting to stretch his prerogative, are not content to reduce him within due bounds, but assume also Privileges inconsistent with the constitution, and proceed at last entirely to destroy the Monarchy. The Parliament of 1661

In the Collect for the Parliament, the King was styled, our most religious King, an Epithet that gave great offence, and occasioned much indecent railing. Some new Holy-days were added also, as St. Barnabas, and the Conversion of St. Paul, and more Lessons were taken in out of the Apocrypha, particularly the story of Bel and the Dragon. Burnet, p. 183. (5) By the Earl of Argyll.

1662. not satisfied with restoring the King to his just rights, invest him with an unlimited power, and render him as absolute as any Monarch in the universe.

The annual tax of two Shillings upon every Fire-hearth, not only to this King for his life, but to his successors for ever, shewed, that this Parliament acted not upon a bare motive of zeal and affection for the reigning King, but also seemed to have an intention of putting the Kings of England in a condition to support themselves without Parliaments, by so great a power ascribed to them. And indeed, this single tax amounted to about two hundred and fifty six thousand pounds a year, which, together with Tunnage and Poundage, Excise, and other Duties, made the revenue of the King double to any of his predecessors; so fearful was this Parliament of not sufficiently shewing their zeal for monarchical Government, which had been, many years, so unworthily treated.

The session of Parliament being ended, the Court was wholly employed in preparing for the reception of the new Queen, who was daily expected. She left Lisbon the 15th of April, and arrived at Portsmouth the 14th of May, where the King went to receive her (1). A report was spread, that the marriage was solemnized by Sheldon, Bishop of London, though others, who believe themselves better informed, say, the Queen refused to be married by any but a Catholic Priest; that the King consented to it, and that very few persons were present at the solemnity (2). This marriage had been proposed by D. Francisco de Mello, the Portuguese Ambassador, to General Monk (3), at the time that he was labouring the King's restoration. The Ambassador's aim, was to procure Portugal a powerful assistance from England, since by the Pyrenean treaty, the King his master had no farther expectations from France. To prevail with Monk, and, by his means, with the King, he engaged, that the King of Portugal should give with the Princess his Sister, three hundred thousand pounds Sterling, the Town of Tangier upon the Coast of Africa, and the Isle of Bombay in the East Indies. Monk, pleased with these offers, proposed this marriage to the King immediately after his arrival (4). The King approved of it, and accordingly it was concluded in the year 1661 (5). Some pretend, that Chancellor Hyde strenuously opposed the marriage upon an information, that the Princess of Portugal, by some natural infirmity, was incapable of having children, but that the King took this for an artifice of the Court of Spain to prevent a marriage, which could not but prove prejudicial to their great designs upon Portugal. Others say, the Chancellor was the chief author of this match. Before the consummation of the marriage, the King, in a treaty with Portugal, engaged to assist that Kingdom against Spain (6), and in the nineteenth article, obliged himself never to restore Dunkirk to that Crown.

When this marriage was completed, the Queen-mother arrived in England (7), with design, as it seemed, to spend there the residue of her days. The King assigned Somerset-House for her residence, and gave her wherewithal to keep a splendid and magnificent Court. But she did not, it seems, find in England, the satisfaction she expected, for after three years she returned to France.

The most considerable transaction at the English Court, in the remaining part of this year, was the sale of Dunkirk. The King looked upon this place as his property, since it was surrendered to Cromwell by France, in consideration of the successes she had received in her war with Spain. Whether this reason was solid or not, it is certain, the King believed he had a power to dispose of the town as he pleased. The two years large supplies granted him by Parliament were all consumed, and his coffers empty, though his extraordinary occasions had been only the disbanding of the army, and payment of the arrears due to the fleet. Whatever were the King's motives to part with this important place, he resolved to sell it to France, by which it was gladly purchased. The negotiation for this sale began in July 1662, and ended the following October. The King's first demand was twelve millions of Livres, and Count d'Estrades, who managed this affair for Lewis XIV, offered but fifteen hundred thousand. This great difference between the sum demanded and offered, was the sole subject of the negotiation. Each feigned, however, to be unwilling to recede, though both were equally impatient, the one to sell, and the other to purchase, and knew one another's intention. Charles told Count d'Estrades by his Chancellor, that four ways were proposed for the disposal of Dunkirk. The first was, to surrender it to the Spaniards, who offered what price the King should be pleased to demand. The second was, to treat with the Dutch, who offered immense sums. The third was, to put it into the hands of the Parliament, who would keep it, without any diminution of the King's pretensions as Sovereign. The fourth, which he thought most just, and suitable to his interests, was to sell it to the King of France. There was also a fifth way proposed by the Earl of Sandwich, which was to demolish it, and fill up the harbour, to render it entirely useless.

The King of France answered, He much doubted the offer of the Spaniards, who had not yet been able to pay his Queen's portion, though on that payment depended the validity of her renunciation: That it would be more advantageous to the King of England, to make a free gift of the place to the Spaniards, than to receive for it twenty millions from the Dutch, which, most certainly, they would not give. And as to delivering it to the Parliament, the King knew better than he, how dangerous it was to increase the Parliament's power.

In short, Charles came to seven millions of Livres, and the Count d'Estrades offered him two, then two and a half, and at last three. But the King his master had given him power to offer four, at the very time that Charles consented, that the sale should be fixed at five millions. The King of France was obliged to come up to his price, when he found nothing would be abated, and that he run the risk of being disappointed, if he stood out any longer. There was also some difficulty about the time of payment; the King of England would have all the money at once upon the delivery of the place, and the King of France offered to pay it at several times. At last it was settled, that one half should be paid down, and the other in two years, at two several payments.

Dr. Burnet, in his History of his own Times, says, that Charles squandered away the money, received for Dunkirk, among the Mistress's creatures (8). Others assure, that R. Coke, with one part he discharged his Sister the Duchess of Orleans's Dowry, and with the other assisted Portugal.

The motives alleged by the Chancellor to the Count d'Estrades, to shew, the King was under a necessity to sell Dunkirk, were, that, his coffers being empty, he could only by that means be enabled to assist Portugal. But in England, this reason was not to be urged, because all knew what vast sums the King had received from the Parliament. To cover therefore the dishonour of this sale, it was pretended, that the garrison and repairs of the fortifications cost the King immense sums to no purpose; that the sea was so tempestuous, and the grounds so swelling upon every storm, that there would never remain a certain storage to that port (9). On this occasion several pamphlets were published, tending to shew the injury done to the nation in the sale of Dunkirk to France, and others to palliate, or to demonstrate the necessity of this sale.

But the greatest dispute concerning this subject, was upon two questions, Whether the proposal came from France or England? And whether the Earl of Clarendon, as he was generally accused, was the author and promoter of this sale, or, as some pretend, protested he would not be concerned? I find Mr. Echard, in his History of England, and Dr. Burnet, in that of his own Times, entirely clear the Earl of Clarendon. It is however a fact, as certain as a fact of this nature can be, that the Earl of Clarendon proposed it, negotiated the sale, and concluded it. To prove this truth, I need only quote the letters of Count d'Estrades, who was commissioned to manage this affair, 1662 and consequently knew more of it than any other. It must however be said, in excuse of Mr. Eschard and Dr. Burnet, that when they writ this part of their Histories, Count d'Esfrades's letters, concerning the Dunkirk negotiation, were not published, and that they knew no more of this affair, than what they had received from the Earl of Clarendon's friends.

Count d'Esfrades, being Ambassador at London the beginning of the year 1662, had secretly agreed with the King, that the French King should supply him with a certain sum of money, to enable him to assist Portugal. But this was to be kept very secret, because of the Pyrenean treaty, by which Lewis had solemnly engaged to give no assistance to Portugal, either directly or indirectly. This secret, however, took air, and occasioned a letter from Lewis to Count d'Esfrades, dated the 4th of March, in which are these words: "—You may tell the King of England, that what is known here of the money of Haure, came from Fox himself, who has not been very careful to keep the secret. This was partly the cause of all the senseless noise made in Paris, which doubtless must have reached London, that I am treating for Dunkirk with the said King for a sum of money, in order to exchange it with the King of Spain, for Cambray, or Aire, and St. Omer. You know better than any man, whether I had ever such a thought."

It is not unlikely, that this was an insinuation which began in Charles the thought of selling Dunkirk to France; but the sale was not mentioned till some months after. Count d'Esfrades being returned to France in April this year, was appointed Ambassador extraordinary to Holland. But as he was on his journey, he received a letter from the King of England, of the 17th of July, to desire him to come to London, where he wished to communicate to him an affair proposed by the Chancellor. Count d'Esfrades, with his master's leave, went to London, and there received from him a letter, in which he told him, "—You may guess with what impatience I expect the arrival of your packet, which is to inform me of the reason of the King of Great Britain's desiring to speak with you, and obliging you to defer your journey to Holland, &c."

As all the other letters, till October, shew, that Count d'Esfrades was employed only in this negotiation during his stay at London, there is no reason to doubt, that the first proposition for the sale of Dunkirk, came from England.

As to the share the Earl of Clarendon had in this affair, it clearly appears in a letter of the 17th of August, writ by Count d'Esfrades, to the King his master, wherein he gives an account of a conference he had with the Earl of Clarendon. These are his words: "The Chancellor added, that the thought of this treaty came from him, and did not conceal, that the necessity of the English affairs had inspired him with it. That the King, the Duke of York, and himself, were alone of this opinion, and that Monk, the Lord-Treasurer, and the Earl of Sandwich were still to be managed, whom he could not hope to gain, but by the great sums which would accrue to the King: That having already proposed it to them from the urgent occasions of the State, they had offered an expedient to preserve the place for the King, and ease him of this expence.—I must not forget to tell your Majesty, that the Chancellor hinted to me, that the King had precautions to observe with the Queen his Mother on this affair: That therefore the King had told the Queen, that his sending for me into England, was to desire my application to your Majesty, for a sum of money to be lent him in his pressing necessities, and that he had ordered the Chancellor to confer with me upon it. The Chancellor added, that the King and he were agreed, that the King should complain much of my non-compliance, with regard to this loan, and that the Chancellor particularly should tell the Queen, by way of secret, that I was a strange man, and he very much mistaken, if by what I had said to him, I did not intend to demand for security of this loan, some cautionary town, as England had formerly done by France and Holland, in a like case; but that he had pretended not to understand me, as being a demand to which he would never advise his master to consent. All this disguise is used to prepare the Queen to believe, that the King's forming of the treaty, if it should come to a conclusion, and that necessity was the motive to it. I am likewise to complain of the Chancellor, as of a man who blindly desires to procure advantages for his master, without regarding the interest of your Majesty. The whole proceeding confirms me in the opinion, that they have a

"mind to a treaty, and that they are reasonable in every thing but the price."

In another letter of the 21st of August, Count d'Esfrades writ to the King, that the Chancellor told him,—"That when it should be known for how small a sum this treaty was to be made, the King could not avoid reproach, and that, at the least, he (the Chancellor) would be liable to publick censure, which might endanger his life. That therefore it was his opinion to make a present of it to your Majesty, and leave the reward to your generosity: but as he was not master, and was highly concerned to take care of himself in so nice an affair, he was obliged to conceal his sentiments, and pretend to adhere to those of others, that he might not be taken for the principal author of the treaty.—He farther enlarged upon the importance of this place, and the advantages which your Majesty might receive from it, if you should ever design to make conquests upon Flanders, &c."

These letters demonstrate, that the Earl of Clarendon, son of the Chancellor, was ill-informed, when he told Dr. Burnet that his Father kept himself out of that affair entirely. It may be said, however, in the Chancellor's justification, that possibly the thought of selling Dunkirk came first from the King; that perhaps the Chancellor endeavoured to dissuade him from it, and not succeeding, had a mind to give him a proof of his obedience, in taking this negotiation upon himself, in order to manage it to the King's advantage. For Dr. Burnet, in his character of this Minister, observes, that though a resolution was taken contrary to his sentiment, he executed it with the same zeal, as if proposed by himself. But this is only a bare possibility, which every one will regard as he pleases.

While this negotiation employed the King and his first Minister, three of the late King's Judges, who had found means to escape out of the Kingdom, were publicly executed at Tyburn. They had, after wandering through Low and High-Germany, settled for some time at Hanau under borrowed names, and returned in the spring to Delft in Holland, having appointed their wives to meet them there, in order to learn the state of affairs in England, and what hopes were left for them; but Sir George Downing, the King's resident at the Hague, and formerly of their party, having intercepted their letters, obtained the consent of the States to seize and put them on board an English ship, which brought them to England, where they were executed. The names of these three Regicides were Corbet, Okey, and Berkhead.

This execution was followed with the trials and condemnation of Sir Henry Vane and General Lambert, who had been particularly excepted in the Act of Pardon, tho' they were not amongst the King's Judges, because they were considered as the chief authors of the troubles. Vane had been confined, shortly after the King's arrival, on a bare suspicion of framing some plot against the Government. But though he was excepted in the Act of Indemnity, he had, by means of his friends, found so much favour from the same House of Commons, who had excepted him, that they petitioned the King, jointly with the Peers, that he might not suffer death, which was granted by the King. He was therefore kept in prison without being tried, till the time I am speaking of. But this second Parliament being composed of men of a different character from the first, the Commons addressed the King to bring him as well as Lambert to their trials. In vain did he alledge in his defence the petition of the first Parliament, and many other reasons; he was sentenced to die as a traitor. Lambert was also tried and condemned, but was reprieved at the Bar, just as he was going to receive sentence. He was confined in the Isle of Guernsey, where he lived a Prisoner thirty-six years (1). Sir Henry Vane met not with the same favour from the King. This, it is pretended, was owing to his insolent behaviour at his trial. But many believed him a sacrifice to the Manes of the Earl of Strafford, to whose death he had greatly contributed. His indiscretion and insolence, as well as his trial as his execution, have been extremely aggravated. But it is easy to see, it was only to save the King's honour, who, having positively promised a pardon to all except the King's Judges, could not avoid granting a pardon to Vane, without violating his promise, and especially after sparing his life at the request of the late Parliament (2). It was so feared that he would insist upon this point in his last speech, that drummers were placed under the scaffold, who, as soon as he began to speak, upon a sign given, drowned his voice with their drums. All the favour he could obtain from the King, was to be beheaded. Great care was taken after his death to publish the King's inclination to pardon him, if he had not been provoked by his insolence. But this is a thing very hard to be proved.

St. Bartholomew's day being come (1), on which the Act of Uniformity was to take place, two thousand Presbyterian Ministers chose rather to quit their livings, than submit to the conditions of this Act. It was expected, that a division would have happened amongst them, and that a great number would have chose rather to conform to the Church of England, than see themselves reduced to beggary. It was not therefore without extreme surprize, that they were all seen to stand out, not so much as one suffering himself to be tempted (2). As this is a considerable event of this reign, it will not be improper to enquire into the causes of this rigour against the Presbyterians: I say the Presbyterians, because it was not the other Sects that the Church of England most dreaded.

1. It cannot be denied, that the High-Churchmen, who prevailed in the Parliament, acted in a spirit of revenge. But this revenge should not appear very strange, considering the persecution, and at last, the entire destruction, brought upon the Episcopal Church by the Presbyterians, if honour had not been wounded, nor any promise made to the Presbyterians. The Church of England was the national Church, which had flourished from the reformation, to the time of the war between Charles I. and the Parliament, when the Presbyterians entirely subverted it. It was therefore but just to restore it to its former condition. But it was unjust to violate the promise made to the Presbyterians, especially as they had greatly contributed to the King's restoration, and withal, to that of the very Church, which persecuted them, after being re-established by their assistance.

2. But revenge was not the sole cause of the present rigour exercised against the Presbyterians. The desire of self-preservation was no less concerned. Experience of what had passed, taught the Church of England, that if the Presbyterians should ever find an opportunity like that which they once had, they would not fail to improve it. They were always irreconcilable enemies, though, in the present juncture, they were unable to do any hurt, and obliged to go for mercy. It was therefore, undoubtedly, the interest of the Church of England, to use all possible precautions to hinder the increase of a party already too powerful, and which, probably, would never cease contending for the superiority.

3. We have seen what were the notions of this Parliament, and of High-Church, concerning the royal prerogative, and to what height it was carried. The Presbyterians, as well as the other Sects, were known to follow quite contrary maxims, and if they were not entirely Republicans, at least, they endeavoured to reduce the royal power within very narrow bounds, as appeared in the resolutions and conduct of the Parliament of 1640. But while the Church of England had no suspicion of the King's Religion, and believed him a zealous member, it was her interest to support and extend the prerogative, and consequently to disable the Presbyterians from prosecuting their maxims.

4. The Church of England's interest required, that she should improve so favorable an opportunity, which perhaps might never return. It was seen, how greedy the King was of money, to throw it away with the greatest profusion, and that he could not be without the assistance of his Parliament, and the Church had the good fortune to have a Parliament consisting of her most zealous Members, and disposed to sacrifice to the King a little of the nation's treasure, provided the King would, in his turn, make them a sacrifice of the Presbyterians. Though he was not suspected to be a Papist, it could not be thought, he would, from a pure principle of honour and honesty, quarrel with a Parliament so favorable to him, for the sake of the Presbyterians, whom he neither did, nor had reason to love. There was nothing therefore but what might be expected from his complaisance, provided care was taken to supply him with money. Such a juncture was not to be neglected.

5. But there was another still more powerful cause of the Parliament's severity against the Presbyterians. This was the interest of the Papists, who had ever a great influence during this reign. Some made an open profession of their Religion, and yet were looked upon with a very favorable eye by the Court. Others, after the King's example, pretended to be good Protestants, and zealous members of the Church of England, in order to be more serviceable to their party. The first used their utmost endeavours to incite the Parliament to a severe treatment of the Presbyterians, in order to destroy a party which had so openly declared against the royal power. The others concealing themselves under a false zeal for the Protestant Religion, laboured with the same ardour, to excite the enmity of the Heads of the Church of England, and of those whom they knew to be most warm, against men, who would not spare them, if ever they were in a condition to ruin them, as they had manifestly shewn. But while they were thus zealously labouring to bring things to extremities, they were endeavouring, on the other hand, by their emulations, to encourage the Presbyterians, and exhort them to the closest union, by insinuating it to be the most effectual means to defeat the measures of their enemies. They were told, their number was so great, that, in all likelihood, it would deter the Parliament from attempting the ruin of so many at once, for fear of exciting new troubles. Whereas, if their party should divide, they would be infensibly and irrecoverably ruined. In short, to induce them the more easily not to despair, they were told, the King, provoked with the ill-treatment they received, notwithstanding his promise to them, would protect them openly if they would remain united; but a division would put it out of his power to do them any service. It is certain, the Court was in this disposition, not from any pity to the Presbyterians, or regard to the King's honour, but from the hopes that the union amongst the Non-conformists would procure them more favorable conditions, of which the Papists might make an advantage. But when I say the Court, I do not pretend to include the Earl of Clarendon, though prime Minister. This justice must be done him, to say, that not only he did not contribute to the designs of the King and the Papists, but was the man that broke their measures, by secret intrigues, well knowing what was concealed under this feigned moderation of the King to the Presbyterians. However, the King, the Duke of York, and the other leading Papists, believed it necessary, to push the Presbyterians, and then encourage them to hold together, that the danger arising from their union might prevail with the Parliament to grant to all the Non-conformists in general, a Toleration which should extend to the Papists. This is not a bare conjecture. All the King's proceedings demonstrate this was the scheme he had formed.

I have already mentioned the Corporation act, made to prevent dissatisfied persons from being admitted into offices. For the better executing this Act, the Parliament appointed commissioners, who were employed all this year in visiting Corporations, and inspecting the conduct of the members. A very extensive power was given to these commissioners, with absolute authority to turn out of the Corporations, all members who were ever so little suspected. For the design of this Act was to divest of all credit, every person not entirely devoted to the King and the Church of England. This power was exercised with all imaginable rigor: so that the Corporations had not one member left, who was not of the same principles with the House of Commons. Moreover, the walls of Gloucester, Coventry, Northampton, Leicester and Taunton were, by order of these commissioners demolished, because these towns had distinguished themselves by their fidelity to the Parliament.

About the end of the year a conspiracy was discovered, formed by the fifth Monarchy-men, and upon the informations of some of the compliers, six were executed. Nevertheless, many believed, this was only an artifice to excuse the severity practised against the Non-conformists. The ground of this suspicion was, that in a plot formed to seize and kill the King, the Duke of York, and General Monk, and to seize the Tower, and Castle of Windsor, only six conspirators were discovered, namely, George Phillips a Sergeant of Foot, Thomas Tonge a distiller, Francis Stubbs a cheefmonger, James Hind a gunner, John Sellers a compass-maker, and Nathaniel Gibbs a felt-maker. Few could believe that such men should ever think of succeeding in a design of that nature. It is true, that to render this conspiracy more probable, it was said, the old Colonels were to assemble their disbanded forces, and Ludlow, then in Switzerland, to come and head them. But though such an undertaking required persons of some distinction, yet only these six wretches who were executed (3), could be Burnet, p. 187. — There was a great debate in Council a little before St. Bartholomew's day, whether the Act of Uniformity should be punctually executed or not. Some moved to have the execution of it delayed till the next session of Parliament. Others were for executing it in the main, that is, to let famous eminent Men preach in their Churches, all they should like, and to put out the execution of the Law. Id. p. 192.

Peace with Algier.
The King's Conduct in the Presby- terians
 To finish the most remarkable transactions of this year, I shall briefly add, that after the Earl of Sandwich left Liban, to conduct the Queen into England, Vice-Admiral Lawson, failed with a Squadron to Algier, and forced the Algerines to a peace with England. As the King was in possession of Tangier, they doubtless believed, it would not be advantageous to have him for their enemy. Shortly after, the King declared Tangier a free port, and invested it with great privileges (2).

1662-3. The King had already discovered, how agreeable it would be to him to have the management of the Uniformity Act, but the Parliament had returned no answer to his desire. Before this Act, the Presbyterians had behaved in a manner which gave no just cause of complaint against them, and the King had made them a positive promise, either that he would never consent to the Act, or procure them a particular exemption, but he performed neither, his aim having been only to keep them united, by giving them hopes of his protection. After the Act was passed, he still continued to feed their expectations, and hence it was, that they addressed the King and Council, for a Dispensation from the penalties annexed to the Act of Uniformity. This petition would doubtless have been rejected, if the King had not signified to the Council the obligation he was under to grant their request. Some time after he published a Declaration, dated the 26th of December, but which appeared not till the beginning of January 1662-3. In this Declaration, after an assurance of his firm adherence to the Act of Uniformity, he said however, that for the sake of others, he was willing to dispense with some matters in it (3). Upon this Declaration,

 Mr. Calamy a Presbyterian Minister being in the Church of [Aldermanbury,] of which he had the cure before the execution of the Act, and seeing, the Minister who was expected, did not come, ascended the Pulpit and preached, for which he was committed to Newgate by the Lord-Mayor of London. But in a few days he was discharged by the King's express order.

The King, as we have seen, meant to procure some advantages for the Presbyterians, in order to procure the same for the Papists. This was his scheme, and as it was directly contrary to the Earl of Clarendon's principles, mortal enemy of the Presbyterians, and no friend of the Papists, it is not surprising, it should be formed without the privity of this Minister, whose credit, for that reason, began now to decline. Nay, the King had plainly shown, he had not the same affection for him, by obliging his intimate friend Secretary Nicholas, worn out with age, to resign his post to the Chancellor's professed enemy, Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington. This sufficiently discovered, that his credit with the King was sensibly diminished. On the other hand, though the King affected a great zeal for the Protestant Religion, the choice of Bennet to be Secretary of State, showed his inclination for the Roman Catholic, as Bennet was strongly suspected of being a Papist in his heart, and known for their Protector. It is said, he and the Earl of Bristol had induced the King to change his Religion at Pontarabia, and that Bennet durst not return into England, till after the death of the Lord Culpeper, who had threatened him to discover it to the Parliament. Be this as it will, Bennet being the Chancellor's enemy, this last could not but look upon his enemy's advancement to the post of his intimate friend, as a prelude to his disgrace.

The King's declaration in favour of the Presbyterians, was a further indication of the Chancellor's fall. This declaration had been resolved, and prepared without his knowledge at Somerset house, where the Queen-mother resided, and probably by a Catholic Junto, or by secret favorites of that Religion. Those who knew the Chancellor's principles, easily judged, he had no hand in it. They had reason to be afterwards confirmed in this opinion, when every one evidently saw, the King, in his pretended compassion for the Presbyterians, designed only to procure a Toleration for the Catholics. The Chancellor, however, kept his post for some years, though with a great diminution of credit.

The King's design in favour of the Catholics
 The Parliament meeting the 18th of February, the King made a Speech to both Houses, in which he confined himself to one single point, namely, his declaration concerning the Act of Uniformity. His words were these:

Philips.
 "To cure the distempers, and compose the dis-
